Bradford, Birmingham, Chesterfield, Coventry, Co. Durham, Essex, Glasgow, Kent, Liverpool, London, Manchester, Newcastle, Northampton, Nottingham, Reading, Rugby, Sheffield, Sussex, Wokingham and York.

We have internal groupings around the following industries and interests:

Health, Education, Unemployed, Postal, Students, Local Government, Community Youth Work and Women.

The ACF promotes the building of a strong and active anarchist communist movement in Britain and internationally, and has contact with like-minded anarchists in other countries.

ORGANISE

ORGANISE! IS THE national magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF). It was formerly called Virus, but it was decided to change the name as our last National Conference. Since A.I.D.S. the word "virus" has developed different, negative connotations to when the magazine was launched.

Organise! is a quarterly theoretical journal published in order to develop anarchist communist ideas. It aims to give a clear anarchist viewpoint on contemporary issues, and initiate in depth debates on areas not normally covered by agitiational journals.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and other open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us develop our ideas further. Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise!, and as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles, we will endeavour to publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree with our A&Ps at all). The deadline for the August issue is June 30th.

All contributions to the next issue of Organise! should be sent to: ACF, Box 1, Hiziki, 15 Goosegate, Hockley, Nottingham.

PRESS FUND

THANKS TO AN excellent response to our first Organise! Press Fund Appeal, we've easily reached our £250 target within our three-month deadline!

What a brilliant way to kick-off our Fund. Many thanks to all comrades, friends, readers and subscribers who gave donations.

The money raised will go a long way towards meeting our many production and postage costs, and - if this level of response can be kept up - we can begin to think about increasing the size of Organise!, and publishing it more frequently.

Between now and next issue, several fund raising events and benefits will be taking place - which should all help us reach our next £250 figure.

If you think Organise! - and other ACE publications - are worth supporting, help us by donating to this next appeal.

We want to raise £250 by July 20th. With your help, we can repeat our early success.

We ask all readers to send their donations (made payable to the 'ACF') as soon as possible to:

The schooling business

IN APRIL THE main provisions of the Education Reform Act 1988 came into force - part of the Tories' strategy of claiming to 'decentralise power and remove bureaucratic control', whilst in reality introducing changes that only benefit an already priviledged few.

Schools will be able to "opt-out" of local education authority control and will instead get a State grant for each child plus money from rich parents and business investors. Schools in middle class areas will thrive, attended by kids from well-off families including those no longer needing to pay private school fees to get "the best" in education.

Recruit

The schools' business orientation will ensure that local capitalists will queue up to recruit the well-trained brainwashees as technicians at all levels.

Young people who stay on after 18 can go to the privatised Polytechnics which sell courses to employers as investments. The money Polys get from the State will have far more strings attached and business won't be thrilled at the prospect of funding the Polys - so the State ends up with more control.

Teacher-training will be more geared to the "enterprise culture" - so much for education being "child-centered". Well, it never was particularly, but now market consciousness alone guides decisions. Headteachers and principals in schools and colleges become no more or less than managers concerned with disciplining workforces and meeting budget targets.

Failed

Comprehensive Education may have failed miserably to meet the needs and desires of working class people, but the changes contained in the Act, will only increase the extent to which children are turned into just more commodities for capitalism.

As with the privatisation of the Health Service, power industries, etc, resistance has been muted because the old monolithic bureaucracies which ran things alienated everyone who came into contact with them, as "clients" or workers. The Tories play successfully on the reluctance of ordinary people to defend systems they have had such bad experience of. "Fight the Cuts!" sloganeering is not enough, and the left parties strike no chords with their campaigns, giving no sign that they oppose the rigid bureaucracies that ran, among other things, education.

Youth are not going to like the idea of fightng to keep schools the way they are! The idea of giving parents power over schools and limiting that of local officials seems, to many, no stupider than defending what's gone before.

The irony is that local authority control will be replaced by that of central government and business. Parents may have more say over minor matters but Boards of Governors will be dominated by investors, ie rich parents and companies, who - along with the State - will have the real say.

Economic

The overhaul of education is an example of the Tories starting from proposed changes everyone knew were needed; then planning and adminstering them so that virtually the opposite goals are served - in this case central control and the specific economic aims of the government.

And all in the name of de-centralising power, giving choice, lifting restraints, increasing freedom. But only for middle class parents who favour a reactionary model of learning, don't mind turning their children into value for capitalists' money and who don't care what happens to those who are less "fortunate".

Poor schools won't attract rich parents, business cash or enough kids to get by on government money. They won't have the resources to gar-coat the National Curriculum and GCSEs with more teacher-attention, morale, good equipment, books, etc.

Testing at ages 7 and 11 and publishing the results will be a punitive, arbitrary exercise: continual assessment will be continual alienation when teachers have little choice but to police children learning that they are to be further excluded from "affluent" society, with working-for-dole (or less) waiting on the other side of the school gates. Freedom and choice?

The ideals of Comprehensive Education will no longer be even a pretence, and resistance can't be aimed at protecting them. The struggle to improve wages and conditions needs to be combined with teachers developing tolerable environments within schools - necessarily opposing the system - as well as in action against the employers.

The interests of teachers and pupils may begin to converge - to the extent that n are placed in an impossible situation, asked to acheive impossible goals. When this kind of awareness can grow, so too can ways of resisting and fighting.●

Poll tax crunch point

THE FIGHT AGAINST the poll tax in Scotland is at the stage where its strengths and weaknesses are becoming apparent to those involved.

A Glasgow ACF comrade here reports on the political and tactical effectiveness of the different campaigns, as demands for the first payments arrive in Scotland:

"The 'Stop-It' campaign was the 'non-political' brainchild of the Labour Party, created to give the impression that they were actually doing something. It was based on the notion that you must not break the law.

Their position of being prepared to 'break the poor, but not the law' is held because they think they can work within the capitalist state to get realistic improvements. They cannot break the law since they will be using the state to impose their own anti-working class laws at a later date.

They do not want socialism but power, and as such they will only ever look after their own interests instead of those of the working class. There were arguments for non-payment by some in the Party, but the bureaucracy shut them up - hence 'Stop-It'.

Party

'Stop-It' advocated that people send their poll tax registration forms back uncompleted and queried, three weeks after receiving them. Its primary objective was to slow down implementation, and it comes as no surprise that ❱ it failed. The register can be compiled from all available records - the form itself is just a formality.

The lesson from Scottish groups is to form a local anti-poll tax group, collectively bin the forms and refuse to pay. Community group organising in their locality that have only followed the 'Stop-It' tactic have been sent back a small booklet with answers to all the questions you would ever think to ask about your form.

Group

The local 'community' groups have been in existence for about a year and a half now. There are two types: the 'group' and the 'union'. The union is based on card membership and public meetings. The group operates on an open committee basis. Organising meetings are open to all and have no power as such (as well as no permanent office bearers). I think that some sort of union with an open committee may be best.

The union organisations are dominated by political parties since their structure makes them easy to take control of. The more community based groups were either set up by anarchists or at least influenced by libertarian ideas. On the east coast, anarchists started forming community groups first, based on local, direct control from below. Trotskyists organisations could not make headway in these and set up rival groups under their control in the same areas. Watch out for these people, their authoritarian politics will alienate people and destroy effective action.

The creation of federations in Glasgow and Edinburgh was an attempt to co-ordinate activity. Unfortunately, they were quickly dominated by 'politicos' - particularly Militant members. The delegates conferences are controlled by parties on the executive council. They do not involve free discussion and delegates vote according to party allegiance, not in the interests of the locality. The bast way to ensure local control is to organise along anarchist lines.

The important message to get across is that only collective action will win. Try to organise street committees against snoopers and set up good communication networks. In Scotland we have found that such organisations must be self-managed or these will just be new bosses to overcome.

Industrial activity is also important. A mistake made here in Scotland was in failing to get council and other workers involved right from the start.

Boycott

Local government workers should be persuaded to boycott poll tax work. This will cause problems with implementation and can destroy the tax, with community and industrial solidarity.

The poll tax is a class issue, and only the working class can beat it - no political party will do it for us." •

Health 'shake-up'

Caring for pensioners health will eat into GP's budgets.

COMPARED TO OTHER health services, the NHS delivers some of the best medical care available. It could not do this without the care its staff put in, from domestics to consultants. The NHS helps millions of people to have a longer and more pleasant life.

However, there is a lot of room for improvement. The NHS is run by a vast and ineffecient bureaucracy, most workers having little say in its running. Many of its patients feel that they are treated as objects. Alternatives to traditional medicine, such as osteopathy, homeopathy are largely unavailable. Counselling services, too, are much needed, and, of course, there are still problems of understaffing, shortages and waiting lists.

The Tories present their new "NHS review" as a solution to many people's dissatisfaction. In fact, it is merely one more step towards their goal of privatising health care. The tragedy of the NHS for the Tories, is that it is not business like. It has a turn-over of £26 billion yearly, and is one of the largest employers in Europe, yet hardly anyone makes a profit out of it. The real tragedy is that there are many health needs the NHS does not cater for.

The "NHS review" aims to create an internal market within the NHS which would include the private sector. Health Authorities receive money to pay for health care and in future they will pay it directly to the hospital where the patient is sent. They will be forced to comb the country for the cheapest deal they can find, to make the best of limited funds.

All NHS hospitals will have to price all their services, employing more bureaucrats and creating even more paperwork. Hospitals may have to advertise their services. Fewer hospitals will attempt to give a comprehensive service, as specialisation will increase.

Objective

The specialisation will be in profitable areas of health care, mostly those that are high in technology and turnover of patients. Care for the chronically sick, the disabled, and preventitive measures such as cancer screening and care for the elderly will be dropped by any hospital that can get away with it. will mean the running of the NHS's most prestigious hospitals by businessmen. They will be able to turn these hospitals into little more than health farms for the wealthy. They will have no obligation to ptovide any care but emergency treatment, their prime concern will be profit.

The new GP practise budgets are a key part of the new NHS market. GPs will receive a fixed budget, and will choose health care according to cost, and not according to need. GPs will be discouraged from referring patients to hospital or specialists. They will be encouraged to prescribe drugs only if they life-saving or absolutely necessary. GPs will have to avoid patients who are often ill, or who are elderly, or who have a disability.

Cuts

The NHS market is the first step towards selling the NHS bit by bit. The private sector are already making plans to do deals with the NHS trust hospitals, GPs and Health Authorities. They hope to see more of the taxes of the working class put into their own pockets for the treatment of the wealthy.

Patients are the last to benefit from these new reforms, if you can afford to supplement your GP's budget, you might get a better deal. Whilst you are young and healthy, things might seem to have improved, however, the centralisation of treatment could mean having to travel many miles in different directions for different treatments.

Care for the elderly, disbled and chronically sick, has been run down by the Tories since they got into power. Community care has meant no care for some people. The present plans will worsen this. The government has offered tax relief on health insurance paid by relatives for their elderly. This is to help the middle-class and wealthier working class to opt out of a decaying system.

We do not want a bureaucratic health service unable to meet needs, nor do we want a profitable health service that over-treats the rich and under-treats the poor. Only when we have a health service run directly by those who work in it and under the direction of the community it serves, will we have a health service that is truly human, and that really puts patients first. • forwards, backwards or sideways?

MANY PEOPLE EAGERLY await the development of events in Afghanistan. Will the Mojahedin displace the Soviet backed Kabul regime? Would this be progress? What form would the new regime take?

Although the longest invasion by Russia, this was not the first. The Czars had an interest in the area and there were brief Soviet invasions in 1925, 1929 and 1930.

Afghan

The reasons for the 1979 invasion are complex. The Kaalqi (masses) faction, the majority wing of the PDPA (People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan) had seized power through an army coup. The regime then found itself in trouble, ill prepared and with limited support in the countryside.

The "Brezhnev doctrine" was put into action, to ensure that a "communist" power should not revert back to capitalism. Bases in Afghanistan were of strategic importance to the Soviets—overlooking the Straits of Hormuz, the oil highway, and acting as levers on Iran, Pakistan and the Baluchis. Such a success would also act as a lesson to Muslims in Central Asia.

Kabul

Although the PDPA made serious mistakes, only a minority of the population supporting the coup which installed them, the Khalquis alienated people still further. They were heavy handed in their attempts to impose reform on a conservative society and met with much resistance.

Following the Russian invasion the more "moderate" Parchami (Banner) faction was installed. This was an attempt to create a broader political front, to give itself a wide power base and so rescue the situation.

The damage, though, had already been done. Whichever faction was in power was seen as godless and communist, despite Parchami protestations to the contrary. The Khalquis had imprisoned, tortured and executed too many for the Parchamis to escape the blood feud. Each regime was closely identified with "infidel" Russian invaders.

PDPA attempts at reform, particularly concerning the position of women and land ownership, fell foul of the conservatism of rural areas. As in any society, such things are part of a complex structure and cannot be changed by legislation imposed from above.

Islam

Social change, to be effective as well as meaningful, must come from the people themselves, not from powers outside them. Outside of the towns, attempts to change people's lifestyles and values met with resistance.

The anti-PDPA forces are properly united only upon this opposition, not upon any vision of the future. Mojadidi leads the moderate, more traditionalist Afghan National Liberation Front.

Karim Kalili leads the eight pro-Iran Shia groups, known for ambushing Sunni rebels as well as government troops. There are the monarchist "Gucci guerillas" of Pir Gailaui's National Islamic Front of Afghanistan, who look to the re-establishment of the king, Zahir Shah.

Hekmatyar leads the pro-Pakistan fundamentalist Hezb-e-Islami, a group which looks towards a totally Islamic society.

Pakistan

Jamiat-i-Islami, the largest group, lead by Rabbani Sayyaf's Itihaf-e-Islami, Saudi funded, applies a stricter fundamentalist line upon women and a harsher view of society as a whole. Even the moderate groups wish to see the imposition of Sharia (Islamic) law.

There are over 3 million Afghan refugees residing in Pakistan, mainly in the North West Frontier Province. This influx has caused many problems. The amount of weapons moving through the area has made Pashawar another Beirut. Many of the Pakhtuni refugees have entered commerce in the region, increasing pressure upon an already depressed area.

The reactionary Pakistan military, channelling US aid and acting as its "puppet", has a real interest in the conflict. The Ojhri massacre, where hundreds died, was the result of US supplied missiles. Equipment sent for the Mujahedin was blown up to hide its sale from US investigators. Pakistan's Inter Service Intelligence has been hard at work trying to influence events in its favour.

Soviet

What does all this mean to the USSR? The Empire of the Bear was stung repeatedly and beat a retreat after 9 years. Its attempt to use Soviet muslim troops was an abject failure as they had no desire to fight other muslims.

Not only do people in the Central Asian republics of the USSR have their own mullahs, many listen to the broadcasts beamed from Iran and are closely watching the rise of nationalism around the Baltic and in the Caucasus. Back in the 1920s the Basmach rebellion united muslims against the Bolsheviks. Could this happen again?

Whoever gains power, the losers will be the ordinary people of Afghanistan. US imperialism and the Pakistan military will attempt to hold Islamic Afghanistan up as an example. India, rival with Pakistan, will try to keep the PDPA regime afloat with airlifts of supplies. When and if the Mojahedin take power, then rivalry and dis-unity will continue. The conflict between Shia and Sunni, monarchist, moderate and fundamentalist will carry on.

Within the fundamentalists, those pro-Iranian, pro-Palestinian, pro-Saudi will vie for power.

Throughout all this, the peasants, women and poor will remain exploited while the wealth in gas, oil and minerals will be reaped by those struggling to gain or maintain control. •

Self-organisation Italian style

Lessons of the workers' Base Committees (COBAS)

THE ITALIAN WORKING class has created new forms of organisation within the last few years.

In the winter of 1986-87 self-organised structures developed throughout the public sector: particularly amongst teachers and railway workers.

These 'Base Committees' (COBAS) are still present today in many strikes and mobilisations. This article will give a brief analysis and history of a very interesting and useful experience.

The COBAS of the Teachers

The Teachers COBAS were first set up, principally in Rome and Naples, as a reaction to a 'National Convention of Work' that the four unions in teaching had agreed to. These were the GCIL, (Socialist and Communist); UIL, (Socialist); CISL, (Christian); SNALS, ('Corporatist').

Neither the teachers as a whole or the members of the signing unions had been consulted.

Unsatisfied

The tiny pay rises, and the greater intensification of work, did not satisfy the teachers. Even before the Convention was signed, the COBAS emerged.

Although they began as a typical product of the 'left fractions' within the unions, the discontent of the teachers soon made the COBAS develop into something much larger.

When the Convention was signed, strike action began, and the following demands were made:

1) A substantial pay rise; 2) An equal share among all school workers of the money needed for the intensification of work apparatus; 3) A maximum of 20 pupils per class; 4) Union rights for all (the Convention gave only those unions signing the right to hold workplace meetings).

The strike spread from Naples and Rome to the South and centre. It was not so strong in the north.

Even the COBAS were surprised by the spontaneous movement. For many years, teachers had been passive and now they showed all their discontent.

Provincial, regional and then national assemblies sprang up. Debates developed on the forms of organisation, working conditions and strategies for the schools.

In May 87 a huge demonstration took place in Rome in with 50,000 teachers on the streets. This (Italy's largest ever) set off a further mobilisation as other less advanced teachers joined the movement.

The delegates had to rigourously stick to their mandate under instant recall, if necessary, ensuring that power stayed in the hands of the workers.

The government fought back trying to break the strike with non-striking teachers. These refused, and themselves went on strike. They tried again by partially accepting one demand - the reduction of classes to 25. This allowed the government to appear as having made important concesssions to the strikers. The media whipped up public opinion against the strike - claiming that only extremists now wanted it to continue.

Faltered

In addition, the school holidays were imminent, and the strike faltered.

Within the COBAS there were also problems. There were those who wanted a relationship with the institutions and those who wanted to take the struggle further. With no solution being found, the COBAS became divided: some wanting to end the strike, and some to continue it.

In the meantime, a new government had been elected. The debate was now on forms of organisation as much as on the demands for a new Convention.

There was an intense debate between those seeing themselves as professionals and wanting status, and those looking for alliances with other public sector workers.

For anarchists the central question was not so much whether the COBAS should become a union, but how best to improve the co-ordination of the movement and safeguard the gains of self-organisation and direct action.

The National Co-ordination of United Railworkers

At the beginning of 1987, railworkers founded the January 11th Movement, which inspired massive strikes in marine and air transport.

The movement, though younger than that of the teachers, had been prepared and preceeded by the Committee Against the Transfers and the Union of Anarchists and - the workers' group - Libertarian Railway Workers. The drivers were the spearhead of the COBAS, capable of blocking more than 80% of the network during the strike. They struggled for a real reduction in hours (they work 38 hours plus regular overtime) and against a reduction of staff levels.

The drivers were isolated, however, causing many problems and the GCIL bureaucrats attempted to break the movement by singing the praises of the next contract of work.

Profit

The union bureaucrats didn't oppose the state demand that the railways ought to be run at a profit, and supported reform and the deficit run up by management.

The drivers were not totally alone and were aided by other railworkers. The trains that the management could put back into action had to be driven by soldiers or managers, thus putting passengers lives at risk.

Although the drivers, being skilled, were fighting to maintain a wage differential, their strikes set off strike movements among other railway workers.

The United Assembly of COBAS

On 15 December 1987 the first assembly of all the COBAS met at, Rome, together with other structures, including Democrazia Consighiare - a left current in the CGIL. The main concerns were the defence of the right to strike and the struggle against the work laws in the public sector.

In fact, the strike issue was a key part of the offensive of both the ruling class and the union bureaucrats against the workers. The General Secretary of UIL welcomed a limit on the right to strike.

As a result the union bureaucrats, saw their main task as breaking the COBAS, and beyond that, all workers self-organisation, and bargaining their monopoly of negotiation and calling strikes with the State and the bosses.

Historical

This is the result of a very important historical process. The union bureaucrats reply to the crisis of confidence of the rank and file, and the progressive destruction of delegation, by an increasing integration into the capitalist system of command. It's as a result of the deepening divide between the rank and file and the bureaucrats, that independent organisations - opposed to the institutionalised structures - have been created.

An important element is the profound transformation of the union structures within the framework of the restructuring of capitalism. It is impossible to capture or hold or transform these bureaucracies even from a reformist point of view. As a result the COBAS have great importance in developing workers' self-organisation.

Several organisations and many militants of a libertarian outlook work inside the COBAS, and played an important role among the teachers' and traindrivers' COBAS.

Militants

Alongside the comrades of the FAI (Italian Anarchist Federation), and a section of the USI (a small syndicalist union similar to the Spanish CNT), we find the libertarian communist militants of the FDCA (Anarchist Communist Federation), the OCL (Libertarian Communist Organisation) and the PAI (Italian Anarchist Party).

Despite the fact that many differences do exist amongst class struggle anarchists in Italy, it is equally true that there are strong similarities - the defence of self-organisation, workers' democracy, and direct action.

The libertarian organisations and militants lack structures and opportunities for debate and exchange of ideas. This can often aggravates differences.

The proposition by the FAI comrades to open a dialogue between libertarians active in the COBAS should be taken into account by Italian libertarian communists.

Unity

Differences should not be fudged, but brought out and discussed - so that different strategies can be considered, and possible areas of unity examined.

Libertarian workers have an important role in the COBAS, but they cannot rally it entirely to their position in the short term.

But the libertarian contribution can be decisive in the difficult recomposition of the workers' movement. For that, there is need for clarity, dialogue, exchange and unity between all those libertarians who wish to develop the class struggle. •

HOUSING UNDER THREAT

"IT'S ALL ABOUT tenants choice", is how Tory environment secretary Nicolas Ridley summed up the essence of the new Housing Act which came into force in January this year.

Under the guise of increasing that 'choice' the Tories have launched an all-out attack on public sector housing; threatening council tenants, council workers, and offering nothing to the growing army of homeless people.

The threats contained in the Act have led to an explosion in the number of active and militant tenants organisations nationwide. From Edinburgh to Gloucester, from Torbay to Tower Hamlets, mass meetings hundreds strong have met to plan campaigns of resistance.

The new legislation could scarcely have come at a worse time. Soaring house prices, combined with the virtual standstill in council house building programmes, have created a crisis in housing. As the demand for housing has increased, the supply of affordable private rented accomodation has, in many areas of the country, all but dried up.

Homeless

Homelessness has doubled since 1979, and, according to the housing campaign group Shelter, now stands at over 112,000 in England alone. The situation in Birmingham - where the 25,000 people on the council's waiting list will have to compete for the dozen new homes the city plans to build this year - is typical.

Working class families with mortgage commitments have fared little better. A government who came to power pledging to spread home ownership, by encouraging a mortgage credit boom, has relentlessly forced up interest rates. Many of the thousands of families and young couples who were forced to 'over-commit' themselves to heavy mortgages just to get a foothold on the housing ladder, are finding themselves increasingly unable to meet their repayments.

It's against this background that the seriousness of the latest attacks on working class housing can be measured.

The key element of the new Act is the drive to push council housing into the hands of the private sector, through the selling off of whole council estates. Linked to this is the abolition of 'fair renting' (through which a tenants could get a fixed rent enforced on a property they were living in) freeing landlords to charge a more 'realistic' (ie higher) market rent.

'Assured tenancies' are replacing 'secure tenancies' stripping tenants of what little protection they had against harrassment, eviction, or the simple neglect of repairs.

By making the private rented sector more 'attractive' - through weakening tenants power and boosting the potential for profits - the Tories hope to encourage thousands of small private landlords onto the market.

In the public housing field the Tories claim their objective is "to get people off that most deadly of all social drugs - the drug of dependence on the state".

In reality their goal is to destroy the last major obstacle in the way of giving the 'market' free reign in the housing field: large scale council housing.

Their objective is all the more clear when seen in the context of the war they are waging on the power of local government. With the destruction of public sector housing, the last remaining power base for local authorities will be smashed.

The ability of councils to manage their housing stock has been under constant attack since the 'right-to-buy' legislation was first introduced in the early 80s.

Labour authorities realise the importance of the power struggle that the Housing Act represents, and are as determined to fight to hang onto their power base as the Tories are to remove it.

The danger is that - unless they are clear about their own demands - tenants may simply become the pawns in this power struggle.

The plans to sell-off council estates directly threaten working class people in a number of ways. For tenants there is the threat of rent rises, increased evictions, the loss of repair and maintenance services, the fear of being forced out by landlords eager to 'redevelop' prime building land.

For council employees, working in housing departments and the Direct Labour Organisations (DLOs), there is the threat of sweeping job losses. And for the homeless, those still living with parents, and those on council waiting lists, such sales can only spell disaster.

But in fighting to repel big business landlords, we must go beyond an uncritical demand of 'defend council housing'. We have always opposed the centralised, bureaucratic and paternalistic way in which council estates are - by definition - run. And we don't see corporate housing provision as some 'bastion of socialism' that is under threat.

When council housing first appeared it did mark a significant improvement on much of the slum dwelling it was meant to replace.

Confirm

But a walk round any large city in Britain will confirm what has become of these 'homes fit for heroes'. Badly designed, run-dowm and decaying estates. Vandalised tower blocks no-one wants to live in. 'Problem estates' where councils dump 'difficult' families. And, increasingly, demolition work to pull down houses put up twenty years ago, and already uninhabitable.

As anarchists we recognise this as the inevitable result of capitalist social policy, which sees working class people as so many units to be housed as compactly and cheaply as possible.

Council tenants don't enjoy some sort of 'special relationship' with their landlord denied to private tenants. They certainly have no more 'say' in the managing of their homes.

On estates run down and neglected for years, underfunded and denied resources, it's hard to see why local council tenants should readily jump to the defence of council bureaucrats who have shown no interest in their housing needs til now.

That's why its crucial that in the fight over housing we make it clear that we are fighting for our immediate class interests (ie keeping out big business) not rallying to protect our wonderful council landlords.

Potential

So what strategies should we be arguing for? The anarchist author Colin Ward has long argued that self-help can offer tenants a way forward without either public or private landlords. He argues that housing is one of the most obvious areas where the creative potential of self-activity can be realised on a large scale in the here and now.

Some anarchists involved with the present round of housing struggles have found themselves agreeing - often for very pragmatic reasons: if tenants are faced with a council determined to sell off local estates, then some sort of tenants buy-out may seem the only practical solution.

But such buy-outs are fraught with problems. Leaving aside the council workers whose jobs will be lost through such a sale, the fact remains that the estate will not be able to escape the confines of the market place.

All the tasks of a landlord still have to be performed: like pushing up rents as costs rise, chasing up and evicting people with rent arrears, selecting 'reliable' new tenants (ie those who can afford to pay), and so on.

Tenants organisations can easily find themselves unable to attract the capital investment needed to maintain and repair - let alone improve - their housing stock. Financial institutions willing to invest in co-ops will naturally insist on conditions - like rent increases, land sales - before releasing funds. Co-ops have little independent economic clout.

And it's a fact of capitalist-life that co-operatives running large concerns tend very quickly to end up being run by a small committee composed of the more confident (and usually more middle class) members.

It may be that on a given estate, a 'tenants co-operative' is the least worst option. But we should not get dazzled by the prospect of self-help rented housing. For as long as the market exists, the best it offers us is the chance to be our own landlord.

We can take strength from the fact that these latest attacks on housing have rekindled tenants' willingness to fight: already the Tories have been forced to make concessions.

They had planned to enforce Housing Action Trusts (HATs) on several trial areas, earmarked for sale. HATs were to be given large budgets and sweeping planning powers, and charged with the job of smartening estates up in the run-up to the sell-offs.

At a public meeting in Lambeth late last year, a HAT consultant only uttered three sentences before being sent packing by enraged tenants. Such reaction has been typical of the way working class people have responded to the threat of being HATed.

Ubruptly, the Tories announced that all estates were now to be balloted before a HAT could be introduced.

If the tenants initial victory over the HATs issue was an embarrassing setback for the government - showing early on that tenants action could be effective - then events in Torbay at the start of the this year compounded their problems.

Within weeks of the Act becoming law, the results of a ballot called by Tory-controlled Torbay council showed only 787 out of 5,206 tenants to be in favour of selling off their entire housing stock.

Under the rigged ballot system, those who don't vote are counted as being in favour of transfer. As 42% of Torbay residents abstained, local Tories were able to claim a mandate. While they prepared to sign the papers, Ridley dithered. He hadn't wanted the first showpiece sell-off to be so transparently 'unfair'. He halted the sale, calling on the council to hold a second, postal ballot, "to establish more clearly the views of tenants". Torbay Tories panicked by this eleventh hour U-turn, refused, and abandonded the sale indefinitely. Local council tenants were jubilant. In an attempt to repeat the Torbay victory, many groups have held 'pre-emptive' ballots on their estates, repeatedly showing overwhelming opposition to the sell-offs.

In the face of such campaigns, HATs have been forced back from estates in London, Leeds, Sandwell and Sunderland.

Strategies

The most effective fights have been in areas where tenants have joined forces with local council employees. It's been a major politicising experience for tenants to sit down with workers from DLOs and thrash out joint strategies to fight for common interests. Especially when before there's often been hostility - with tenants blaming DLO workers over delays in getting repairs done, and DLO workers getting fed up with hostile attitudes from complaining tenants.

Many Labour authorities, keen to ensure tenants votes in the coming ballots, have suddenly found money to pay for essential improvements.

Tenants and council workers can, of course, spot such cynical electioneering a mile off. But councils' attempts at short-term bribery could well back fire on them

Labour authorities -- who for reasons of self-preservation - have encouraged the growth of tenants actions groups solidly opposed to their estates being sold-off, may learn to regret their actions, when the new found mood of confidence, militancy and organisation is then turned on the council over issues like the poll tax.

As anarchists we should oppose the sale of council estates, because in 99 cases out of a 100, such sales will result in even worse conditions than exist at present.

Direct

In fighting this threat, we should welcome and wholeheartedly encourage the forging of direct links between tenants groups, rank and file council workers, the homeless, and those on waiting lists - and highlight the growing class consciousness that underlies such developments. In such organisations we should argue for the maximum direct community involvement.

But there are wider issues here.

At the heart of opposition to the Housing Act is the central question of control. Who should control the streets, flats and estates where working class people live; who should have the real say in what happens in those communities; and who should control the resources needed to enact the decisions of those communities?

When such questions are raised, the anarchist case for real direct community control - through the destruction of the capitalist system, and the evicting of all its landlords - becomes a compelling one. •

THE DARK NIGHT OF WILLI JELINEK

ZWICKAU IS AN industrial town in Saxe, in what is now East Germany, not far from Chemnitz and the Czech border.

Metal smelting factories and mines are in the close vicinity. From 1922 to March 1933 the Protelarischer Zeitgeist ("The Worker's Spirit") had been edited there.

It was a weekly, anti-authoritarian in character, which attempted to develop links between anarchists and the council communists.

In May 1945, only six survivors of the group remained alive. Twenty seven had been murdered by the Gestapo. One of the survivors, Willi Jelinek, had hidden the subscription list to Zeitgeist and now sent detailed letters to the most sure of these, with the view to reviving an organisation.

The Russians now occupying the area were pushing for a fusion of the Social-Democratic Party (SPD) and the Communist Party (KPD) to create a United Socialist Party (SED) which would be a camouflage for the Communists.

Jelinek denounced this move:

"The Communist Party plays the role of a fox who wants to calm the fears of the hare by making out that he is a vegetarian".

Reorganise

In another letter (February 1946) to anarchists he took a stand against any participation by anarchists in a socialist-communist bloc. He thought that the SPD-KPD union would be of short duration and then the anarchists would come into their own. Hence the need to reorganise the anarchist movement.

In June 1946, the Zwickau Circle - made up of old readers of Zeitgeist and union activists - was set up and sent out bulletins to anarchists in the Russian zone and in West Germany.

In Saxe, five or six groups were set up, the same number in Thuringia. Links were set up with anarchists in Hamburg, Mulheim (in the Ruhr) and Kiel.

In the factory where he worked, Jelinek had been elected by 95% of the workers as president of the workplace council and he worked the FDGB union of the Russian zone. The Communists, who had known Jelinek for a long time, thought that he had modified his ideas, but from the first meetings of the workplace council they were quickly disillusioned.

When the united SED Party was founded, the Communists called on Jelinek to leave the presidency of the council - which he refused to do. The Zwickau Circle set up a 'bureau of information' and sent out circulars exposing the insurmountable practical problems in the Russian zone: the editing of a paper, the use of a duplicator, were forbidden.

Nevertheless, they resolved to continue. They decided to forget about the anarchists who had joined the SED and address themselves to the new generation, and to the workers, showing them the nature of Stalinism. At the end of 1947, Jelinek wrote a pamphlet which was refused circulation. He denounced the dictatorship of the proletariat "which signifies the authority of the leaders. Where there is obedience, there are leaders who command". All dictatorship meant the rule of a minority. Distribution of leaflets and letters became more difficult. The police kept a constant watch on Jelinek.

Jelinek still had some illusions that the regime in the Russian zone would 'liberalise' a little, allowing for the open circulation of an anarchist paper, and he wrote that things would be better for anarchists under Ulbricht than under Hitler!

On November 10th 1948, he was arrested by two Russian officers accompanied by an interpreter and by an official of the German criminal police. His wife and 'son-in-law' were also arrested - and the latter disappeared without trace.

After a long interrogation Mrs Jelinek returned to a flat which had been completely emptied of furniture. The anarchists in the Russsian zone were summoned to a bogus meeting in Leipzig and arrested. Jelinek himself was sent to the former Nazi concentration camp at Sachsenhausen, which now housed opponents of the Communists!

He was accused of "fascist and militarist activities". The wave of arrests of November 1948 claimed 45 victims, condemned to 25 years in prison. The second wave of arrests in Spring 1949 led to the arrests of many other anarchists - 100 in Dresden alone.

Anarchists

In Sachsenhausen, Jelinek met up with other comrades and they set up a secret group. Jelinek's ration was reduced, and then because of his continued association with other anarchists, he was sent on to the concentration camp at Bautzen.

Here prisoners suffered from hunger, and many died of TB. On March 13th 1950, a revolt took place and a Commission of Russian officers, and members of the German 'people's police' promised better conditions. In fact, they became worse, and a new uprising took place on March 30th.

Jelinek managed to smuggle an appeal to West Germany on the miserable conditions of thousands of prisoners at Bautzen and Torgau. This appeal appeared in the Hamburg Echo of May 15th 1950.

For this Jelinek was rewarded by worse treatment. At the beginning of 1952, two anarchists at Bautzen died of TB. On March 20th 1952, Jelinek was still in reasonable health, when visited by his daughter. But on March 24th, he died in conditions that still remain mysterious.

The little known story of Willi Jelinek deserves to be repeated, not just for the courage of a devoted anarchist militant, but as an example of what anarchists can expect under a Communist regime. •

Industrial hardcore

THE BEATNIGS, The Beatnigs; (Alternative Tentacles).

THE FACT THAT groups like Public Enemy are getting their views across to a lot of young black Americans, highlights the disillusionment and bitterness that is spreading throughout the States. The ideas of separatism are growing amongst the urban black communities, with Louis Farahkhan as its main spokesman, and rap music as its messenger.

The Beatnigs are a black band from San Francisco and their self-titled LP was released at the end of last year. Enclosed with the album is the "aural instruction manual" through which they inform us of the importance of shortening the word "nigger" to "nig" is that it serves as a constant reminder that things have not and will not change, until we change them.

From "C.I.A." and their covert international affairs, to "a report from South Africa" where the South African government racially reclassifies those of intermediate skin colour, but "no whites applied to become black, and no blacks applied to become white".

Drugged

The recent single "Television" is an analysis of American culture where the whole nation is under the influence of one drug - T.V. It is through songs such as this that the bands humour becomes apparent -"T.V.! Is the place where self cancelling phrases like Pop Art, Fresh Frozen, and Military Intelligence have become standard".

With the use of powerful percussive patterns, interwoven with chainsaws, axle grinders, and almost any industrial hardware they can lay their hands on, The Beatnigs forge an energetic and aggressive sound. Mixed into this is a battery of sampled speeches and statistics. But unlike "most industrial bands who use metal in a nihilist way, we're taking the waste from our community and are trying to make a noise that is meaningful".

It is understandable why the ideas of separatism are growing when you think that it is unlikely that many urban young blacks come across whites except those who are in positions of authority, e.g. policemen, teachers, social workers etc. But to understand and reject ideas are two different things. In order to be revolutionary any form of organisation needs to combat capitalism and the class struggle.

Struggle

The Beatnigs, though not anarchist, recognise that installing black mayors, senators etc. will do little for the plight of blacks in America. Instead, they recognise all forms of oppression while focussing their attention on racism as this is what they have direct experience of. •

Let's wreck the Party

ONE STEP BEYOND or SMASH THE REVOLUTIONARY COMMUNIST PARTY; Pirate Press/Phoenix Press, 45p.

AS THE BACK page of this pamphlet points out, it is not intended to provide other authoritarian left groupings with something to 'gloat over' as they all carry the potential to be as harmful to revolutionary initiatives as the RCP (Revolutionary Communist Party).

In an immediate sense, however, it is necessary to deal with the RCP as an individual problem, because of their particularly destructive and demoralising effect on militants that become involved with them.

The text of the pamphlet was written in Nottingham in January 1988 as an article for Nottingham Anarchist News, at a time when the RCP were gaining members (although they have never had much political influence) in the town. They had always been a bit of a joke locally - a bunch of middle class "angry young men and women" from the Polytechnic telling an established and active political community (including many anarchists) how it really was.

Then the incidents of physical violence against women by party members increased and were actively condoned by the organisation as a whole. Their file on local potential recruits was allowed to fall into police hands, and they began to be perceived as rather more of a problem.

The RCP are not a problem politically - their theory is even less logical or consistant than most Leninist groupings, and they come across as so 'upstartish' that they will never gain the kind of influence in trade unions, local politics or campaigns that more dangerous organisations like the Workers Revolutionary Party(s) or the Stalinists do.

But the slick packaging and 'youth appeal' of the Party enables them to recruit endless 'supporters' - nearly all young students and literally work them till they drop, like some fanatical religious grouping.

The Party elite keep a tight reign on the 'supporters' indoctrinating them with the Party line, but more importantly, with the need to 'win over the working class' (you can watch them 'targetting' people they perceive to be 'working class' when they are street selling the next step. Like all Leninists they seek to destroy working class self activity and replace it with party leadership - an ideology that consistently stifled revolutionary initiatives throughout history.

The strength of the pamphlet is that it is not simply an academic expose of Leninist theory - that has been done better in other places. But it is based on first hand observation and accounts of the dangerous tactics of this arrogant political hierarchy.

Anyone who has had contact with the RCP - especially if they are 'interested' in you - should read it. •

Working class resistance

ORGANISE! IS MILES better than Virus. And the new Aims and Principles are a lot sharper too: like the article on the limits to rank and file action, it's a good kick up the arse for the syndicalists!

But now a moan. The purism of your article on Ireland really pissed me off. I reckon you just squashed the reality of the Six Counties to make it fit your "Anarchist" (Capital "A") framework. First off, you said that the last 20 years have been "twenty years of defeat for the proletariat". OK, so there been no working class revolution in Ireland, but I don't need to read Organise! to know that. I'd say that the last twenty years have been two decades in which the republican working class hasn't been defeated. Twenty years of the working class organising itself and fighting back...

Similarly, I agree that uniting Ireland without a working class revolution is a total waste of time. You rightly say that the Orange state will only be smashed by "mass, conscious struggle". What the hell do you think the Republican Movement is? Gerry Adams and a few mates in balaclavas? That's a typicaly bourgeois way of seeing history: you should be looking at the class, not the organisation...

You're right again to say that armed struggle in the abstract is elitist. But you're wrong to say it of Ireland. Armed struggle in the Six Counties occurs in the context of working class resistance to British imperialism. That resistance isn't just military., and nor it it solely organised by Sinn Fein. Where do IRA volunteers come from? Out of thin air? They come from the Republican Movement which is much wider than organisations involved in military actions. It's absolute bollocks to say that the Republican Movement is "essentially petit bourgeois". It is a working class and secular movement.

Your analysis of the Six Counties is basically too abstract to be useful. You've decided that because the Republican Movement defines itself as "nationalist" (in that it fights for a united Ireland free from British imperialism), it is therefore petit bourgeois, and can only work to the advantage of capitalism. It would have been much more interesting and useful if you had looked at the working class socialist elements in the Republican Movement, and to hell with your anarchist prejudices.

Your alternative strategy leaves a lot to be desired as well. You reckon that Loyalist workers have to be won over from Loyalism by "the building of a revolutionary, secular socialist movement". If you've learnt anything since 1969, you'll know that this is a total non-starter. Or do you imagine the Orange State will just sit by and let it happen. They'll do what they did when it happened in 1932: kill it dead. The power of Loyalism doesn't rest in the reactionary beliefs of Loyalist workers: it lies in the Orange State. If that is smashed, then the ideology of Loyalism will look like the pile of bigoted shite that it is.

AUTHOR'S REPLY: Whilst agreeing with us that uniting Ireland without a working class revolution is a non-starter, comrade Ed fails to offer us an alternative strategy for bringing this about.

S/he claims that the last 20 years have seen the working class in the Six Counties organising itself and fighting back. But does he s/he consider the campaigns - military and political - of the IRA and the Republicans to be examples of genuine self-organisation by the class, for its own interests? Surely not.

Ed's claim that the Republican Movement is "a working class and secular movement" is also at fault unless we are prepared to consider the Labour Party a working class party, simply because it contains a large percentage of workers. Because the support for Republicanism (in the North) comes from large sections of the Catholic working class, proves nothing. It is class consciousness and political (communist) ideas that defines a proletarian movement, not simply the economic backgrounds of its participants.

The Republicans are essentially petit-bourgeois in terms of politics, even if they use violent means and espouse radical views.

As far as we are concerned there is little evidence of socialism (as opposed to leftism) in the Republican Movement. Any groups(s) moving towards a libertarian communist perspective would soon have to leave the Republican camp if they were to to develop an independent, class politics.

Ed is right to say that the power of Loyalism lies in the Orange State itself, but the power to overthrow this bastion of bigotry lies in the hands of the working class of Ireland - North and South - and at least a minority of Protestant workers will have to be won to revolution to do this.

Finally I would repeat that Ed's letter doesn't offer a strategy to help bring about the destruction of the the Orange dictatorship and British imperialism. What does s/he suggest we do? Support uncritically or critically the IRA? Surely we as anarchist communists have something more positive and revolutionary to say than this? If not then we run the risk of simply tail-ending nationalism (a job best left to Trots et al) and writing off the possibility of independent working class organisation and action.

CORRECTION: A typing error slipped into the Ireland feature in the last issue - 'From imperialist war to class war'. The paragraph which started:

"The Civil Rights Movement was in no way dominated by the IRA, which has been dormant since the defeat of their 1950's campaign", should, of course, have read:

"The Civil Rights Movement was in no way dominated by the IRA which had been dormant since the defeat of their 1950's campaign". Our apologies.

Working class fightback or petit-bourgeois nationalism?

'Rank and file' debate

THE REVIEW OF the Anarchist Workers Group pamphlet In Place of Compromise and the 'rank and file action' article in Organise! 14 reveals an analysis of trade unions which is far too one dimensional.

It is borrowed from the politics of 'left-communists' who also see unions as "part of the array of ideological forces used by the State against workers". Unions, however, do not simply exist as the 5th column of capital within the working class. They exist to defend the interests of workers within capitalism, and as such they are a contradictory social phenomenon.

The contradiction is essentially between the interests of the rank and file - which are anti-capitalist - and the interests of the bureaucracy which are to maintain a permanent mediation between labour and capital.

This contradiction has during certain periods of mass struggle manifested itself as a rank-and-file revolt. The important point for anarchists in Britain, is that unions are still capable of defending the members interests to a significant extent.

This is why the Tories have abolished quangoes and abandoned the 'beer and sandwiches' of the corporatist 'Social Contract'. This is also why Thatcher spent £26,000 per miner to defeat the NUM and has built a battery of anti-union laws. Unions represent an impediment to the bosses' plans to restructure British capitalism, which in the final analysis is why anarchists should advocate a rank-and-file movement which can act independently of the bureaucracy.

The author of the article concedes that the First World War shop stewards committees could have been transformed "into workers councils and soviets thereby crippling the state" indicating their revolutionary potential. They then go on to contradict this by saying: "a steward who is a revolutionary cannot last".

True, stewards are negotiators, but it is not the act of negotiating which mysteriously corrupts. The steward's own livelihood is at stake when they are negotiating, unlike the paid official whose job and whose salary is not directly affected by their negotiation.

We are advised that anarchists "should stay in the unions" and pay their dues but should completely abstain from the struggle to control how this money is spent. This is bad logic. Why is it alright to fight for "minor, or major improvements in working conditions or wages" but wrong to fight for any improvements in union democracy? Unlike syndicalists we do not confuse democratising unions with revolutionising them. We say that if workers have the potential power to take on the capitalist state, they also have the power to exercise greater control over their own unions, and they should do so.

The author says "we should not have a set of reformist demands" but "we argue the tactics needed to win". This in effect allows the bureaucrats to determine the political content of the struggle and restricts anarchists to 'tail-ending' struggles "when the rank and file feels it is right to do it".

In reality you cannot seperate demands from tactics. If the bosses want redundancies then any demands which concedes the need for profitability will tend to lead to ineffective action.

The AWG says that rank-and-file groups should argue for demands which are based on what workers need, not what capitalism can afford. This must necessarily involve a political struggle over what they are fighting for for. To win this 'political independence' anarchist ideas must be taken into all forums where workers are organised, which means working within the existing unions "until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event".

As the Dielo Trouda group understood clearly over 60 years ago: "we must seek to exercise our theoretical influence on all trade unions and in all its forms." (Organisational Platform of Libertarian Communists)

AUTHOR'S REPLY: You say "unions are still capable of defending their members interest to a singificant extent". I'd like to know what you mean by this. You seem to be confusing the union with the members.

The most 'powerful' unions operate in industries where militancy and solidarity is relatively strong anyway. Unions may initiate token protests but this is always because the membership have forced them to do something. Most strikes, for example, begin as wildcats. Unions seek to contain strength and militancy.

It is true that the government is attacking union leaderships, but only as part of their general attack on old style business practices. The real target, as always, is the working class.

There was revolutionary potential during World War One, and the formation of the Shop Stewards Committees expressed one aspect of it. I argued that the Committees failed because they were only radical union bodies. Workers councils/soviets would have sprung up due to a generalising of the struggle, if it had taken on an insurrectional nature.Something the Committees were unable to propose.

The Movement was not revolutionary. It's not, therefore, contradictory to say: "a steward who is a revolutionary cannot last". I suggest you read Huw Beynon's Working for Ford for a useful insight into the nature of a shop steward's job.

Revolutionaries cannot accept the 'legality' of capitalism or negotiate with the bosses for a fairer form of exploitation, stewards must do this.

Why should we waste our time trying to 'democratise' the union? Rather than continually debating with the union bureaucracy, it is better to operate amongst the ordinary workers.

Controlling our struggles collectively, in all areas of life, is political. What encourages a revolution is the method of our struggles. Various union type 'demands' will not take us as far as struggles which we control, and thus have a better chance of winning. We must encourage any actions that go beyond the control of the union now, not later.

The Anarchist Workers Group obviously adheres to the theory of the 'transitional demand' - see my article for more about that kind of politics.

Lesbian and gay network

SINCE CLAUSE 28 became law it seems there has been a decline in political lesbian and gay activity. We would like to make contact with lesbians and gay men who want to continue radical political activity and fight for lesbian and gay liberation.

We know that there are many lesbians and gay men fed up with boring respectable middle class campaigns, who don't like endless meetings, and who see racism, sexism and class oppression and disability as central issues to changing society.

Despite the many faults with Stop the Clause campaign, through it we heard of, and met, lots of lesbians and gays into creative ideas and actions.

We would like to hear from lesbians and gay men (especially anarchists, greens and non-party socialists and communists) who are interested in working together and building a network, newsletter and education / campaigns.

If you're interested please write to me at the following address: c/o 24 South Road, Hockley, Birmingham, B18, West Midlands.

Labour's 'socialism'

WHILE THE ARTICLE "The Myth of Labour's 'Socialism'" was generally good, especially in the explanation of what 'labourism' really means, I think it was vague over the meaning of 'socialism'. Is the Labour Party socialist or not, and what is socialism? Is socialism a good thing or not?

You say: "The history of the Labour Party is part that of hounding, isolating and, if necessary, expelling socialists from its ranks. The purging of the Militant Tendency is just the latest phase of a long and shameful tradition".

The Labour Party is a party that supports capitalism and offers a slightly different plan for capitalism's success to, say, the Tory Party. It will of course expel extremists from its ranks, if it believes they will adversely affect its chances of electoral success and/or support from sections of the bourgeoisie.

For us, the expelling of Militant isn't 'shameful', it's about as important as, say, the expelling of the Monday Club from the Tory Party.

You're right with "Tony Benn and his brand of 'socialism'". But I feel you should have made it clear that, while Militant may be more extreme than Benn, they offer as little to the working class as both Benn and Kinnock.

At the end you say: "The constitutional road to change is blocked, only the revolutionary option remains open". What does this mean? What sort of 'change' could be got from following constitutional means if it weren't blocked? Has this road ever been unblocked? Surely the idea that we can change things in any meaningful way by constitutional means has always been a myth?

The implication of the article is that a real 'socialist' leadership of the Labour Party would mean we wouldn't have to have a revolution to achieve the changes we need. Surely some mistake?

AUTHOR'S REPLY: IN an otherwise prejudiced and ignorant article entitled "Socialism and Anarchism" (1905) Lenin managed to make one accurate observation, namely that "a wide gulf separates socialism from anarchism".

Anarchists could not agree more! I raise this point because some people have assumed that my condemnation of Labour's treatment of the Militant Tendency somehow implied approval of that organisation. (Organise! 14 - "The Myth of Labour's Socialism").

Nothing could be further from the truth. Socialism of all varieties implies state ownership, a large degree of centralisation, governments and authoritarianism. These are all rejected by anarchists. The Militant Tendency advocates all of the above, though in an ever more dogmatic and grotesque form than is usual for Leninist-Trotskyists.

However, the solving of Labour's internal political problems through the administrative means of expulsion rather than argument, shows it to be equally repugnent. The point of the article was to show that the Labour Party cannot even meet the requirements of Socialism-inadequate though they are.

Bhutto's election 'victory'?

IN THE ARTICLE entitled "Out of Reaction and Into Compromise" (Organise! 14) the writer starts off with a sincere gesture to try to put us in the picture about Pakistan's history before he talks about the future of the country.

In the second paragraph he/she states "Zulfikar Ali Bhutto came to power with the only freely elected majority in Pakistan's history". What a dispicable lie.

In the general election of December 1970, Bhutto's Pakistan Peoples' Party (PPP) won only 85 seats and Sheikh Mujib's Awami League won 167 seats! The Awami League had an absolute majority to form a governmnent. But Bhutto, a Sindhi tribal chieftain, was not going to have any of it. He had won 85 seats and less than 20% of the vote, but was all ready to 'celebrate the PPP victory'!

And during the general elections, when the Awami League had the majority to form the government, Bhutto and the Punjabi Army got cold feet because the Bengalis were going to to to create a more balanced nation - every one of the races (Baluchis, Pakhtoons, Bengalis, Punjabis, Mujahirs - Urdu speaking immigrants from India - and Sindhis) was going to have equal opportunities under Sheikh Mujibur Rahman!

They got frightened and took to killing unarmed Bengali demonstrators while the negotiations were going on between the Parties and the Army. Punjabis killed millions of innocent Bengalis and ran like cowards when faced with Mukhti Fouj ('Freedom Fighters').

Then on the 23rd of March 1970, Bengalis tore down the Pakistan flag and unfurled the flag of Bangladesh. The rest is history.

When Bengladesh was finally liberated, its whole industrial infrastructure had been destroyed. The day before the surrender, the Pakistani Army collected some 300 of the leading Bengali intellectuals and technocrats, led them to a dug-out, and shot and buried them. They did this to try to decimate the Bengali intellectual base. Unfortunately, the Pakistani murderers were not tried, unlike the Nazis and collaborators, because Bengalis did not have the clout of the Jewish and other people - an indictment on all peoples of the world, especially the Arabs.

Pakistan remains divided by hate and greed. The thing that is still holding it together is Islam, American, Arab, British and European Aid, and the Heroin Trade. (Many of the biggest Traders are in Ms Bhutto's government). When Aid and Trade come in smaller doses, Pakistan will fall like a pack of cards.

Ms Bhutto indeed has problems a plenty. The peasants who form 79% of the population will go on being hungry while the middle-classes, 2%, will build larger houses or do their shopping in Harrods with aid and heroin money, or the money earned by the poor Pakistani guest-workers in the Middle East or Europe. Pakistan, which has the lowest literacy rate in Asia, will go on being illiterate. What can be done?

For a start, don't pretend that Bhutto came to power with a majority in the elections in 1970 because - it is a lie (what are the author's motives for promoting it?). Commemorate the murder of millions of Bengalis and rape of mothers, daughters and children. Examine why there is so much racial and religious hatred and envy.

Most of all work to eradicate the class which benefits from keeping 80% of the people illiterate, ignorant and hungry. Get rid of the Islamic facade and kiss Pakistan goodbye! (*)

AUTHOR'S REPLY: TRUE it is incorrect to say that Bhutto achieved an elected majority in 1970. I am sensible enough to admit to my mistake in stating such in that article.

I wholeheartedly agree that Pakistan has always suffered under a mainly Punjabi oligarchy, the most seriously exploited and oppressed being the Bengali population prior to the creation of Bangladesh.

The attrocities of the West Pakistani forces during the war of cecession are well known: countless killed, maimed, raped, industries destroyed, etc. I most certainly do not want to dismiss or try to ignore the murder of Bengalis, nor was there any 'motive' behind my genuine mistake.

I should like to see the whole of Asia free: free from the Bhuttos, Ershads, Ghandis, Zias and all the rest; free from all the landlords, exploiting bosses and murdering military and police.

What motive could there be for supporting any Bhutto? The Bhuttos have always been and always will be the symbol of exploitation under a "democratic" facade.

At present Benazir is doing nothing for the poor. The military and the 22 families continue to hold the power familiar to them. She is just a more "acceptable" face of exploitation and oppression, a sop to the wounds of the Pakistani poor, a continuing tool of U.S. imperialism, the landlords, and the rich of commerce and industry.

WE HAVE BEEN unable to include all the letters we have recieved in this issue, but we hope to be able to print them in the next one. If you could keep letters to about 250 word they will stand more chance of getting printed because we don't like having to edit them.

Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To acheive our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in the face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide, and economic and political colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class.

We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist communist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

4. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to acheive anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

5. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part in its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions, however, are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism.

The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to acheive a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours, so it is vital that we organise ourselves collectively.

The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we many acheive today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never acheive this, although rank-and-file initiatives may strengthen us for the battle for communism.

6. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creation of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

7. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called 'socialists' or 'communists' we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.●

IN THE NEXT ISSUE OF ORGANISE!:

* HOMEWORKING: We examine the growth in Britain, of an army of manufacturing workers, employed in their own homes, and we discuss the implications this has on traditional ideas of 'workplace organisation'.

* INSIDE THE I.M.F.: Who is in control of the International Monetary Fund, and how does it 'intervene' in the interests of world capitalism? What kinds of resistance are working class people waging against it, around the globe?

Dockers prepare for battle

A FEW MONTHS ago, Transport and General Workers Union (TGWU) boss Ron Todd was being dismissed aa a "dinosaur".

He was slammed for being resistant to change, blind to economic realities, and for being unable to cope with a new era in industrial relations.

But in the days immediately following the government's announcement that they planned to scrap the hard-fought-for National Dock Labour Scheme, all that changed.

Union

Todd found himself winning the praises of both Labour and Tory front benches for his handling of the dockers' angry reaction to the news.

Shadow Employment Secretary Michael Meacher applauded Todd's "responsibility, courage and restraint". Former Tory minister Michael Heseltine echoed these sentiments, adding that "we should welcome Todd's calming influence on events".

Dockers have long realised that an attack on the NDLS was inevitable. With the government determined to abolish "restrictive working practices" as part of its attempt to overhaul the British economy, it was simply a matter of time before attention was turned on the registered dockers.

As dockers in ports throughout the country responded to the news by staging immediate stoppages and walk-outs, most confidently expected the issuing of a national strike call within days to defend the scheme.

But the leadership of the TGWU had other ideas.

Todd stepped in to reassert union control over events, by endorsing the unofficial action and immediately ordering strikers back to work, promising that a national dock strike would follow an immediate ballot.

Having successfully suffocated the strike action, Todd won the backing of the Executive to postpone a ballot while he sought talks with the Port Employers, aimed at seeking an agreement "at least as favourable" as the existing NDLS.

This was a clear admission that the fight to save the Scheme had already been abandoned, and that the union was now looking to salvage what it could from the wreckage.

The Port Employers seemed genuinely surprised that this first round in the battle had been won so easily. They readily agreed to open-ended talks with the TGWU's negotiating team, hoping to string the union out for several decisive weeks, allowing confusion and despondancy to spread throughout the docks.

In typical form, the Left decried this "sell-out" denouncing Todd's "capitulation", "backsliding" and "refusal to lead a fight".

In fact, Todd performed remarkably well in defending the union's interests. The mistaken belief that Todd had "sold-out" only makes sense if we equate the interests of the union with the interests of the workers.

From the start, the objectives of the dockers and of the union were at odds. The dockers concerns are to protect their jobs and defend their working conditions. They realise that scrapping the NDLS would herald a whole host of other attacks.

The union's fear is in losing a stable and secure arrangement with management, that weakens their mediating leverage and weakens their negotiating role. The union's real concern is to protect their "right to be consulted" over management reforms.

Any action that may be illegal could invite sequestration or punitive fines—threatening the union's existence. And because (as former TUC boss Lord Murray once observed) the first job of a union is to protect itself, it's in the union's own interest to police its membership and sabotage effective and illegal independent action.

It is for that reason—and not because of some abstract "cowardice"—that, if oa ballot over strike action is held in the coming weeks, the TGWU will only involve the 9,500 dockers covered by the scheme, will not sanction mass picketting, and will try to stamp out any attempts to spread the action to unregistered ports.

The difficulty the Laboour Party bureaucracy faces in offering even token "support" to the dockers struggle. is that they agree that scrapping the NDLS makes sound economic sense. As 1992 and the Single European Market approaches, British industry needs to push down port costs and remove obstacles to the flexible management of the workforce, if it is to compete efficiently in the international market place.

Mealy-mouthed Meacher admitted that a future Labour government would not reinstate the Scheme, but would examine the "new realities" in work practices in the docks.

Kinnock took issue, not with the theat to dockers jobs, but to the confrontational manner in which the Tories announced their plans. "Their are far better ways to acheive the necessary changes", he said, "than by provoking the dockers".

A Port Employers' secret strike-plan leaked to the press details the preparations they have made to weather what they describe as an "inevitable" strike". They count on action lasting a maximum of six weeks; and on the 35 non-Scheme ports—which currently handle around 30% of the total volume of trade —working normally.

Trade

They admit that if the strike were to last longer than eight weeks, or, if the non-Scheme ports or rail and road haulage networks were affected, it would "quickly start to bite". Priority-lists of goods essential to industry have already been drawn up, including plans to "maintain an adequate supply of newsprint" to ensure no interruption in the media propaganda war that would be waged against striking dockers.

The rank and file dockers attempts to defend working conditions must be supported by active solidarity in all areas. The role the TGWU plays in keeping the lid on initiatives it doesn't control will prove once again the need for a revolutionary alternative to fighting the State by its own rules. •

SADLY WE CAN'T report a repeat of our first successful Press Fund appeal.

That brought in an amazing response, easily taking us past our initial £250 target.

But this time, as our July 20th deadline past, we'd had in less than £100 - not even taking us half way there.

Our thanks go to all those readers, subscribers and supporters who did send in donations - the money will go straight towards meeting our production, printing and postage costs.

But this makes it all the more important that we reach the next £250 target with this August-October issue. Especially because - as you can see - we've four extra pages in this issue, to allow space for all the features we wanted to include.

If you think Organise! - and other ACF publications - are worth supporting, please make a donation to our press appeal. We can't consider publishing a larger, or more frequent, Organise! without such extra financial support.

Please send all donations as soon as possible to: ACF Press Fund, Box 1, Hiziki, 15 Goosegate, Hockely, Nottingham NG1. We need to reach our target by October 20th. Let's go to it!

An upsurge of action

A WAVE OF industrial action has hit Britain with recent strikes by railway, underground, local council, BBC, dock and oil rig workers.

The strength and solidarity of much of the action has been impressive and inspiring.

But despite the upsurge in strike activity, there are few signs as yet of the isolated, sectional disputes being forged into a more generalised struggle.

This is all the more frustrating at present when practically all the disputes currently being waged are over identical issues :

* pay offers below the rate of inflation - in effect pay cuts.

* the breaking up of national agreements over bargaining and conditions - to divide and isolate workers in the same industries.

* the introduction of flexible work patterns and the ending of traditional job demarcation lines.

But despite the lack of co-ordination and unity, there have been some very encouraging developments.

Unofficial action by tube and oil rig workers has clearly shown workers' ability to by-pass the union and really hit the employers.

Unofficial

Tube workers saw clearly that the best way to maximize the impact of their strike action against the 'Action Stations' plan, and link up with the struggles of train drivers, was to come out on the same day - paralysing London's transport network. London bus crews - involved in a 'seperate dispute' - joined the action, until a quick settlement by their union put an end to such unity.

Despite their union's attempt to keep the two group of workers isolated, an unofficial strike committee was able to bring the tube network to a near total standstill time and again.

On the oil rigs in recent months there have been a whole series of strikes, occupations and sit-ins on the platforms - much of it organised outside the off-shore unions - who even now only represent a minority of platform workers. Sub-contracted construction workers - not traditionally seen as a militant group - have been in the forefront of the action.

Sparked

An unofficial Offshore Industries Liasion (OIL) committee, has co-ordinated most of the strikes, many have which have been sparked off on one rig, and spread - through radio calls for solidarity - to other rigs in the field.

The exact nature of the OIL committee is difficult to work out at this stage. It is clearly an attempt to go beyond the sectional divisions of specific trade unions, and unite all workers in the field around common demands for better safety, higher wages, etc.

But whether it sees itself as an action-based, open workers' organisation (instead of a union) or as a temporary stop-gap, treading water while "real" workers' organisations - ie trade unions - are built, isn't clear.

Oil workers who for years were ignored by the traditional trade unions, must push for the rank and file strike committees not to be submerged into union structures.

On the docks, attempts by the rank and file to get industrial action underway before the abolition of the National Dock Labour Scheme, were repeatedly sabotaged by Todd's officials who ordered ports - particularly non-scheme ports - to keep working normally because the dispute was "nothing to do with them".

The endless delays over court action, and 'talks about talks' to negotiate a replacement scheme, allowed the employers time to launch a counter-offensive - including an 11th-hour offer of massive redundancy payments, that drew 1400 away from the strike, and deepened the demoralisation of the remaining dockers.

With the official strike now at last underway, there seem few signs as yet of dockers willing to ignore Todd's orders to 'stay put' at their ports and spread the action through flying pickets.

The upsurge in action - particularly the unofficial action - has rattled the Tories, who've announced plans for a new battery of anti-worker legislation.

The proposals include:

* Making unions liable for the actions of their members: official or unofficial - to ensure that unions police wildcat action more effectively.

* Introducing a compulsory "cooling off" period after a successful strike ballot, before any action can be taken. (This is something the unions could easily support - allowing them more time for 'negotiation' before having to use the 'last resort' of industrial action).

* the outlawing of strikes in 'essential services'.

As the Tories intensify their attacks, our response must be to unify the struggles and fight on generalised class demands. We need to overcome the divisions of trade, union and workplace and forge solidarity between groups of workers.

In supporting those struggles we must continually highlight the divergence of interest between the union and the workers, and show that successful action is built despite, not because of, trade unionism.●

Poles apart

WHILE THE CHINESE authorities have unleashed the military beast on students and workers, their Polish colleagues have resorted to a more subtle - and perhaps more effective - means of spiking the opposition.

Adam Michnik, editor of Solidarity's daily paper, is now calling for the opposition union to form the next government, in return for which it should support the Communist Party's candidate for President.

This is likely to be General Kiszczak, Minister of the Interior and head of the secret police. Solidarity leader Lech Walesa, the Papal hand-kisser, supports his candidacy too.

During the seven years since General Jaruzelski installed a state of emergency, a section of Solidarity has allied with the so-called 'reforming wing' of the Communist Party to form a 'centrist' group to push for co-government between the Party and sections of Solidarity.

The 'Communists' have agreed to this not out of liberalism, but because they hope to gain from such concessions. The 'Communist' system (read state capitalist) not only in Poland, but throughout the Eastern Bloc is going through a deep economic and technological crisis. The 'Communist' leaderships have taken the decision to give the opposition some 'rights' in exchange for an acceptance of the regime and the guarantee that the opposition won't threaten economic interests.

This 'constructive' opposition in Solidarity will be given the task of replacing the present 'Communist' propaganda - now totally discredited - with a 'propaganda of opposition' which will attempt to persuade the working class not to defend its own interests for the sake of the 'national good'.

During the seven years of Jaruzelski, the 'constructive' group proclaimed itself the leadership of Solidarity, whilst ignoring working class interests. As a result a group in opposition to Walesa and the 'constructives' emerged, known as the Group of Labour.

It is not a united group, and includes those who support Christian-Democrat (conservative) positions and those who could be described as trade unionists and syndicalists.

Typical

This is typical of Solidarity, which from the start saw itself as an organisation of multiple views. In meetings and assemblies - both at the factory level and in the national commission - wide differences of opinion were to be found, often bitter and sometimes violent. No one group or point of view has a majority and therefore no-one can be considered as speaking for Solidarity as a whole.

Walesa has attempted to override this state of affairs, accusing those in Solidarity who disagree with him of being agents for the regime, of having no experience of struggle, or of fleeing abroad when the state of emergency was announced.

In autumn 1988, Walesa forbid any public announcements by the Group of Labour. In a televised debate with the leader of the official unions OPZZ he stated that Solidarity was ready to make sacrifices and to 'roll up its sleeves'.

In other words, he accepted work speed-ups and longer work-hours, a fall in the standard of living, and further price rises.

Since the state of emergency, all of the national bodies of Solidarity, the Provisional Council (TRS) and the executive national commission (KKW) which up to then were elected posts became nominated positions - contrary to Solidarity's statutes.

These moves by Walesa and his group were supported by the radio stations funded by the United States and their allies. Interviews given by the Group of Labour to US journalists were sent first to the KKW for approval, before they could be broadcast.

The 'constructive' group is now being seen more and more clearly by many Polish working people as a group that has betrayed the interests it set itself to defend. Walesa's group will attempt to create unions no different from the official unions OPZZ. Many of those workers who ignored the OPZZ, are certain to give the new ones a wide berth. Walesa may succeed in creating these unions from above, but with few members.

Anarchism

However, it is not enough to defend the immediate day-to-day interests of the working class. The Group of Labour has no shared political outlook, and this highlights the deep crisis of ideas that now exists in Poland.

Ideas that challenge the whole foundation of the Polish system, which reject both market and state capitalism, have to be developed.

Already, the Polish anarchist movement, destroyed in the turmoil of the 30s and 40s has re-emerged, and is beginning to grow.

This is a good omen for the construction of a mass movement that will reject both the Walesa group and the 'Communist' government, and move towards the goal of a new society.●

*NEXT ISSUE: We examine the emerging anarchist movements in Poland, Hungary and the USSR.

POLL TAX

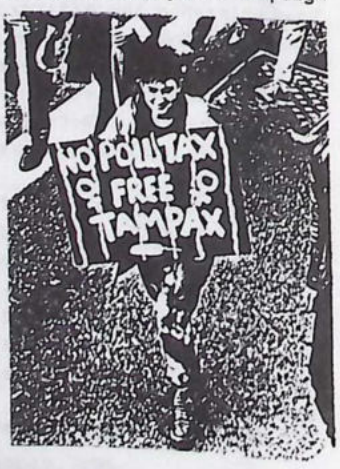
Mass non-payment takes off

HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS of ordinary working class people are still flatly refusing to pay their first poll tax demands - over three months after the bills were sent out.

Though patchy and uneven, a mass country-wide campaign of non-payment has been built in Scotland, through the work of anti-poll tax unions. The months ahead now promise a fierce battle between an increasingly confident and independent working class campaign and the labour authorities who control nearly all Scotland's local councils.

The arrival or registration forms on doormats throughout England and Wales, has, in many areas, acted as a catalyst to kick local campaigns into action - giving a sense of urgency and impetus to the struggle.

The exact strength of the Scottish non-payment campaign is difficult to gauge at this stage - largely because in region after region the poll tax colection machinery is in chaos, with tens of thousands of 'payment books' yet be be posted, and people waiting over four months for the rebate applications to be processed. The struggle to frustrate registration has compounded the councils' problems - with many regions unable to claim that they have even a roughly accurate working list of those liable to pay. Stories abound of babies, children and the long deceased receiving demands for payment.



David Conley, Glasgow council's director of housing, has conceded that until "the basic administration is in place, we can't even consider action against non-payers". Strathclyde region is "because of the problems that have bedevilled us - nowhere near being able to give figures for those who are refusing to pay".

A secret Lothian regional council memo shows the extent of concern in local authorities over the non-payment campaign. They fully expect to have to take 100,000 people (out of a total of 680,000) to court to try to enforce payment.

In the best organised areas, bailiffs are being sent away empty handed from the homes of working class families - by anti-poll tax 'reception committees' who physically prevent the seizure

'Don't abandon the streets!'

The Friends of Durruti, and the events of May 1937 in Barcelona

"Over the Telephone exchange the Anarchist Flag had been hauled down and only the Catalan flag was flying.
That meant that the workers were definitely beaten."

- George Orwell
Homage to Catalonia

THE EVENTS OF May 1937 in Barcelona, during the Spanish revolution, were sparked off by an attack on the central telephone exchange in the town, controlled by a joint committee of the CNT (the Anarcho-syndicalist union) and the UGT (the socialist union).

The attack was led by the Commmunist police commissioners at the head of Assault Guards. The reason given for the attack was that the CNT listened in on all conversations between the Catalan regional government, the Catalan Generalitat, and abroad.

In response, barricades went up, and rank and file members of the POUM (the anti-Stalinist communists who had split with Trotsky in 1934) fought alongside anarchist workers against the forces of the PSUC and the Generalitat. The CNT-FAI leadership, far from supporting resistance to what appeared to Catalan workers to be a provocation, called for a laying down of arms. The revolutionary Friends of Durruti group called for resistance to the Stalinist provocation, and the setting up of revolutionary councils. Five hundred dead and a thousand wounded resulted from the five days of fighting. It has been seen as the beginning of the end for the social revolution developing in Catalonia and Aragon.

In works detailing the events of May 1937 the Friends of Durruti appear again and again. Yet very often little description of their numbers, influence or political platform is given.

For example, in Peirats' history of Spanish anarchism we read: "The relative unimportance of its members, POUM participation, and the marxist flavour of some of its communiques, all served to dilute the real influence of the 'Friends of Durruti'"(1). Thomas (2) (a right-wing bourgeois historian), in a footnote calls them: "bolshevik-anarchists, in the sense that they wanted to capture power, not the dissolution of the state. They were Leninists without being Marxists, if that is possible."

Charges

Apart from the charges of marginalisation, unconscious Leninism with a flavour of Marxism, we must consider other allegations - that they were led by the Italian anarchist Berneri; that they were Stalinist agents (according to the CNT leadership); and that they were fascist agents (according to the communist parties). We must also examine the views of Morrow (a supporter of the Trotskyist Fourth International), who implies that there was a working relationship between the Friends of Durruti and the Bolshevik-Leninists, Spanish section of the Trotskyist Fourth International.

Sometimes there is the distinct impression in the pages of Morrow that the Bolshevik-Leninists were in the vanguard, dragging the Friends of Durruti behind them in the May actions (3). This view is echoed in other Trotskyist publications. To give Morrow his due, the book is one of the view that attaches any importance to the Friends of Durruti group.

Vernon Richards, an anarchist strongly critical of CNT participation in the Republican government was also to question the marginalisation of the Friends of Durruti. He cites Peirats himself contradicting the above-quoted passage in another work (4). Peirats here talks about "an important section of opinion" in opposition to the CNT leadership, at the head of whom were the 'Friends of Durruti'".

He describes this group as based on elements who were hostile to militarisation of the militias (where the revolutionary self-discipline and abscence of hierarchy was being replaced by rigid officer/soldier ranks, and hierarchical discipline), many of whom left the units of the newly-formed Popular Army when then voluntary militias were dissolved.

Devotes

Richards notes that it is "especially regretted that to this 'important section of opinion' the historiographer of the CNT devotes but eighteen lines" (5).

It does seem surprising that very little has been written on the Friends of Durruti if indeed they were at the head of an important section of opinion.

Recent publications have thrown some light on this shadowy group. A recent translation (6) of a Friends of Durruti manifesto reveals the aims of the group. This Manifesto was published clandestinely in mid-1938, a year after the May days.

It identifies itself as the authentic voice of the CNT rank and file and counters allegation of provocation:

"They labelled us agents provocateurs because we demanded that provocateurs be shot, that the armed forces be disbanded, that political parties who had armed the provocation be surpressed, and also that a revolutionary junta be established, to press on with the socialisation of the economy and to claim all economic power for the unions". (7)

It called for a further revolution that:

"Would bring urban and rural workers complete satisfaction."

It talks of the death of Nin - the POUM leader - believed murdered by the communist secret police, at a time of general silence on the subject.

Apart from the Friends of Durruti Manifesto, translations of important extracts from their paper El Amigo del Pueblo ("The Friend of the People") have appeared in French. And, surprisingly, some correspondence with a Scottish revolutionary group during 1937-38 has again seen the light of day.

Militant

The Friends of Durruti seem to have been made up of predominantly younger members of the CNT and FAI (the Iberian Anarchist Federation, formed to defend anarchism within the CNT and numbering 30,000 members in 1936). One leading light was an editor of El Amigo del Pueblo, Jaime Balius, who had come into the libertarian movement during the Primo de Rivera dictatorship. Others were: the libertarian youth militant Santano Calero; Carreno and Ruiz - close collaborators of the dead anarchist militant Durruti; and Ponciano Alonso - a writer of the Republican assault guards sent to crush the May rebellion.

"novels of the idea" popular in CNT-FAI circles before 1936.

Peirats' admission that many of the Friends were militants from the Durruti Column is backed up by a statement by Balius to Fraser (8) (a British communist historian) in 1976, where he says that the group was formed of members of the Durruti Column who had returned to Barcelona - with their arms - to protest against the militarisation decrees.

It seems unlikely with these pedigrees that the Friends of Durruti were either fascists or stalinist provocateurs.

One other major allegation - that the group was small and had little effect - has been examined. Balius himself claimed that the group has the support of the CNT-FAI grassroots, and of many of the anarchist militia on the Aragon front (9).

Chueca, prominent in the Council of Aragon, and Jover, one of the militia column leaders, are recorded as having made donations to El Amigo del Pueblo, as did groups like the "X Group" on the Aragon front (10). Peirats himself - perhaps a little reluctantly - seems to admit a certain amount of support.

Another allegation makes out the Friends of Durruti to be a small group. Balius estimates membership at between 4,000 - 5,000 (11). This is the only solid figure that we have. Definitions of 'small' may vary, but if the figure is to be believed, such a number of militants concentrated mainly in Barcelona could have a decisive effect on events.

Attacked

The POUM member Wilebaldo Solano (12) admits that it was the Friends of Durruti who had "mobilised the people when the Telefonica was attacked, it was they who had the arms and were first to man the barricades."

In the course of the May Days they published a leaflet and a manifesto that appears to have been warmly welcomed by the workers (13). The text of the leaflet is terse - dictated by the critical situation:

"CNT-FAI. Friends of Durruti Group. Workers. Don't abandon the street. Revolutionary Junta. Execution of those responsible. Disarming of the armed forces. Socialisation of the economy. Dissolving of the political parties who have attacked the working class. We salute the POUM comrades who have fraternised with us in the street. Long live the Social Revolution."

It can be seen from the above, and by many statements in their leaflets and paper, that the Friends saw themselves as an oppositional current within the CNT-FAI, loyal to the organisations, but hostile to the vacillations and compromises of leading members. For example in Number 3 of the paper, in bold letters:

"The Friends of Durruti association is made up of militants of the CNT and FAI. Only the union assemblies can expel us from the Confederal organisation. The meetings of delegates of local and cantonal organisation do not have the power to exclude a comrade. We demand that the committees pose the question of the 'Friends of Durruti' in the assemblies, there, where lies the sovereignty of the organisation." (14)

What should be made of the allegation that 'POUM participation' neutralised the position of the Friends, and in the process assimilated them to 'Trotskyism' in the eyes of the CNT 'leadership'?

The allegations that the POUM was Trotskyist have been dealt with in detail (and discounted) in most current works on the Spanish Civil War. The POUM rank and file had come out onto the barricades, and won the respect of the Friends. Up till then "relations with the POUM had been notably cool". (15)

The POUM leadership had no confidence in the Friends and acted in the same way as the CNT-FAI leadership in demobilising the workers.

Some Trotskyists have attempted to use the allegation that the Friends of Durruti were Trotskyist to maintain that indeed there were close links between them and the Bolshevik-Leninists, and that the Friends were evolving towards Trotskyism.

Morrow attempts this in his book, when he talks about the relations of the Trotskyist militants Moulin and Franz Heller with the Friends. (16)

In Number 10 of Cahiers Leon Trotsky (published by the French Institut du Leon Trotsky) a study by F. M. Arando has appeared on the Friends of Durruti, attempting to show close collaboration. The sole tangible evidence, however, is that several 'Friends of Durruti' (unnamed) met with one Trotskyist, the German Hans Davis Freund, known under the pseudonym of Moulin. Nothing is said about this meeting. In the same edition (p82) Pierre Broue (author with Temime of a major work on the Civil War and Revolution) admits that the Friends turned down a meeting to discuss common action. Morrow seems to exagerate the importance of the Bolshevik-Leninists, when estimates of their numbers range from as few as six, to as many as twenty.

Having established that there were few real contacts between the Trotskyists and the Friends, we have to deal with 'the Marxist flavour' of Peirats, and the 'unconcious Leninism' of Thomas. These statements seem to be based on the advancement of the concept of the 'Revolutionary Junta'.

Masses

Junta - a word of Spanish origin - has connotations of military dictatorship in English. In Spanish, there are other meanings. 'Junta' is used by libertarians to imply a revolutionary committee under the control of the masses.

What the Friends are saying, in fact, is that bourgeois power must be smashed. They talk of the "crushing" of "social-democratic centralism" (17) in Number 5 of their paper, and in Number 4 of the abolition of hierarchies, and finally, in Number 7 we can find the statement that:

"The state machine suffocates and ends up by creating new promotions of the privileged..."

Hardly a Leninist viewpoint, and Marxists, with their 'blind spot' on the role of the State, are rarely seen to take such a critical view.

Balius (18) clarifies that position of the Friends:

"We did not support the formation of the Soviets: there were no grounds in Spain for calling for such. We stood for 'all power to the trade unions'. In no way were we politically oriented. The junta was simply a way out, a revolutionary formula to save the revolutionary conquests of July 1936. We were unable to exercise great influence because the Stalinists, helped by the CNT and FAI reformists, undertook their counter-revolutionary aggression so rapidly. Ours was solely an attempt to save the revolution; at an historical level it can be compared to Kronstadt because if there the sailors called for 'all power to the Soviets', we were calling for 'all power to the unions'."

Statist

Balius uses 'political' to mean parliamentarian, and statist - a common anarchist understanding of the word.

One final allegation was that the Friends were led by Camillo Berneri, a gifted Italian anarchist in exile. This was alleged by the Communists (as, for example, in Grido del Popolo, the Italian Communist paper). Berneri by his own admission adopted a 'centrist' position between the Friends and the CNT leadership, and was never a member of the Friends - though the latter did publish his thesis against militarisation.

The Friends of Durruti, it would appear, were authentic rank and file militants of the CNT-FAI seeking a way out of the dilemmas posed by militarisation and the attacks of the Communists and the bourgeois Republicans. They appear to have had a significant role in mobilsing workers during the May Days, though their influence was far from strong enough to counter that of the CNT-FAI leadership.

They were willing to accept the POUM rank and file as allies, as the result of practical solidarity on the barricades.

The charges that they were marginal, too closely tied to the POUM, were Stalinist or Fascist provocateurs, were Leninists or Marxist, are either the result of lack of information, or a wilful misinterpretation by Trotskyists or Stalinists, or those who seek to defend the reformist CNT leadership.

The Friends of Durruti were a brave attempt to reassert and defend the gains made by the Spanish revolution, and represent an important episode in the history of revolutionary anarchism.

The Spanish libertarian movement, faithful to certain aspects of Bakuninism, but infiltrated by moral and cultural notions closer to liberal humanism than revolutionary analysis, had not totally ignored anarchism outside Spain. But fixed on its traditional anarchist credo, it hardly took account of ideas developing in the international movement.

In this context, the Friends of Durruti, from the first day caught up in the revolutionary struggle, made a bold attempt to break with the dead weight of the past.

But it was too late, and the development of their ideas was to end with the crushing of the Spanish revolution. They had not broken with the revolutionary romanticism that gripped the Spanish movement, nor with a hero-cult towards Durruti.

They had a pronounced taste for simplification common in the Spanish movement. Also, we would now criticise them for attempting to base libertarian communism upon a syndicalist form.

Though they talked about the setting up of revolutionary councils this was too often confused with the anarcho-syndicalist unions, and they were unable to go beyond the extreme-left of anarcho-syndicalism.

Even as regards the construction of a specific anarchist organisation they stuck to the old conspiritorial and romantic ideas of the FAI of 1927, and though they rejected the new FAI structures of 1937 - which led to the dilution of the anarchist organisation - they were only able to offer the small 'affinity group' as an alternative.

On the other hand, they saw that the War could not be won without the strengthening of the revolution, unlike the CNT-FAI leadership who put the War before the revolution.

They saw the immediate need to destroy the state apparatus and replace it with working class organisation. They defended the importance of class analysis, and denounced the theoretical confusion and improvisation that was also common in the Spanish movement.•

HOMEWORKERS:
An invisible workforce

"DUST, DUST AND more dust. That was the story of my life working as an overlocker. All over the walls and floors, and in the cupboards. It's amazing where it used to get to.

I remember well how my lungs used to ache. I never knew if it was all the dust I was inhaling, or the stooped position I sat in for hours on end. The pay was appalling too! The whole thing was hellish."

This Leicestershire hosiery worker isn't describing the nightmarish condiitions she endured slaving in some dingy, back-street sweat shop. She's talking about conditions she was forced to put up with working in her own front room - as one of the growing army of homeworkers: an invisible workforce whose numbers have swelled to over a million in the last decade in the UK.

Her story of low-pay and ill-health is typical of the experiences of tens of thousands of working class women all over the country who are now working from home.

Increase

Their numbers are set to increase still further, as more and more firms look to 'homeworking' (or 'outworking' as it it is also refered to) as an alternative to traditional factory-based production.

Many kinds of simple manufacturing, assembly and packing work can easily be farmed out to homeworkers - particularly 'unskilled' and 'semi-skilled' work, that doesn't require complex machinery.

Homeworkers produce clothing, toys, household furnishings, cleaning materials, fireworks, shoes. They stuff and address envelopes, pack catalogues, peel and prepare vegetables. Without exception, homeworkers work on 'piece rates' - only being paid for what they produce, and the rates, of course, are appalling.

The Hussain family from Yorkshire were paid between £3 and £5 for packing 1000 greetings cards. It took the family of four more than an hour to pack the first 1000. "We did about four days works, spending every evening on the packing. We earned about £29 in all - for the four of us".

Such stories are typical: Saroj from Birmingham sews pockets on trousers for 90p a pair - she works 56 hours per week for around £20-25. Fatima, from the East End of London, was paid 45p for sewing a skirt, that later sold in Top Shop for £10. Another worker earned £8.50 for 35 hours work knitting a jumper that was to retail at £80.

It's not hard to see the advantages homeworking offers the bosses.

First, there are the obvious savings on factory costs - from rent and heat, to providing a canteen, to meeting health and safety requirements.

Secondly , and more importantly, homeworking breaks up what would otherwise be a mass workforce, centralised in a few factories, into hundreds of seperate, isolated, individual workers.

Through atomizing the workforce in this way, homeworking hampers the ability of workers to join forces to fight for common interests.

When workers are gathered together under the same factory roof, they have the ability to take direct collective action at the point of production. Homeworkers - scattered and invisible even to each other - do not.

Co-workers

Hundreds of homeworkers living in the same town, will, initially, be unaware even of how many other workers are employed by the same company locally, doing identical work. They will have no idea if the terms and conditions they work under are the same as co-workers in neighbouring streets. And they won't know whether attacks on those working conditions are general to the

IMF: Imperialist Masters of Finance

EARLIER THIS YEAR Venezuala erupted. People took to the streets, armed and unarmed, to engage in "IMF" riots. This is not a new form of activity, but one practised almost everywhere the International Monetary Fund (IMF) has used its knife. 300 were killed, and 2000 injured when the poor engaged, effectively, in civil war against uncivil price rises. Increases of 90% on petrol, and 30% on bus fares rightly angered people where, even after wage rises forced by the riots, the minumum wage is £60 a month.

As always, it is the workers who are being forced to pay. As one angry student asked of the loans being negotiated by the government : why should we pay for things we never saw or enjoyed? As supermarkets were being stripped by mothers, they stated a simple fact : our children have to eat.

Debt

Venezuala has about £19 billion in foreign debt. The last President left the treasury devoid of foreign currency. A $3.4 billion IMF loan has been agreed with strict conditions - price rises and financial controls being among them. In other words, the poor will get poorer.

Prior to the price rises their income had already lost around a fifth of its value over the preceeding decade. Paying foreign debts means less food for the poor because government subsidies disappear under the IMF knife.

The whole of Latin America is teetering on the edge. $30 billion flows from the region to the "advanced capitalist" countries each year. In other words, the poor are paying for the privilege of that poverty.

We have seen the spectacle of food riots in Argentina - the poor are going hungry, raiding supermarkets to feed themselves and their families in the face of huge inflation. Brazil is facing the same problem, with inflation running at 100%, and those at the bottom left to live as best they can scavenging or starving in the shanty towns.

Inflation is truly a disease - a disease of capital - the victims being the poor, those who receive the IMF "cure" for the well-being of the "needy" boss and middle classes.

Late in April, Jordan also saw the outbreak of IMF riots. Unusually, the rioters were not from the 65% Palestinian population. Price rises of 15-50% demanded by the IMF were the cause. The result was simply the sacking of the Prime Minister, not an attack upon the root causes of the problem.

The root of the problem is that the Hashemite rulers have ridden the easy road by using Saudi aid given because Jordan is a frontline state against Israel, and they have used this for their own wealth and power, not for any for any real benefit for the people.

Now King Hussein has cut his support for the Palestinians, both inside and outside of the present borders, and the price has to be paid. The price is austerity for the poor, and wealth and security for the rich.

We know how the poor of these countries oppose the IMF and the World Bank. They fight the Governments who impose IMF rules. They take what they can when they can. But what of Europe ?

Berlin

Berlin, 1988 : 140 finance ministers, 10,000 delegates of banks, industries, managers, plus wives and bodyguards - 20,000 in all - met to discuss their profit in the "Third World". 14,000 members of the security forces mobilised to protect them.

Alongside this a counter-conference was organised on the 23rd-25th of September. 3000 people attended, many of them reformists, and some attended from the "Third World". Whilst there are plenty in left and liberal circles who argue for a New International Economic Order, the counter-conference realised that it is necessary to go further.

Consequently there were calls not just for the scrapping of the debt, but also for a change in the economic relations in the world, and for the payment of reparations to the "Third World". They realised that it will be necessary to break the hold of the imperialist centre (USA, EEC, Japan) over the world economy, and the need for social upheavals in these centres.

The counter-conference, however, was unfortunately limited, being accessible only to those who could afford the £7 fee, and could afford to travel to Berlin. There was a lone voice for the reform of the World Bank, but the most radical voices were heard from those areas most affected by IMF policies.

Many went beyond the organisers' limitations, and called for imaginative direct action, the destruction of exploitation and oppression, and not just for a simple and limited discussion.

* Women demonstrated against the restriction of their being limited to taking only part time work in the "Third World".

* There was a demonstration in front of a pharmaceutical group's HQ against their involvement in "Third World" birth control and genetic research.

* Bankers were harrassed as they went to "work".

* 8000 people demonstrated as internationalists, on the principle that the division of the world is not between "Third World" and "advanced" countries, but really between the upper and lower classes throughout the whole world.

* 80,000 people demonstrated against the IMF conference on the 25th, in solidarity with Palestinians, Kanaks, Phillipinos, South Koreans etc.

* There was much street-theatre, street games and music.

The basis for all these oppositional events was a call not for the gradual change of a system which is unjust in part of its activities, but for the destruction of the whole system. A system which is by its very nature supporting and nourishing the exploitation of the many by the few.

Together

The call was, and still is, for the creation of a movement to unite the forces of the poor throughout the world against their esentially racist exploiters.

The call is for the unity of women against the patriarchal-imperialist system. Each call came from this understanding - that the IMF and the World Bank are just two faces of the same system that exploits and oppresses the majority of us, whether we are women, black, working or not.●

Much of this article has been taken from the magazine of the Organisation Communiste Libertaire (OCL).

What is the International Monetary Fund?

THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY Fund (IMF) was established in 1944 at Breton Worde (USA), along with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank, IBRD). The aim was for the major world powers to be able to guard against the problems which had occurred in the inter-war years - the Soviet Union was also involved at first, but left after increasing disagreements.

The IMF was created basically to counter the balance of payments problems, arising out of trade deficits, that had plagued the capitalist world prior to the Second World War. The IBRD was established to see to the long term problems of the destruction caused by the war itself, later looking to the problems of the "Third World" and development issues.

The IMF is run by a cartel of the major capitalist nations, the USA being at the very top. Voting power is essentially bought, as the quotas which fund the IMF also define the quantity of votes available to each contributing nation. The head of the IMF is always American*.

The central ideas, and the basic policies of the IMF are, and always have been, the central ideas of the USA and the policies most in keeping with US interests. The USA, after all, has influence over 80% of the votes. The interests of the USA and the other major nations are obviously not the same as the interests of the poorer nations, let alone the interests of the poor the world over.

* The USA has 20% of the vote, Western Europe 28%. For major changes to be actioned, an 85% majority vote is required, therefore the USA has the power of veto. The poorer nations directly control only 34% of the vote.

whole workforce, or whether the company is targetting small sections, or even individuals.

Homeworking also has the advantage of allowing management to isolate themselves from the workforce. Homeworkers have no direct contact with even lower level bosses - like production managers and supervisors. The only contact they have with the company strucutre at all, may be with the driver of the van who delivers and collects their work.

A totally individualised workforce, unaware even of its own size and strength, and knowing next to nothing about the bosses who exploit it - what could me more ideal? Such a situation that allows management almost complete 'flexibility' to hire and fire at will; drive down wages; change terms and conditions; switch production; and, if required shut down operations and move them wholesale to another town or country. And all of this without any interference from workers' organisations.

Labour

In the past, many multinational companies centred their assembly and basic manufacturing work in 'Third World' countries, where costs (including wages) are cheap, and workers' organisation poor. Now British and European homeworkers are becoming part of those same pools of labour - their wages low, their organisation poor. All those workers are prone to exactly the same attacks - withdrawal of work, cuts in wages - as transnationals switch production around the globe in search of the cheapest costs at a given time.

But if the benefits for the boss class in promoting homeworking are so clear, and the position of homeworkers so precarious and exploited, why has there been such an explosion in the numbers employed in this way?

In a recent TV interview, one employer explained that it was a mistake to think of homeworking as "real, full-time, bread-winning employment". He claimed that the women employed by his hosiery firm were working "to earn themselves a bit of pin-money to supplement their husband's income".

The economic reality that homeworkers themselves describe is somewhat different.

As the recession has deepened over the last ten years, unemployment has rocketted - driving tens of thousands out of the traditional labour market. This has particularly badly affected working class women. The Thatcherite drive to return to 'Victorian values', has further pushed working class women back 'into the home'. What pitiful levels of nursery and creche provision that did exist for working class families has in most cases disappeared in wave after wave of council cutbacks, and, combined with the clsoure of nursing homes and hospital wards, has forced many women to return home to look after children or care for elderly relatives.

So, many working class women have needed to find employment that can combine earning a wage, caring full-time for children/ relatives, and running a home. Homeworking provides just that.

For many working class families, homeworking becomes the only means to bring in a desperately needed second wage. It's not a case of earning pocket money, but of finding a way to make ends meet.

As well as their division and isolation, other obstacles stand in the way of homeworkers organising together collectively to improve their conditions.

Cuts in housing and other benefits have combined to push many working class people further into poverty and debt in recent years. From economic neccesity, some homeworkers continue to sign on the dole (or continue in part time work outside the home) without declaring their meagre earning from homeworking. This overlapping into the 'informal' or 'black' economy makes some homeworkers understandably reluctant to draw attention to themselves. Most, if not all, homework bosses realise that some of their workers are 'doing in on the side', and are happy to exploit that situation. Some have threatened to grass up troublesome employees to the DSS.

'Trade unionism' has played a significant role in isolating homeworkers from other workers and re-inforcing divisions in the class. Trade union bureaucrats have not only ignored the plight of homeworkers, but have often denounced them as a threat to 'real workers'. They've argued that the appalling conditions and wages that homeworkers 'allow bosses to get away with' are used as a lever to undermine 'their members' pay and conditions.

Hostility

While it's undoubtedly true that bosses will try to play workers off against each other in such a way, it is the sectional and divisive nature of trade unionsim that allows them to get away with it - in this case actively encouraging hostility to replace class solidarity. A struggle that sought to unite homeworkers, with low-paid factory workers, with casual and part-time labour around common class interests could immediately expose the unions' role.

Despite the difficulties, groups of homeworkers have already begun to get organised. In Leicester, an Outworkers Campaign Group has already begun to break the isolation of many local homeworkers, bringing groups together to share experiences and pool knowledge. Simply meeting other homeworkers has been an important step forward for many.

But there are problems. From the start, the Campaign has responded to demands - from homeworkers - to operate as a kind of 'local agency' for women looking to take up homeworking. They keep records of 'good' and 'bad' employers and put women in contact with firms who have vacancies. While this may help keep workers away from the worst employers, it inevitably draws the Campaign into a management role.

But more importantly, the Leicester Outwork Campaing was not the initiative of any of the 10,000-plus local homeworkers, but was established and funded by the local council. They paid for two university graduates to staff and run the project 'on behalf of' those workers. The use of 'professional helpers' and publicity material which 'welcomes the involvement and interest' of local homeworkers, clearly shows that the organisation is apart from, and not a part of the workforce.

In getting organised, the first struggle that homeworkers need to wage, is the struggle to find information: about the company they work for, about other firms working locally, and about the hundreds of other homeworkers living in the same town.

Contacting other homeworkers may mean leafletting local estates and shopping centres, or advertising in the jobs column in local papers. The first step in shattering their isolation may simply be to bring their work to each others houses, enabling them to share child care, and giving them time to talk and plan. If this is successful, it could be moved to a local community centre or hall - enabling many more workers to get involved, and giving scope for estate-wide organisation to take off.

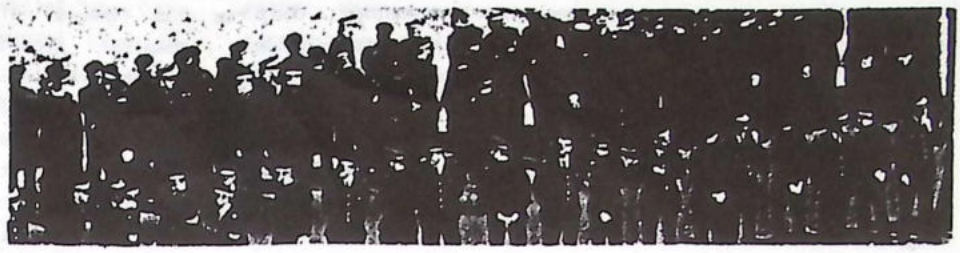
Struggles

Because homeworking is based outside of the factories and in people's homes - it destroys the artificial divisions that are erected between struggles in the 'workplace' and struggles in the 'community'. There is the immediate potential for homeworkers to generalise their specific economic struggles into wider fights for community resources, for better local health care, against 'yuppification', drawing support and forging unity across the class.

But these are early days. The explosion in homeworking has not yet been matched by a growth in workers' organisation, but there are signs of a growing confidence.

Because homeworkers are such 'low-status' workers, and because they are 'difficult' to organise in traditional workplace models, it seems likely that trade unions will continue to ignore them.

This must be seen as an opportunity, not a set back. Homeworkers' self-activity can challenge the limitations of trade unionism and council paternalism, and go direct to make demands on other sections of the class for solidarity.•



CAPITALISM:
The biggest crime of all

CRIME IS A major issue for working class people, but how to deal with it ourselves has always proved a difficult problem for revolutionaries.

One of the main arguments we face is the ruling class would have us believe that acts of theft or violence are a social problem which affects us all equally, and that their solutions to it benefit all society.

To counter this, we must analyse crime using class based politics, because today's crime is defined by the ruling class (and the working class is blamed for most of it). Of course, some actions defined as crimes today will still be considered crimes in an anarchist society, but some will not be crimes at all.

Moralising

We must also be careful to avoid moralising, since as anarchists we believe neither in respect for property when we advocate industrial sabotage, nor in the sanctity of life, since we see killing of some members of the ruling class and their supporters an inevitable part of class struggle and revolution. Neither will we shed any tears if a wealthy so and so has his/her house turned over, or gets pushed about in the street, never mind suggest it is something to be punished for.

Even if we accept that some crime and anti-social behaviour is due to poverty and alienation under capitalism, it is not enough to suggest it will just disappear after the revolution once we have common ownership and stress-free lives.

We need to come up with some answers now, otherwise we will never be able to argue for the complete destruction of the police and 'justice' system. Taking control of production in the factories must also mean taking control of the streets, creating our own code of conduct, and having procedures for dealing with crime - we need to help create the confidence so that working class people can do this as part of a general solidarity and a feeling of strength in the community.

As a solution to crime, the ruling class give us the police and Neighbourhood Watch on one hand, probation and prison on the other. The rich can also afford to hire private security firms to protect their homes and property.

Most people would say they hate the police, but in the final reckoning see them as necessary because there is no alternative. We must go beyond the case of someone hating the police because they were caught speeding, or were searched in the street at 11pm, because they may still believe in a police force and prisons as a solution to 'real' crime, if only for serious crimes like rape or murder.

We must also be careful not to argue against a police force just because they are racist and sexist, which is often used as a reason for getting rid of the cops. Presumably we would still be against a 'right-on' police force that beat up working class people with equal vigour, regardless of sex or race.

Disorder

We know the police exist to keep us in line. From the horse's mouth, even a Chief Police Officer admits that policing is geared more and more to preventing public disorder, whether in riots or in industrial struggles (violent picketing).

But try saying that to the person who reads the high coverage of crime in the daily papers, or the pensioner who is too scared to leave the house after watching Crimewatch or Police 5 on TV.

Neighbourhood Watch has caught on in working class areas and it is precisely that foothold in the community the police are looking for. However, Neighbourhood Watch is more about individuals protecting themselves in the home with alarms and window locks, and not walking out late at night, than creating a collective community effort against crime. This is not surprising really, because a community working together against crime might also have the strength to fight physical and political attacks by the state. Imagine a Broadwater Farm type effort against poll-tax collection!

Keeping an eye on our own is necessary and some form of community patrol is a good idea, if it is totally answerable to the people it is attempting to defend, and is working without and against the police.

To some, the idea of working class people running their own community crime prevention conjures up images of vigilante squads roaming around kneecapping wrongdoers, but who says our methods should be crude? Are the police and courts more just? We are the ones closest to the people who commit anti-social acts in our community, not the police, and we can find the fairest and best way to deal with them.

Community

Some forms of 'community justice' already exist. We can take examples from the many Asian youth organisations who have come together to crush violence committed by racists and fascists. The justice is dealt quickly and efficiently to individuals without the macho gang warfare often envisaged by left-wing anti-fascists.

One problem faced by the Asian youth squads was that some members of their community felt intimidated by their actions - a problem which will hopefully be solved by making sure everyone knows who they are. Another was attracting trouble by their presence. In spite of these problems this shows the effectiveness of crime prevention by a group linked to the community.

The Guardian Angels were in the news recently as they came over from New York to clean up the London Underground and get the 'scum off the streets'. This group of uniformed vigilantes were cautiously welcomed by Douglas Hurd and the police as a solution to crime in working class areas. In reality, in the US they have done more to protect Yuppies on the subways and look after property developments by clearing out the homeless and anyone with a 'strange' haircut.

The Guardian Angels are typical of a group of self-appointed police substitutes who are answerable to no-one. This is completely against the idea of community control.

In summary, the answer to crime is the same as our solution for running society - organisation by the working class, for the working class.●

Guardian Angels: self-appointed, answerable to no-one.

In defence of structure

THE ORGANISATIONAL PLATFORM OF THE LIBERTARIAN COMMUNISTS: Workers Solidarity Movement, £1.50.

RE-PUBLISHED RECENTLY BY the Workers Solidarity Movement (WSM), this pamphlet was first produced in 1926 in Paris by the "Dielo Trouda" group, of which the exiled Ukrainian anarchist Nestor Makhno was a founding member.

Two excellent introductions give brief historical and political context to the text, and point towards the determining factor of its content : the failure of the anarchist movement - particularly in Russia during the revolution - to provide a theoretically coherent and organisationally effective alternative to the authoritarian and reformist Marxist elements within the working class.

It was clearly the intention of the "Dielo Trouda" group to tackle this problem with the publication of this pamphlet.

Contrasts

The first section, entitled "General Section" deals with ideas of the class struggle, the hegemony of the state and its relationship with capitalism, and exposes the ideology and methods of Marxist-Leninism with classical anarchist-communist arguments.

A particularly telling contrast is drawn between the Leninist concept of the masses as being "unable to go beyond a trade-union consciousness", and the anarchist belief "that the labouring masses have inherent creative and constructive possibilities".

The next section, entitled "Constructive Section", builds on the ideas presented previously, and attempts to outline some strategies for for the organisation of production and consumption during and after the revolution, and the defence of the revolution by a standing "people's army".

These ideas are brief to the point of superficiality, but they do attempt to face some of the questions that anarchist have found most difficult to answer when contrasted with authoritarian solutions.

Organisation

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, the last section of the pamphlet deals with the organisational methods that the "Dielo Trouda" group felt it would be necessary to adopt to acheive anarchist-communism.

Their conclusions have been accused of being "only one step away from Bolshevism", and it is not difficult to see how such charges could be made.

The pamphlet advocates a highly organised vanguardist "General Union of Anarchists" (GUA), that would operate on the basis of a clearly defined political line, federative structure and collective responsibilty. What is not made clear, is how this line is to be developed, and precisely what relationship the GUA would have with the working-class in a revolutionary situation.

It is all too easy to see this vanguardist approach leading to a revolutionary elite acting upon an inflexible ideology, rather than creating and encouraging the development of anarchist-communist politics through the self-activity of the working class.

Nevertheless, no-one would claim that this is a closed issue, and as a point of departure for anarchist-communist organisations, the pamphlet provides a clear argument for the need for co-ordinated political organisation.●

Tintin strikes

BREAKING FREE (The Adventures of Tintin), J. Daniels; Attack International, £2.00.

FROM THOSE WHO brought us Scum - Tintin's adventures at Wapping - we now have Breaking Free, a comic book fantasy which has Tintin "back with his pals, battling it out against the State and bringing the old world to it's knees, in a classic full-length story of love, struggle and revolution."

The plot is totally implausible. Tintin has been kicked off the JTS scheme, caught shoplifting and has had his dole cut - the only similarities between this Tintin and Herge's are the name and (brilliant!) haircut. He starts working with his uncle, The Captain, on a building site.

There's an accident on the site and one of the workers is killed. Immediately - and I mean immediately - the workers call a wildcat strike and demand more wages, fewer hours, better safety, the sacking of the site supervisor and compensation for the dead man's family. The union is instantly dismissed: "oh, it ain't our union, it's just for the bosses...", and the strike spreads to all the company's sites, other work places, communities and quickly develops into a revolutionary situation as working class people begin to recognise their common needs and interests.

Racism, sexism and homophobia are dealt with in a very brief and simplified way - once people are told it's wrong, they don't do it again. Similarily, although all sections of the working class are involved in the activity, there is no attempt at political insight beyond a popularist and spontanaeist approach.

But this is a work of fantasy as opposed to serious political propaganda, and as such should be read for fun.●

Unconditional support

THE FIRST ISSUE of Organise! is an improvement on Virus in the quality of layout and presentation, and there is definitely an improvement in content: more up-to-date issues and debate.

One article in particular - "From imperialist war to class war", was both informative and topical.

But there was on section which worried me.

I agree that the task of libertarian revolutionaries in Britain is to oppose imperialism, to point to the bloddy repression of the anti-unionist struggle, and expose the propaganda war conducted through the British media. Of course, we must call for 'Troops Out' and promote working class unity.

But are we to oppose, quote: "the unification of Ireland on any basis other than in the context of international socialism"?

Taken to its logical conclusion this statement means that British libertarian communists should side with the British State in opposing the unification of Ireland as a bourgeois, capitalist state, because the Irish working class (North and South) must fight for unification only "in the context of international socialism".

When, as British revolutionaries, we call for 'Troops Out', we cannot add in brackets, as a pre-condition of our own, "But only in the context of international socialism"!

The fight for international socialism must be built on international working class solidarity. This solidarity is not just miraculously present in workers' minds, it has to be built.

To build it in Britain, amongst British workers, we must support, unconditionally, the Irish people's right to self-determination. In practice this means challenging the imperialism of the British State, calling for 'Troops Out', and a united independent Ireland (only to be united with Britain "in the context of international socialism").

To build international working class solidarity in Ireland, amongst the Irish working class, is to fight, as the author of the article correctly points out, for "a revolutionary secular socialist movement" which is as opposed to Ireland's indigenous bourgeoisie as it it to British imperialism.

In practice this means challenging the nationalism of the Republican Movement, and to counter-pose to this the fight for anti-imperialist working class unity, arguing for international socialism.

So, libertarian communists in Britain and Ireland have the same goal. But, because we are approaching it from different sides (from the oppressing state and the oppressed nation), our methods of fighting differ. This has often been called the 'dual role' of revolutionaries.

To argue, on any basis, that libertarian communists should "oppose the unification of Ireland" AT ALL, is to side with British imperialism by default. The struggle for self-determination of a people is in itself progressive, as it challenges the logic of imperialism which is the logic of capitalism.

Even if we recognise that the unification of Ireland as a bourgeois nation state will not bring liberation for the Irish working class, we must see the struggle for self-determination as part of the international fight against imperialism. This fight may not be consciously socialist but it is always objectively anti-capitalist and as such must be supported.

To believe that the anti-imperialist struggle can ever be a 'pure' fight for international socialism is hopelessly utopian. It will always involve many and diverse sections of the oppressed, whose aims may well be contradictory. Libertarian communists must recognise this and fight for working class dominance of the struggle and argue consistently for international socialism.

Yours for a strong,
Libertarian Communist movement and International Socialism
Starik

Republican marching band on Troops Out march.

AUTHOR'S REPLY: DESPITE our disagreements, Comrade Starik raises some interesting and important points I would like to reply to.

When I said that libertarian communists should oppose the unification of Ireland on any basis other than in the context of International Socialism, I meant to emphasise that we should not look to British solutions.

Imperialism can never play a progressive role and any move by the British state towards unification would have their desire to maintain economic imperialist domination at heart. A united capitalist Ireland would be acceptable to all but the most Neanderthal elements in the British ruling class, if it was to remain in the western imperialist orbit and was able to maintain reasonable political stability.

We disagree with Comrade Starik when he talks of 'unconditional support for the Irish People's right to self-determination'.

Who are these 'Irish People'?: Irish workers? Irish petit bourgeois? Irish bosses? And do they all have the same interests? Where is the class analysis in this catch all phrase the 'Irish People'?

When Comrade Starik talks of an independent Ireland, he fails to come to terms with the fact that in an international capitalist (and therefore imperialist) system, political and economic independence is a fallacy.

All nations which have gone through 'national liberation' have been forced to ally with one of the imperialist blocs. 'Unconditional support' also has a Leninist ring about it. Unconditional support for the dominant anti-imperialist group in Ireland, would mean excuse-making for elitist paramilitary actions, some of which verge on out-right racist murder (like the targetting of individual Protestant workers - a strategy the IRA has followed in the recent past). This is best left to the Stalinists and Trotskyites.

Starik is right to say that a revolutionary secular socialist movement must be built to challenge the Left nationalism of the Republicans and that the struggle to smash the Orange State and kick the British troops out, must be dominated by the working class and its interests. This is one of the tasks of revolutionary minorities in both Britain and Ireland. Let's go to it.●

Anarchy or Oligarchy?

I AM WRITING in respect to the articles on 'rotation' that have appeared in previous issues of your magazine, and to ask about the ACF's emphasis on organisation.

I would be interested to know your opinions (if any) on Robert Michel's 'Political Parties' - one time Marxist and syndicalist, later elitist and fascist.

I would like to know whether you think his work is of any relevence - especially to Anarchists (as his book does contain a section on Anarchism and says elsewhere that although organisation is essential it is gained at the expense of a conservative/reactionary elite. (See especially Chapter 4 B, 'Psychological Cause of Leadership': "One who holds the office of delegate requires a moral right to that office... One who has for a certain time held the office of delegate ends by regarding that office as his own property". And also Chapter 6, 'The Political Gratitude of the Masses'.

He says Anarchists "are the declared enemies of all organisation, and who, when they form organisations, do so in defiance of their own principles..." (p82).

He talks of Anarchist 'leaders' such as Kropotkin and Bakunin as having "some of the qualities and pretensions characteristic of all leadership" (p358), ie superior intellect compared to the masses who look up to them as superiors.

This brings me to Michel's argument that the working class will never be 'educated' enough to prevent leadership/ bureaucracy stepping above them and ruling their lives.

So "who says organisation, says oligarchy" (p401). Do you think this is relevent, and if so if Anarchism is possible, or to what degree it is possible?

Yours sincerely
RSW
Manchester

ORGANISE! EDITORS' REPLY: In the first instance it is necessary to make it absolutely clear that anarchist-communists do not advocate organisation "in defiance of their principles"; in this respect Michel makes the classic mistake of confusing absence of government with a lack or order and organisation in society.

"Anarchy", literally translated from the Greek means, "without government", and it is the organisation of society on a non-hierarchical basis that anarchist-communists seek, not the creation on an unstructured and disorganised society. The article on rotation was an example of one possible form of organisation that might prove useful in an anarchist-communist society.

On the question of delegation it is not made obvious from your letter on what basis a delegate "requires a moral right to that office". Anarchist-communists see delegation (or mandation) in the context of rotation as a useful mechanism in decision making, and would seek to involve everyone affected by the decisions taken in that process. This would include rotation of delegates on a regular basis; certainly there is no moral perogative attached to this function, and because the delegate is involved in a conscious effort to avoid hierarchical social structures, it is unlikely "(the) delegate ends by regarding that office as his own property".

In examining this issues of leadership and the political consciousness of the working class, Michel conveniently chooses to depict 'hierarchy' as an inevitable feature of human nature and of society. Michel ignores the social conditions that, under capitalism, distort this supposedly 'inherent' and 'unchangeable' nature.

Anthropology furnishes us with examples of societies where no hierarchy existed, and where human social activity has been expressed through co-operative and communal forms. Even within our own unequal and hierarchical society, and despite every attempt by the ruling class to destroy it, co-operation plays an important and fulfilling role in the every-day lives of working class people, both through work, struggle and community action. This shows us that it is meaningless to insist on hierarchy as being the only "natural" and inevitable form of social organisation.

If we take the goal of society to be the promotion of well-being, freedom and equality for all, it is clear that this cannot come from the destructive competition and "enterprise" of capitalism.

Anarchist-communists, by participating in active and conscious working class struggle, seek to bring about a classless society based on communal and co-operative forms to acheive this goal.

From the above, not only is it clear that this is a possibility, but once established, exploitation and oppression will become far more meaningless in the human context than co-operation and community may appear today.

Whoops!

THE EDITORS SEEM to have given the article I translated and adapted on the Italian Base Committees ('Self-organisation Italian style' - Organise! 15) a bit of a mauling.

The article did not first appear in the Italian anarchist paper La Lutta! As far as I know, there is no such paper.

It appeared in the French libertarian communist magazine Lutter!.

Similarly, my mention of a group of activists on the railways - the Union of Anarchist and Libertarian Railway Workers - which I explained was not a trade union, but a union in the sense of a coming together - a workers' group - was totally dismembered.

I hope this letter sets the record straight.

'Revolutionary Unionism'?

IN A RECENT issue of your otherwise excellent magazine, a large article by a member of the Communication Workers Group appeared ('What is the potential of rank and file action?' - Organise! 14).

The article is infuriating reading for the anarcho-syndicalist. The article espouses a view of the reformist trades unions that I'm sure most anarcho-syndicalists would agree with.

However, by stating that 'issues' like 'pay and conditions' are so corrupting for workers' organisations, and to claim that by its "fundamental nature" unionism is doomed to sell-out and abandon any revolutionary intent it may have held, the article is saying that there is no difference between existing unions and the Anarcho-Syndicalist Union. What an insult!

It dismisses the various rank-and-file movements that have existed in Britain with the desultory claim that "all rank-and-file movements in Britain have been alternative union movements".

It then says that the simple day-to-day activities of the union will take over and turn the Anarcho-Syndicalist Union into a "fairer negotiator for a fairer form of exploitation... This is the sole purpose of a union, and it has no time or inclination to overthrow the state, as it has a mass membership to look after and an economy to keep an eye on..."

I can see how these arguments apply to the reformist, bourgeois unions - but I cannot for the life of me see how these effect Anarcho-Syndicalist Unions. Surely such an organisation is a revolutionary, working class organisation? What else could it be?

Taken as a whole, the article smacks of a dangerous slide into ultra-leftism - one of the few creeds that actually defuses revolutionary fervour.

The working classes exist because of economic factors - all of us, proletariat, lumpen-proletariat and peasantry are forced to rely on an economic relationship with capitalism. This means we have to work in order to survive. This entails a reliance on 'bread and butter' issues such as pay and conditions.

As usual, the tired old argument about anarcho-syndicalism being 'divisive' is dragged out. What rot! Tell me, where does the line exist between working class communities and the workplace? Who the hell do you mix with after work?

The article argues that "something else is needed - something revolutionary and all-embracing socially".

My view is that it would be impossible to have a single revolutionary body. You need an Anarcho-Syndicalist Union (which is a damn sight more "socially embracing" than a gang of mardy Lefties hunched over their coffee in the canteen) as well as your specific anarchist group, women's group, Jewish, Black, Irish, etc.

Anarcho-syndicalism is a socially embracing ideology - which seeks to organise in all section of the working class and their communities. It is very ironic to hear anarchist-communists tell us to 'come out of the factories' when its a line we invented to confront the Revolutionary Syndicalists.

Most of the criticisms of anarcho-syndicalism are really criticisms of revolutionary syndicalism.

"It's always nice to end on a quote". Here's a very interesting one from Rudolf Rocker's The London Years:

"The old slogan, 'the worse, the better', was based on an erroneous assumption. Like the other slogan 'all or nothing', which made many radicals oppose any improvement in the lots of the workers even when the workers demanded it, on the grounds that it would distract the mind of the proletariat, and turn it away from the road so social emancipation.

It is contrary to all the experience of history and psychology: people who are not prepared to fight for the betterment of the living conditions are not likely to fight for social emancipation. Slogans like this are a cancer in the revolutionary movement." (*)

PH, Nottingham Direct Action Movement (DAM)

AUTHOR'S REPLY: Instead of just saying "what an insult!", why don't you try to explain why my analysis of the fundamental nature of unionism doesn't also apply to the anarcho-syndicalist union?

I do not "dismiss" rank-and-file movements, I wrote an article examining them! It is true, however, that we need to go beyond them.

It is not "desultory" to say "all rank-and-file movements in Britain have been alternative union movements" - it is a fact. If you think an alternative union movement to the existing one is of little importance then why do you want an anarcho-syndicalist union?

You don't say why an anarcho-syndicalist union "is a revolutionary working class organisation". You just say, "What else could it be?". Come on! The article demands a more reasoned response than that!

Why is the article "ultra-leftist"?

You end with more assertions of anarcho-syndicalism's revolutionary character. However, they are not backed up, and therefore, in the light of the arguments in the article, serve as no defence for anarcho-syndicalism.

Regards the quote: did I say I opposed "any improvement in the lot of the workers, even when the workers demanded it"? No, I said the opposite of course. Please read the article again...

POLL TAX:

of goods from those who refused to pay their non-registration fines. At least one set of bailiffs needed a police escort to get them off the estate in one piece.

Not surprisingly, labour movement leaders are worried by all this activity. The rally at the 30,000 strong TUC poll tax march in Manchester in July was used as a platform to denounce non-payment and condemn industrial action. To a barrage of booing and catcalls the opening speaker was first of many to fiercely attack any suggestions that the law should be broken, and proclaimed the 'utter failure' of the non-payment campaign in Scotland.

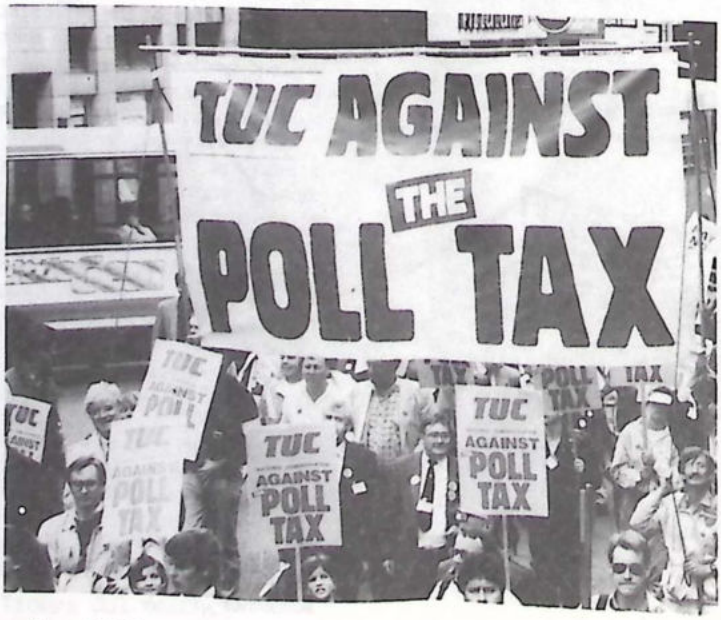
The decision by the TUC to launch such a public and aggressive attack on effective action (rather than simply ignoring it through calls for a 'united campaign' and a future 'vote for Labour') reflects the growing concern in the labour and union bureaucracies that they are failing to head off the real fight against the poll tax.

The abject failure of the 'Stop It' campaign to derail the fight in Scotland, has been made worse by the inability of Labour Councils to disguise their enthusiastic compliance with the tax.

Labour

The TUC's hopes that resistance could be focused in a solely anti-Tory direction, have been wrecked as Labour councils have been seen to compile registers, fine resisters, dispatch bailiffs and issue huge poll tax demands - while simultaneously denouncing this 'iniquitous Tory tax'.

Labour controlled Central Region went as far as to freeze the bank accounts of over 130 non-registers. They deducted a £50 fine, and an additional £16.01 "sheriff's fee". Panicked by the outraged reaction that followed, the council immediately restated its 'total opposition to the Tory poll tax', and pledged that for every £1 it seized in similar moves in the future, it would donate £1 to local charities 'working with the underpriviliged'. It also announced it was to establish a Debt Counselling Service to offer tea and sympathy to those that it is driving deeper into poverty.



It's hardly surprising that growing numbers of working class people in Scotland - including many life-long Labour voters - are increasingly seeing their 'socialist' local authorities as part of the enemy.

Council rent arrears are at an all-time high in Scotland - the recent cutbacks in housing and other benefits have left many families simply unable to meet all their bills. At the core of the 'won't pay' campaign is a huge number of people who simply cannot pay.

While the non-payment campaign is strengthened and extended, attention must be turned to winning solidarity action from council workers administering the tax.

The recent wave of strike action by local government workers was used by many local poll tax groups as an opportunity to visit picket lines - both to offer support to low-paid council workers, and to argue directly with them the need to disrupt and sabotage poll tax collection from within.

Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To acheive our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in the face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide, and economic and political colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class.

We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist communist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

4. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

5. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to acheive anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

6. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part in its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions, however, are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism.

The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to acheive a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours.

The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we many acheive today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never acheive this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a point of common departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

7. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creation of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

8. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called 'socialists' or 'communists' we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.●

AT OUR NATIONAL conference in April this year, we further amended our 'aims and principles', making two additional changes:

* Point 4 has been split into two seperate sections, one on war and the environment; one on revolution.

* What is now Point 6 - the section on the unions - has been revised, reordered and slightly expanded.

CHINA: in whose hands?

THE BRUTALITY OF the Chinese State in crushing the student uprising earlier this summer shocked the world. The bravery of the resistance to such an autocratic regime was an inspiration to us all. But what must be understood is that the callousness shown by the Peking authorities was only it's mask slipping, it's hand being forced.

Any state must be prepared to use the ultimate threat of violence against it's people to maintain power. China is no different, it is the state showing it's true face.

Under obvious dictatorships this true nature of the state is easier to see. In the so-called 'democratic' West it is simply the case that it rarely plays it's full hand.

After the destruction of the hard line Maoist leadership in China, the new regime tried a more pragmatic approach. A centrally planned economy operated during a period of complete restructuring. But once the structuring of industry and the establishing of roads. power networks, ports etc. had taken place, the economy moved onto another stage.

The 'Iron Rice Bowl', the policy of a job, food and shelter for life, was broken. The politicians needed a new direction for the economy.

The Deng Xiaoping leadership then tried to use the political and social methods of the centralised economy to create a mixed economy without social change in any real sense. He used the liberal wing of the leadership, Zhao Ziyang etc, for this, with the hope of democratic reforms. Li Peng and the 'loyal' army dashed these hopes. The economic reforms were a failure, corruption widespread, and the scene set for the kind of unrest we saw in May/June.

The student movement began by establishing that it wanted reforms within the Chinese system, not to overthrow it. They appealed to Zhao Ziyang and other liberals within the Party for change, and appeared to simply favour a more open society and a freer economy (a kind of Glasnost and Perestroika).

Gorbachov's visit to Peking provided an ideal focus for action, and the hunger strike and occupation of Tianamen Square began as an attempt to embarass the Government into giving way while the eyes of the world were on it.

Student leaders demanded to meet government officials, still believing that the will of the people could in itself force change. They were adamant about their non-violence, as a moral principle as well as a tactic, as though this would somehow shame the State into giving in.

Reports from those present in Tianamen Square on June 4th, as the tanks rolled over thousands of sleeping protesters, say the dead were people who still believed that the approaching army would, at worst, move in to carry them out of the area and then withdraw.

As many students prepared themselves for a night of fighting, others went to sleep as normal to prepare for a moral victory the next day. We salute them for their bravery in taking on the State, but we must learn from their deaths never to underestimate the brutality of Government and the forces that serve it.

The student movement was by no means 'liberal' however. The adoption of the 'Goddess of Liberty' must not be seen as an embracing of an American ideal. The symbol is originally one of the French Revolution, and whilst some concentrate on the reforms the students wanted, the demand was essentially for a form of socialism rather than capitalism.

We can criticise them for being naive about the real nature of state socialism, but we can't accuse them of aspiring to bourgoise, western-style democracy.

For the students and workers to call themselves a 'Democracy Movement' must also be understood in context. There have been strong libertarian socialist movements in the area, but to call yourself a 'communist' in a state communist country is to appear to be pro-government. People emphasising ideas of freedom, equality and choice in such a climate could have much in common with anti-state communists such as ourselves.

After being forced underground, the student movement has learnt many lessons. Not least, they have seen that the armed forces, whether labelled the 'People's Army' or not, is on the side of the powerful, and, as an organisation, serves the State's interests.

Individual soldiers in a conscripted army can be won back to the class from which they came, as the people's movement discovered. This obviously increases the chances of success for an uprising. But the students underestimated the loyalty of many troops to the state, with which their selfish interests lay, and as such had no tactic for dealing with the attacks that followed.

Without indulging in moral outrage, we must pay tribute to the bravery and sacrifice of those that fought and died in Tianamen Square. The movement must develop a clear analysis of what happened. Already students are saying that they should act as more of a part of a workers and peoples' movement as a whole.

The left is inconsistent in it's response. The Stalinists must surely be shamefaced, and all Leninists know that to ensure the success of a state-communist "revolution", the authorities must be prepared to crush "counter-revlutionary" movements.

It happens that such movements are often of the same people who worked for revolution, and are now questioning the right of their government to exploit, lie and dictate to them.●

Donations we've had in include: Dagenham, 50; London, 50; Rugby, 25; Bradford, 6.84; Birmingham 3.20 and Hastings, 2.

Our thanks go to all those comrades, friends, subscribers and readers who've given money - which will go a long way towards meeting our printing, production and postage costs.

Since we launched the press fund in Feb 1989 we've raised well over 500 - which is excellent.

We hope to reach our next 250 target by January 20th. If you think Organise!, and other ACF publishing projects, are worth supporting please try to send in a donation, or organise a benefit event to help raise cash.

We're really keen to expand our publishing efforts - producing bigger, more frequent issues of Organise! for one - but to make such plans feasible, we need a regular, reliable income from our 'press fund' to top up the ACF's own fund raising efforts.

So, if you can, please rush donations to:

DEWSBURY: the rising tide of racism

IT SEEMS AT times that anti-racism has gone out of fashion. Racism certainly has not!

In the autumn of 1988, Maulana Abdur Rashid was kidnapped and burnt to death. In June 1989, a Bangladeshi woman was thrown from her second floor flat. In July 1989, Ismat Ali was murdered defending himself and his family forty yards from Brick Lane Police Station. On July 26 1989, Tahir Akram, murdered by armed racists in Oldham.

On June 24th 1989, the fascist British National Party (BNP) called a national rally in Dewsbury. Around 150 fascists and racists gathered. John Tyndall, fuhrer of the BNP, preached the usual racist message. A local Tory councillor attended - just out of interest of course. Eddie Morrison, another noted fascist, also spoke. The crowd combined shouts of 'seig heil', 'Pakis out' and 'God save the Queen'. Their rally ended, and most were led away to their transport by police, at around 3.00pm.

The counter-rally organised by Kirklees Black Workers' Group was around 800 strong. It was quite peaceful. There were very few arrests early in the day. The counter-rally disbanded around 1.30pm.

However, racists from the Black Bull pub began the day's violence by attacking a group of anti-fascists. The result being that the police penned the growing number of protesters in and around the Sport Centre and the DSS building.

Far from protecting people from racists, the police were content to allow Asian shoppers and traders to be robbed and attacked. The message from police - you should have stayed at home.

Rather than take on the racists, the 750 police decided to attack the anti-racists who had been trying to disperse. About 50 officers went over the railings enclosing the protestors - pushing, shoving and lashing out with truncheons. They seemed interested in mass arrests. One Asian youth was repeatedly punched in the face whilst handcuffed and in a headlock. People retreated as best they could, up narrow streets towards Savile Town. Riot squads were employed spreading terror throughout the area, people of all ages running in fear from mounted police.

On the day, 59 anti-racists, black and white, were arrested. That has now risen to 82 following police raids. This includes people from Dewsbury, Leeds, Sheffield and Botley. Bail conditions have been imposed on some very like South African 'banning orders'. The police are using this as an excuse, afraid of anti-racism, afraid of solidarity, their object is to destroy them.

There is only one necessity now for us - a strong, united and militant anti-racist movement. The charges against the Dewsbury 82 must be dropped and the police exposed in their racism and brutality.

'Chamches' (community leaders) are as afraid of such a movement as the police. As reactionaries they are busily trying to sabotage this attempt. After all, a politicised black community would rob them of their power. They are uninterested in the rise of racist attacks in Savile Town. The local press seem only capable of branding defenders of the community as rioters. We can not fail now. If we do then we all face attack from judicial and public bigotry.

All of this should be placed against the backdrop of other events.

The Tories are pushing a new national ideology. Education is going to be even more peverse, nationalist and anti-human. The government's policies on refugees, migrants and immigrants - already severe - will be strengthened in 1992. Europe is to become a fortress, doors closed to all but rich white immigrants. The poor, the oppressed, the exploited are being locked out or thrown out. Terrorism, drugs, and all manner of crimes are laid at their door.

Each of these problems needs answering. It is up to us to provide that answer - a movement to defend the 82 and to opposed the racism of 1992's 'Fortress Europe'.

RUC conspiracy

RECENT WEEKS HAVE seen the 'exposing' of links between members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and Royal Ulster Constabulary, and loyalist paramilitaries by the emergence of leaked documents containing files on nationalist individuals, including some IRA members.

The first expose came from the UFF (Ulster Freedom Fighters) confirmation through a BBC reporter, that they had used 'confidential' British security files in planning the murder of Laughlin Maginn, who was killed at home on August 24, and who had previously received and reported harassment and death threats from the RUC and UDR.

The following week it emerged that a British soldier convicted of possessing information intended for passing to loyalist death squads, had been reinstated into the army in England.

On September 10 the British army admitted that more files had "gone missing" from Ballykinlar base in County Down. The same day two UDR soldiers were charged with Maginn's murder.

We can see the hypocrisy of the Irish establishment in their 'grave concern' about the events. Sinn Fein too must see that military espionage is an inevitable tactic in a war time situation, one that is surely also employed in defending nationalist communities. Outrage and moral indignation are not appropriate here, when the links between the State and right wing groupings were already clear.

It is no surprise that such tactics are used when a state by it's very nature has an interest in putting down resistance to its imperialist presence. Revolutionaries would not 'criticize' a State for fulfilling what we know to be its function.

We oppose its continued existence as it is the root cause of the divisions in the working class such as exist in the six counties. We advocate the removal of the state by class conflict and are not surprised when the ruling class supports one section of the class against another to prevent its own role being exposed. In hiding the class nature of society, Sinn Fein and the IRA are obstacles to the defeat of the class system.

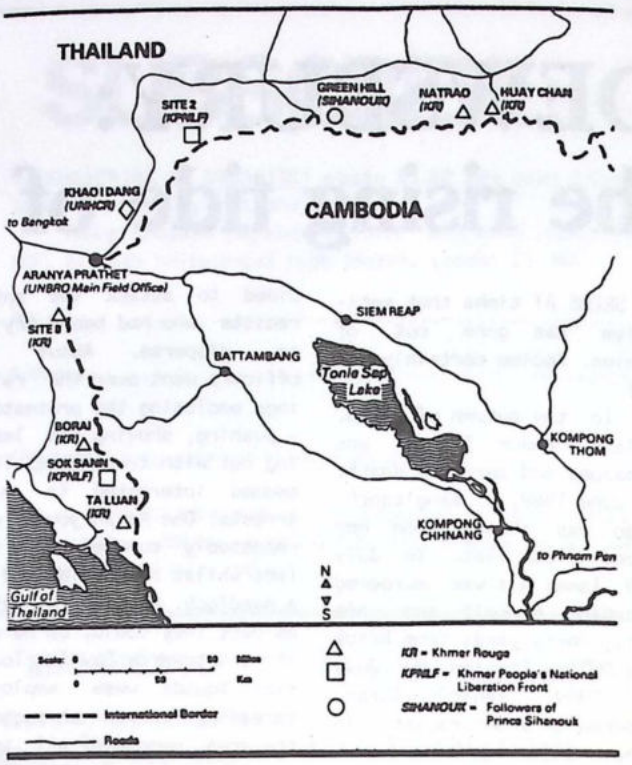
The reason for the leaks is not simply to prove how easily loyalists can pin point and harass nationalists. Reports have uncovered links between an extensive and influential "Inner Circle" in the RUC and the loyalist paramilitary group Ulster Resistance.

Ulster Resistance has the primary objective of undermining the Anglo-Irish Agreement by showing they have enough influence in the RUC to shape events in the Six Counties for themselves, if the British government stops doing it for them.

Ian Paisley led an illegal paramilitary show of strength just after the signing of the accord to make a very similar point.

To the British state the Anglo-Irish Agreement is a way of maintaining it's imperialist power on both sides of the border. Sinn Fein is of course only prepared to oppose the anti-republican nature of the Accord, rather than rejecting it as a ruling class initiative. To the loyalists it undermines the terror they can inflict on the nationalist community.

Thus it is not simply the case that the British State is pulling all the strings in the north of Ireland. If the situation is a struggle between aspiring future rulers on both sides, we must find revolutionary solutions rather than apologise for leadership politics. The ultimate enemy of the Irish working class is the ruling class, and we must not shy away from exposing that fact. ●



Cambodian civil war

TAKE SEVERAL INGREDIENTS: nationalism, political ambition, foreign intervention, Marxist-Leninism, and imperialism - and you have a recipe for disaster.

Since March 1970, when Prince Sihanouk was kicked out of power by Lon Nol, Cambodia has suffered from civil war, mass starvation and genocide.

Cambodia, before the decades of chaos, was a land overflowing with agricultural wealth. We should not overstate the quality of life at that time: Cambodia was, and is, an economically backward country. Nevertheless, it did manage to keep out of the wider Indo-China conflict until foreign intervention upset the apple-cart. US saturation bombing, early Vietnamese - and then Chinese - support for Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge, and finally, Vietnamese invasion, have all played their part.

Pol Pot's aquisition of power, and the implementation of a dogmatic restructuring of the economy, had devastating results. The cities were emptied and all opposition was annihilated. Mass killing, starvation and forced labour, became part and parcel of the Marxist government's strategy.

Then, eleven years ago, a Russian financed and supplied Vietnamese army imposed their order.

A Vietnam-approved 'communist' regime was imposed under the head of Hun Sen. And now, the Vietnamese have had enough: they can no longer afford to keep thousands of their troops on Cambodian soil, as their own economy disintegrates.

The fear now is that civil war will once again intensify. The Khmer Rouge is estimated to be about 30,000 strong - not an overwhelming force, but nevertheless a threat. They draw their support from some sectors of the peasantry who were relatively unaffected by Pol Pot's period of power, and there is the prospect that their strength will grow.

There is the prospect, then, of two 'communist' armies - insurgent and governmental - facing each other in the battle fields.

Both the Khmer Rouge and the Government claim to be 'Marxists', yet their loyalties are not really tied to any particular class. Rather, it is power for themselves that each is struggling for. Marxist regimes, whatever stated motives, end up at the helm of new ruling classes that their 'revolutions' bring about.

As both the Soviet and Chinese models of economic and political reconstruction have proved to be unviable, the obviousness of this becomes increasingly apparent.

But, so long as external agents - such as China - back this or that 'Marxist' force in Cambodia, then there will be little prospect of anything but continued civil war. ●

'NEWS AND ANALYSIS' is continued on page 12, with a story about life for Cambodia's refugees in the camps in neighbouring Thialand.

Solidarity promise to crush resistance

"We must help Poland in every way we can to create the framework for a genuine market economy."

THESE ARE THE words of Nigel Lawson, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in response to the recent political changes and reforms in Poland. Poland is to be the Trojan Horse in the Eastern Bloc camp, whose conversion to "a genuine market economy" will sound the death knell for State 'Socialism' and usher in the final triumphant era of Capital.

This is Lawson's dream, and we can be sure that the IMF, World Bank and many Western governments will be doing their utmost to ensure that it succeeds.

Solidarity

In all of this, there is a salutory lesson to be learnt from the part played by Solidarity in helping to bring about these changes. After the events of the last few months, it could be easy to forget that the origins of Solidarity lie in the industrial unrest of 1980, when workers struck in defiance of the 'Communist' Dictatorship over issues of rising prices and low pay. General Jaruzelski duly crushed the strikes, instigated martial law and outlawed Solidarity.

But Jaruzelski knew that unless his government could solve these problems his dictatorship would face similar uprisings in the years to come.

By crushing workers resistance and instigating martial law, he hoped to solve Poland's problems at the expense of the working class. But by 1988 it was clear that even this harsh repression had failed. This year and last have seen the biggest waves of strikes and industrial unrest since 1980, and workers fought not just for improvement in wages and prices, but also for the legalisation of Solidarity.

Jaruzelski desperately needed to find a solution, and with the tactics of overt oppression unavailable to him, he chose instead to co-opt the Solidarity opposition to his regime by inviting them to participate in the 'solution'. Solidarity complied.

Talks

Their is no contradiction between Solidarity's role as a 'militant union' and its entering government. It's leadership has always had the political goal of 'social reform' as well as being the legal representative of the workforce. But whatever its aspirations, an organisation collaborating with the State can only negotiate the price of labour, never pose a serious threat to capitalism - east or west.

What followed was a series of round table talks between the 'Communist' dictatorship and the leaders of Solidarity, the results being a deal to allow Solidarity to field candidates in the June elections of this year. At the same time, it was already clear that the Solidarity leadership was becoming little more than a bureaucratised political elite with governmental aspirations, increasingly divorced from the working class that had been instrumental in its creation.

Solidarity's collusion with the 'Communist' regime goes much further, however, than simply helping to form a government with them, for they have also accepted many of the pre-conditions set by the 'Communists' in doing so, including allowing them to keep control of the ministries of defence and the interior, the two organs that helped outlaw them in the first place.

Profit

More importantly, they have wholeheartedly embraced the ethos of the market and the need to make Polands 'economy' profitable, undertaking the bulk of this task themselves. George Bush has expressed his desire that - under Solidarity's guide - Poland will become the "America of the Eastern Bloc".

After Lech Walesa had persuaded many workers to call off their strikes whilst the negotiations were in progress, he said of them "I am not going to toy with Poland. I extinguished the strikes and I will extinguish any others", and later "All types of strikes must be suspended", a clear indication that the Solidarity government's priorities lie primarily with regenerating the economy, and maintaining political stability, not with the well-being of the Polish people.

For the working class of Poland this will be an unmitigated disaster. It will mean that loss-making factories will have to be closed down, industries 'rationalised' to compete on the world market, and a whole package of similar 'austerity' measures will be introduced by Walesa and his cronies. The results are not difficult to predict: mass unemployment and extreme poverty - all imposed by the "people's union".

Foremost among the constitutional methods used to bring about these changes will be the banning of strikes of all kinds, and the control of all industrial unrest by Walesa's Solidarity representatives in the factories.

Tensions

It is difficult to predict how these tensions will resolve themselves in Poland, but for the moment, we can take it that the Solidarity government wholeheartedly endorses the chilling words of Theo Waigel, the West German Finance Minister, when he said of Poland: "It is not just about money. Human capital must be put to work by economic and financial experts as well". •

"All types of Strike must be suspended." - Lech Walesa.

IMF: stitching up the world economy

IN 1944, UNDER the aegis of political-economists Keynes and White, the Bretton Woods agreement was forged. Prior to the war, the western economy had swung between boom and depression. The agreement looked to solving the problem of capitalism once the war had been won.

Two organisations were formed - the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank (the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development).

The interests of the USA won out over those of the deficit countries (eg the UK). Henceforth the world economy was to be based upon that of its strongest economy - the USA's. Thus, the dollar was to become the currency to which all others were pegged. The IMF existed to eradicate protectionism, expand world trade, establish a fixed exchange rate, to police balance of payments problems. The World Bank was initially there to supervise the reconstruction of the major economies after the war.

Plague

It would be easy to portray the IMF and World Bank as evil, but is this really the case? Is it not true that they are simply what the major powers (the Group of 5, the Group of 10) make them? They are simply the messengers, the carriers of a plague born of the greedy needs of western capital.

Behind these agencies is a diseased world view. The fact that the major economies have huge voting strength there is only one part of the story. The agencies officials come mostly from where - need I ask?

Once the war-torn economies had been rebuilt, the rest of the world could be tackled. What was 'sold' to those now decolonialised nations was the ideology of modernisation and development. The advanced economies could not expand without opening up all of those other economies. The 'Third World' was developed for those 'advanced' countries.

To gain World Bank development assistance, it was necessary to be an IMF member. This meant opening up to penetration by western goods, not allowing domestic industries to grow. The development loans provided for two basic forms of development.

First of all, the growth in cash crop agri-business. Under the cover of the 'green revolution', a series of western multinationals were encouraged to virtually take over the agriculture of the Third World - Cargill, Unilever, Philip-Morris, Continental Grain, McDonalds, etc. The result being the food-needs of these countries were ignored for export-crop production, to earn cash to re-pay loans.

Secondly, on the industrial front, a whole series of loans were made for projects which made huge profits for western contractors. For example, 30 US-supplied cotton-treating plants for Zaire - none of which work; Westinghouse and others supply the Ing-Shaba power project for Zaire - cost $1.5b; Maluku steel plant, powered by Ing-Shaba, works at 10% capacity; the coffee refinery doesn't work at all. Zaire has debts of over $6b. Cronies of Marcos in the Phillipines earned huge commissions through a nuclear power project placed on the side of a volcano, prone to earthquakes. Thankfully it will never be operational. The Phillipino people are still paying for it.

Western banks play with the 'Third World'. They hawk loans, looking for business, no matter at what cost. Projects are designed either by western 'experts' or western trained 'entrepreneurs'. Huge loans are given over to the highest bidder, not the 'best' (in their terms). The loan and the project is tied to the government. No reference is taken of the real needs of the people. Officials take huge commissions. Often the whole loan is stolen. The cash is then deposited with the western banks to be re-lent. When projects fail, the debt is passed on to the poor by the government.

The core countries of capitalism have those areas outside of the club, earmarked for simple tasks - the production of cheap cash-crops, extracting cheap raw materials, etc. They use the IMF and World Bank as non-profit making enforcers. Promotion to the select few is pretty well impossible.

The international division of labour leaves those outside the core, fighting to pick up what crumbs they can - importing exploitation in the form of multi-nationals, western banks, setting up Free Trade Zones, where little is earned, profits exported. Under 'Structural Adjustment Programmes' the poor pay back the mistakes and thefts of the bosses.

Capitalism

The essential problem - the only problem - is world capitalism, not one or more features of that. Many instruments are used, for instance the IMF and World Bank. The systematic exploitation of the whole world must come to an end. It is interesting to note that a particular World Bank project in Zaire has recently hit the news because of its callous environmental destruction.

It is time for those at the base of world society to begin the replacing of world capitalism, and its instruments, with ways of life that are truly free and anti-exploitative. ● 1968 - McNamara, World Bank President, emphasised the need for birth-control policies. 30% of Costa Ricans forcibly sterilised.

1973 - Hubert Humphrey - "Food is a form of power. Food is a special dimension of our diplomacy".
World Bank official - "We can only help the countries and people who have a better chance of survival, we let others die of hunger".

1980 - Arusha Initiative - "Money is power. This simple truth is valid for national and international relations. Those who wield world power, control money. An international monetary system is both a function and an instrument of prevailing power structures".

Militant and other parasites on the poll tax struggle

WHEN NEWS BROKE in late September that over 300,000 people in the Strathclyde region of Scotland hadn't paid a penny of their poll tax (and that many tens of thousands more had only paid one instal-lment and were already in arrears), reaction from the Labour Party leadership was swift and unambiguous.

"The blame for such high levels of non-payment", Labour local government spokesman David Blunkett explained, "must be placed squarely at this government's door". Blunkett wasn't lending last-minute Labour support to this inspiring level of poll tax resistance. He was doing his best to make it clear whose 'fault' Labour thought it was to that so many working class people felt angry enough to challenge the law and refuse to pay, despite the advice of his party.

Labour controlled Strathclyde region angrily refuted claims from Tory central office that it was the council's fault that non-payment levels were so high.

Revolt

Council finance convenor James Mullin took the suggestion that they hadn't attacked non-payment strongly enough, as a slur on the professionalism of his operation and the dedication of his staff. Downplaying the significance of the revolt Mullin calmly assured the media that he was "not concerned at this stage. The money is coming in. Non-payment figures will drop once we've sent out the reminders." After announcing plans to up the pressure on non-payers, he took the opportunity to restate his council's "sincere and total opposition to the Tory poll tax".

The Strathclyde figures are the latest proof that the strategy of building mass community based campaigns of poll tax non-payment is winning considerable support in working class areas in Scotland. It shows the willingness of tens of thousands of ordinary people to defy the law, and to mobilise on their estates to challenge the right of their local 'socialist' or Scottish Nationalist authority to rob them blind. And most of all it shows clearly that the attempts by the leaders of the Labour Party and trade union movement to defuse and demoralise the non-payment campaign - by claiming that there is no hope of victory - are failing.

But if the Strathclyde figures will help inspire confidence throughout Scotland, there remains an enormous threat to the potential success of the community-end of the anti-poll tax struggle. It's a threat that could wreck the chances of a confident and independent working class campaign of resistance winning itself a major victory.

That threat is the continuing involvement, and undoubted influence, of the authoritarian-Left: most notably, the damage being inflicted on the struggle by supporters of the Militant Tendency (publishers of Militant newspaper).

Events in Scotland could scarcely show more clearly how openly the Labour Party and its allies in the trade union movement are attacking the anti-poll tax struggle. These events prove clearly that the campaign must assert its independence from, and opposition to, Labour. But left-wing groups (like Militant) are trying to ensnare anger over the poll tax, seeking to direct energy into demanding the Labour bureaucracy take up the cudgels and fight on our behalf.

Tying the campaign to the very institutions that want to suffocate the possibility of successful action, is a recipe for certain defeat. But that, of course, would only worry Militant - and their ilk - if their reason for being involved in the campaign was to do with defeating the poll tax. But it isn't.

If we are to counter the effects of Militant's involvement, and help prevent action being derailed by them, we need to be able to expose just what it is that they're up to. That means understanding what their real objectives are, and why they have poured so many of their resources into the poll tax battle.

Thick

Obviously, Militant are not the only left-wing group involved, but as anyone involved in practically any local anti-poll tax group in the country will tell you, Militant supporters are thick on the ground, and nationally their involvement is streets ahead of their nearest Left-ist rivals.

So what are they about? Militant - who deny they are a political party - seek to change the Labour Party from within into a Marxist organisation that will win parliamentary power through the ballot box. They plan to then create their own particular brand of highly centralised 'state-socialism' by simply 'legislating it into existence' through their Commons majority. They have been a constant, though minor, irritation to successive Labour leaderships, practising a policy of 'entryism' - quietly

Anarchism in the Eastern Bloc

DESPITE MANY YEARS of repression, the anarchist movement in Eastern Europe is slowly and painfully re-emerging.

Many anarchists were executed, many disappeared into the prisons and concentration camps. The changing political atmosphere in the East, and the growing opposition to the regime, has given rise to new groups calling themselves anarchist.

We have criticisms to make of these new movements - some are deluded by pacifism, non-violence and the 'counter-culture', others seem to want to repeat all the old models of anarchism that have failed - anarcho-syndicalism for example.

But we must remember that these movements have emerged under great difficulty. It is the task of all serious anarchists to give moral and material support to the East European comrades, to make contact, visit, exchange papers, and engage in constructive debate. Through such a debate, and through their own developing practise, a credible movement can be re-constructed in Eastern Europe.

We ourselves must not adopt an arrogant, patronising attitude, but realise that we too can learn from the struggles taking place in Eastern Europe to create an anarchist alternative.

The Polish movement

THE 'NEW' POLITICS of 'Glasnost' seem to have had repercussions that the Soviet rulers did not forsee.

Amongst these is the development of a combative workers' movement, shown, for example, by the miners' strikes in the Ukraine and Siberia. Another repercussion is the development of anarchist and libertarian socialist groupings.

One of these groups is called Obsjina, which means 'Community'. The group was 'officially' founded in May 1987, though it existed for several years beforehand as an underground group. They edit an underground journal that comes out fortnightly under the same name. They publish an initial 120 copies, which are then sent out to fifty towns where they are re-copied, and so on - much in the manner in which most 'samizdat' (underground) journals have been produced in the the USSR.

The journal has correspondents in the main towns, and reports on strikes and demonstrations which the Party Press never talks about.

Most of the supporters of Obsjina are students, journalists and teachers, and they are in contact with workers through the Federation of Socialist Clubs and the Democratic Faction. There are many students involved, particulary history students, because they have discovered the truth about the past is not the one described in official histories.

Obsjina does not call itself 'anarchist'. It thinks that the essential aim is to achieve the communist programme - the disappearence of the State and its bureaucracy, the practise of federalism and self-organisation. The Russian anarchist thinkers like Bakunin and Kropotkin are their chief sources of inspiration.

The Democratic Faction is in close contact with Obsjina, and works inside the official Communist Youth organisation (Komsomol). This was unthinkable a few years ago, but under Glasnost the Komosomol does want to be seen as a monolithic organisation. This has given a semi-official status to the Democratic Faction, (though recently the Central Committee of Komsomol has announced that it was a menace to Komsomol and the Soviet State).

There is also the Confederation of Anarcho-syndicalists (KAS) which has 'A Cappella' - Polish anarchists applying their members in thirty towns. They too participate on other informal local groups.

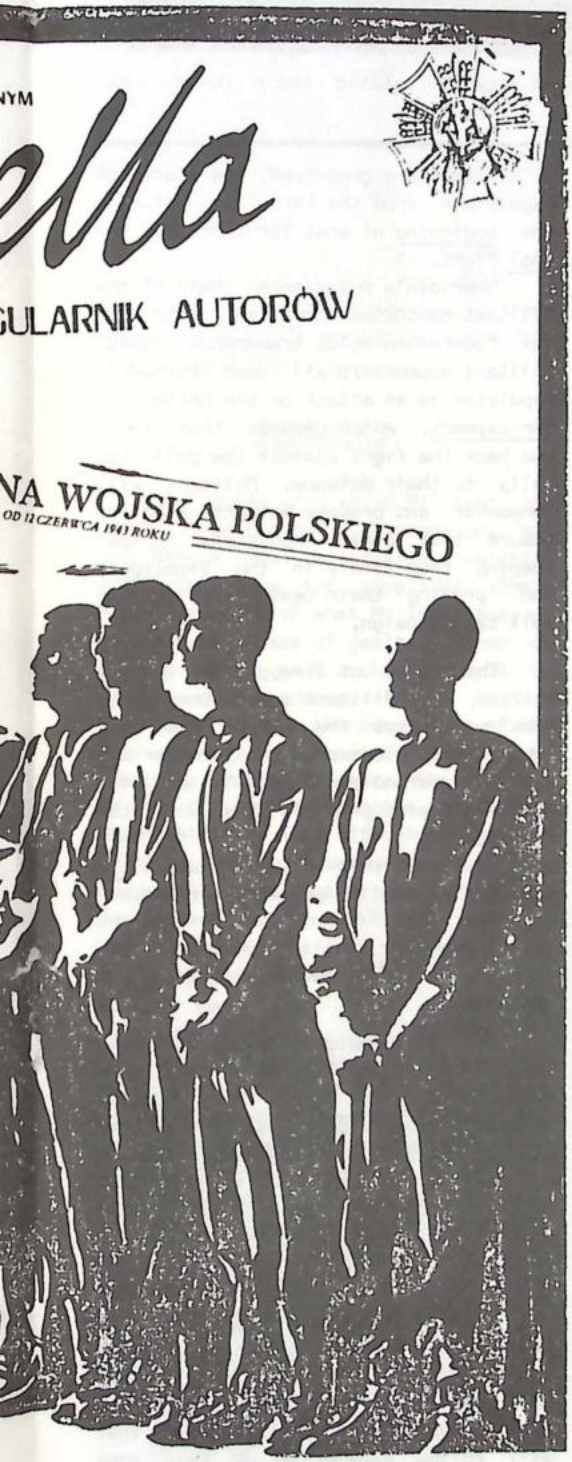
The Obsjina has called for an international conference of libertarians to be held this Autumn to help break down the isolation of the Russians comrades.

Outside of the developing movement, other occurences have been favourable articles on Kropotkin in the literary magazine Sovetskaya Kultura, and on Nestor Makhno in the literary paper Literaturnaya Gazeta. Makhno was an important figure in the anarchist movement which attempted to establish free communism in the Ukraine, fighting both Tzarists and Bolsheviks, before it was crushed by Lenin's Red Army.●



their politics to anti-war work.

Russian revolutionaries

THE 'REVOLUTION' OF August 1980 in Poland against the 'Communist' authorities was a catalyst for the re-emergence of anarchism, which had disappeared from view in the late 1940s.

It was in the student-world in particular, that attempts were made to recreate the movement. These attempts were not exclusively intellectual: some clubs of anarchist thought were founded, the most important being the Anarchist Self-Education Club 'Sigma', of Warsaw University.

The ideas of professor Leszek Nowak had some popularity. Some of the student movement was influenced by anarchism, in particular the NSZ (Independent Union of Students).

Anarchist

From August 1980 to December 1981 was the period of the rise of the independent union NSZZ Solidarnosc. Some of its members like Bujak in Warsaw were influenced to a certain extent by libertarian ideas, but soon the federal structure of Solidarnosc was rigidified, and centralisation developed in its midst. The military coup on December 13 1981 ended open activity, and the streets became the setting for clashes between State forces and the working class.

In this context, the Movement for an Alternative Society (RSA: Ruch Spoleczenstwa Alternatywnego) was founded in July 1983. In its paper Homek the RSA criticized the tactics of the Polish opposition, calling for a struggle against the military institution, and the total abolition of the Army.

It declared that "all power is bad... power must be abolished through building social organisation outside the State - outside of all States, not just the Communist State". A partisan of Nowak stated that "the only way to freedom which is open to citizens of socialist countries is to anarchise society".

In May 1985, the RSA urged demonstrators to resist the police who were attacking the crowd in Gdansk. A little later, the most highly-regarded underground journals like Przeglad Powszechny of Gdansk, and Tygodnik Powszechny of Warsaw announced the birth of an anarchist movement in Poland. Issue 6 of Przeglad Powzechny published an interview with 3 members of RSA who severely criticized the social and philosophical positions of Nowak, who they considered a 'quietist'.

However, RSA - working under difficult conditions, and with little in the way of funds - soon collapsed. An informal anarchist movement continued to work in various underground structures, and Homek continued to appear.

Anarchist ideas began to circulate amongst youth in the punk counter-culture. Several thousand leaflets on anti-militarism and anarchism were distributed at concerts by RSA members during 1983-5. New anarchist groups emerged: Pozinan RSA, Szczecim RSA, Independent Intiatives in Warsaw, Jutro ('Tomorrow') in Lodz, and many others.

Today, after the collapse of RSA, many anarchists are working within the Freedom and Peace Movement (WiP: Wolnoso i Pokoy). At first only the Gdansk group took aanrchsit positions, explained in their paper A Cappella. Now anarchist ideas have spread throughout WiP. WiP was principally working against compulsory conscription to the Army, but also took up ecological struggles, fought against the death penalty, and for 'free circulation' abroad.

Federal

Other groups exist outside WiP, for example the Warsaw group, which produced the paper Katatonia, linked to the Federation of Fighting Youth (FMW).

The latest initiative is an anarchist co-ordination: MA (Miedztmiastowka Anarchistyczma - 'Intercity Anarchist Liasion). The first leaflet put out by the organising group, called for the setting up of a federation, and for an end to isolation. Groups and individuals in 20 towns have given their support to MA, in Poznan, Szczecim, Wroclaw and Cracow, amongst others, despite the first conference being broken up by the police.

In the workplace too, there seems to be some development of anarchist activity. An anarchist paper Spartakus, is produced by dockers in Gdansk, and denounces the manoeuvres of Lech Waesa and his section of the leadership of Solidarnosc.●

POLL TAX PARASITES:

joining the Party and then kicking up a stink.

But as Kinnock's Policy Review has swept to one side the feeble forces of the Labour Left, they have found themselves unable even to shore up their traditional power base in the local constituency parties. When the dream of 'municipal socialism' came to an abrupt end with the abolition of the Metropolitan Authorities, it deepened the demoralisation that had followed the messy defeat of Liverpool's Militant-controlled Labour council, in the rate-capping struggle. They sank into the doldrums. Membership slumped, the paper's circulation crumbled. Things for the whole of the Labour-left looked grim.

Militant struggled on, desperate to find a new campaign that would give them the chance to re-group their forces, and that would provide cover for them to launch a major Labour Party membership drive, that could re-build them their power base.

Then came the poll tax. Militant's central committee under gurus Ted Grant and Peter Taaffe realised the potential that this held for the Tendency. It was decided that 'intervention' in the emerging poll tax campaign was to take priority above all other issues. Other minor campaigns were dropped. The decks were cleared.

Scratch

It was decided that the most fruitful area for finding party recruits (for both the Tendency and the Labour Party itself) would be in building 'community', as opposed to workplace, organisation. Militant's industrial base had never been very impressive, and pushing 'community' organisation - most of which needed building from scratch - gave Militant the opportunity to impose their own organisational forms on the campaign from the start.

It was overwhelming for that reason - and not because of political ideology - that the decision to build for 'mass community non-payment' was taken, in priority to workplace campaigning.

The intention, then, from the start was to use the growing resentment over the poll tax to push the issue of Labour Party membership, and to channel anger away from the need to build autonomous class action, and toward placing what were known to be futile demands on the Labour bureaucracy to 'take the lead'.

Scotland was to be their first battle ground. In most Scottish constituencies, Labour enjoy massive electoral support. But often, where the seats are safest, the active membership of the local Party branch is at its smallest. It's not difficult, therefore, for a determined band of 'entryists' to s a mini-coup, kick out the unsuspe old guard, and install their own su, porters in Branch positions. Stage one of this plan, means carving out some local-support on the ground. On the pretence of building support for the poll tax fight, Militant supporters went to work.

Door-to-door canvassing with poll tax materials netted good results. Slick sales talk won some people over not only to join Militant's brand new local 'anti-poll tax union', but to fill in a Labour Party membership card on the doorstep. The usual promise was that enough 'real' socialists could be won over to the Party, even 'spineless Kinnock' would have to stand up and fight the tax.

Alarm bells sounded at Labour Party headquarters in Walworth Road when suddenly bundle upon bundle of membership applications started pouring in from Scottish branches that no-one had heard a peep out of for years. Smelling a rat, Labour Party officials on several occasions have suspended local branches, while they investigate 'alleged irregularities' in the membership procedures.

This has been, of course, exactly what Militant have been hoping for. They are then able to draw anger and energy away from the poll tax campaign, into defending the branch against this 'witch-hunt' against 'socialists inside the Party'.

Militant could scarcely contain their delight when, in late September, their poll tax commander-in-chief Tommy Sheridan was finally expelled from the Scottish Labour Party. Their 'disbelief' and 'outrage' at him being booted out was, as always, well rehearsed. As far as Militant are concerned, the start of expulsions from the Party is actually the beginning of what for them is the real fight.

Sheridan's position as chair of the Militant-dominated Scottish Anti-Poll Tax Federation holds tremendous risks. Militant supporters will pose Sheridan's expulsion as an attack on the notion of non-payment, which demands that those who back the fight against the poll tax rally to their defence. Militant will manoeuver and provoke Walworth Road to ensure that other expulsions follow, keeping them firmly in the limelight, and 'proving' their centrality to the poll tax campaign.

The arena of struggle is neatly shifted into Militant's territory. The more vociferous the attacks from the Labour Party hierarchy, the 'greater the need to defend our leaders', and the tighter their grip on the poll tax campaign.

At least this is their plan - if they are allowed to get away with it.

Unfolds

As the campaign unfolds, so will the chronological list of demands they seek to rally the forces they control around. 'Labour councils: don't implement the poll tax', will be followed by demands that they don't fine non-payers. Once this fails, they will demand that Labour councils call off the bailiffs, and don't take non-payers to court. Once that it turn fails, they will demand that Labour councils don't send people to jail. And lastly, that Labour councils free those people they have imprisoned. The ritual condemnation of the Labour Party's 'sell-out' that will follow each stage of this programme, is as predictable and pre-planned as is the next demand in the list.

Soon after this list has been exhausted, Militant will decide there is little more mileage to be made out of the poll tax campaign, and - counting up the tidy pile of membership applications that their work has earned them - they will move onto more lucrative pastures, taking their footsoldier-supporters with them. As they pull out, they will attempt to shut down all the organisations they established or were in control of.

But surely, given the level of their involvement, if the poll tax campaign were lost, wouldn't that damage Militant's credibility and weaken their support? Not a bit of it. They will argue that if the fight went down to defeat, it certainly wasn't their fault. The blame will lie with the weak-willed leaders of the Labour Party and trade unions. If only they'd backed the fight we would have won. Next time, we'll have to press them even harder to support us...

Like their other 'colleagues' on the authoritarian-Left, the depth of their cynicism, is matched only by their determination to manipulate situations to their own advantage.

Jealousy

The speed with which Militant has moved in on the poll tax campaign, has left many a rival Left-faction watching dumbstruck from the sidelines. Their disagreements with what Militant are up to are more a case of jealousy, than of disgust. Given half a chance they'd be doing exactly the same.

So strong was the commitment of the Revolutionary Communist Party to defeating the poll tax, that within months of them launching a new front organisation to suck life-blood from the struggle - the 'Smash the Poll Tax Campaign' - they shut it down. They saw the extent to which Militant had got things sewn up, realised this would mean meagre pickings for themselves, and so moved back to more reliable 'recruitment-issues', like Ireland.

The tactics that Militant have employed in pursuit of their objectives have in themselves been highly damaging. On a local level, where they have been unable to seize control of local poll tax initiatives, they have set up their own parallel groups: appointing their own members to committees that award themselves the power to make decisions and speak on behalf of the whole local campaign. 'Rival' (ie independent, genuine) anti-poll tax groups have then often been squeezed out, ignored and, where possible, poached from.

In the early stages, Militant have often been careful to disguise their operations - calling public meetings about the poll tax in the name of ficticious 'community' groups, etc. They have packed out subsequent meetings with supporters, who've voted each other onto 'executive committees' who from then on seek to run the show. Their supporters 'offer' to act as contacts for the campaign, to take responsibility for compiling address lists, and so on. Once their stranglehold has been established, they let their true colours gradually emerge.

Machine

By swinging the resources of the party-machine into action, Militant have undoubtedly won themselves a significant power base in the poll tax campaign in Scotland, and have now set their sights on doing the same south of the border.

They are now trying to win support among local groups for the national front-organisation they are launching: the All-British Anti-Poll Tax Steering Committee (guess whose planning to do the steering...). They're currently trying to scare-off (or absorb) other groups attempting to establish similar federations, including the London Federation of Anti-Poll tax Groups. The London Federation's hope to 'work with' the Militant-Federation in organising practical projects (such as demonstrations) seems doomed from the start: Militant have no intention of sharing power with anyone!

Militant's interest in mobilising working class people is in building tightly-stewarded 'pressure groups' that exist simply to lobby the bureaucracies of the Labour and trade union movement, and that have no power of their own. They will do all they can to prevent the poll tax movement breaking free of the straitjacket of those bureaucracies, and asserting its own agenda.

Throughout the campaign Militant and the rest of the authoritarian-Left have rallied to provide cover for, and give credibility to, every attempt by the Labour/union bureaucracies to head off the fight. Rather than exposing absurb token actions - like last year's infamous 'tea-break against the poll tax' strike - as acts of wilful sabotage, Militant have enthusiastically endorsed them, suggesting simply that the TUC could 'go further'.

At every turn they have sought to take the initiative out of the hands of working class activists, and give it back to the very forces that want to destroy the chances of a real battle against the poll tax.

So what can be done? Firstly we need to remember that Militant's influence - and that of the rest of the authoritarian-Left - does not stretch through anything like the whole of the community-campaign.

We should be aware that many community poll tax groups have already told the parasites to pack their bags. We should be in there constantly exposing Militant's hidden agenda, and encouraging groups do have nothing to do with them and their ilk. And we should be highlighting the fact that the successes so far of the Scottish campaign have been despite - not because of - their attempts to highjack the struggle. Militant's claim to have 'built' the mass non-payment campaign is as laughable as the SNP's (Scottish National Party) hamfisted bid to take the credit.

As for organisation, we should argue that the power in local anti-poll tax groups is held at street-level, and that mandated delegates from small local groups, make decisions for the area campaign. Leaving power with an open meeting of 'activists' - answerable to non-one except themselves - is wide open to manipulation. Left-parties can easily arrange to 'pack-out' the meeting on a given night, and swing the vote their way.

There are already signs of a 'fierce backlash' growing against Militant's parasitism. Non-aligned activists in Edinburgh have already come together to plan "to attack Militant head on" over their attempted stitch-up of the Scottish poll tax federation, and to plan - if necessary - to break away and form a genuine, autonomous network.

Twinning

A new 'twinning' initiative, (launched by anarchists, libertarians and poll tax activists in England and Scotland) aiming to put Scottish and English/Welsh poll tax groups in direct touch with each other, is a welcome development - by-passing Militant's attempt to become the sole 'clearing-house' for such contact. Through it groups can pool experiences, exchange speakers, and build solidarity.

We must constantly be aware what Militant - and their like - are up to, and organise to prevent them from wrecking the fight. We can best do that by encouraging the anger that exists over the poll tax, to grow into organisation and action that remains directly in the hands of the only people capable of defeating the poll tax: the working class.●

Against the War

BAREFOOT GEN, Keiji Nakazawa; Penguin Original, 6.99.

PENGUIN BOOKS HAVE published a remarkable comic-strip story about life in Japan during the latter part of World War Two. First published in Japanese for children, it has been reprinted in other langauages, in order to demonstrate the full horror of war - particularly the devastation cause by the atom bombing of Hiroshima.

The book is absolutely gripping and can be read at a pace of knots. Its constant exposure of the violence of the militarised State, the cowardly brutality of its patriotic supporters, and the pressures to conform are clearly and frequently demonstrated.

War, militarism and nationalism had similar parallels in Britain with its hounding of conscientious objectors, and the internment of foreign nationals. Working class and peasant Japanese people, however, seemed to have suffered extreme privation and hunger as the nation's resources were directed to an ever more desperate war effort.

The actual devastation and suffering caused by the atom bomb is brought out in a very direct way. The reader is witnessing events as they happen.

Having praised it so far, there are some strange and worrying aspects to the book. For instance, extreme physical violence towards children by their fathers is treated as a normal, everyday occurence. The central character, the child Gen, for example, is variously punched by his father, and at one stage, strung up by a rope!

It is difficult to know whether these are true reflections of Japanese life in the 1940s (and perhaps now) or the product of the author's imagination. Equally, wife battering as shown in the book cannot in any sense be acceptable. In the book, though, women are generally presented as very strong characters.

Despite the above reservations, Barefoot Gen is very enjoyable, at times very funny, but definitely indespensible reading for those who want to stand up to militarism and its poison.●

Cambodian refugees

DURING WINTER 1978-9, after four years of Khmer Rouge bloodshed, Pol Pot's regime fell before the Vietnamese invasion.

Several hundreds of thousands of people, liberated from terror - but not from war and famine - fled towards the Thailand border. By December 1979, half a million had congregated there.

Very quickly, under the auspices of the Thai government and the United Nations, camps were set up. With the exception of Khao I Dong - under the control of the High Commission for Refugees of the United Nations - all the camps are controlled by different factions within the anti-Vietnamese resistance: Khmer Rouge, FLNPK (right-wing nationalists) and Sihanoukists (nationalist follwers of Prince Norodom Sihanouk).

The interests of the Thai government, of the anti-Vietnamese resistance, and of all those who support them (most notably the United States and China) combine to pin down the camp populations to an existence that is virtually that of prisoners.

All this in order to create a human strategic barrier against the Vietnamese, a firm base for the resistance, and to 'legitimize' the governmental coalition in exile - recognised to this day by the United Nations.

During the dry season 1984-5, the Vietnamese launched an offensive against the camps within Cambodian borders, in order to destroy them. In doing so, they forced the camp population across the border.

The Thai government does not recognise these populations as 'refugees' but as 'displaced persons', and they are robbed of even the most elementary 'human rights'. The Thai army - violent and corrupt - and the military fractions of the resistance, rule their camps as they wish, with indoctrination, militarisation and compulsory conscription, raising taxes on foodstuffs, etc.

The camps are rife with black marketeering, rackets and highway robbery. All of the camps are less than 8kms from the border, some only a few hundred meters away - within easy range of the Vietnamese cannon which have a range of 30kms.

One of the most perverse effects of international aid to the camps has been to contribute to the reconstruction of the Khmer Rouge's armed forces - to the extent that they may well be able to re-take power when the Vietnamese withdraw.

And for the displaced-poor and oppressed of Cambodia, that could mean leaving the misery of the camps, only to return to the horror of the 'killing fields'.●

Anarchy, Syndicalism and revolution

THE LETTER FROM PH (Organise! 16) responding to an article on rank and file potential (Organise! 14) tended to oversimplify, as did the original article.

PH feels, as I do, that improving pay and conditions at work are too central to the lives of generations of working class people to be dismissed as counter-revolutionary just because unions wage those struggles (the article might imply this).

If PH believes a revolutionary union could integrate that centrality with our final aim of libertarian communism, he should have shown how an anarcho-syndicalist union could really be revolutionary (it might want to be; it might think it is; but that doesn't mean it is). It does look like wishful thinking when such big gaps areleft in an argument.

However, several points remain to be made. A factor in the development of unions was the recognition that an organisation persisting in time across generations of workers would stand more chance of being able to retain advances made. Spontaneous groupings of workers would have to fight every battle over again, from scratch. This is not just an empirical, intellectual judgement - it is also engraved in the hearts of those families who have strong union traditions, remember what their recent ancestors suffered, and who no longer suffer quite so much.

So, to read that a demand for a 35 hour week (or any other union demand) is "really a demand for... more humane management" sounds fairly pathetic. Who else but an 'ultra-leftist' would describe the demand to live when faced with an armed copper's gun as "really a demand for a more humane police force"? Absurd and outrageous? Well it is an appropriate analogy.

I agree with the spirit of the ACF's analysis of unions, but it is spoilt if such miserable interpretations are possible. Less extreme generalisations might be wise.

In some contexts, unions have had positive effects including in some revolutionary periods. Of course unions always have serious shortcomings - every organisation of struggle has faults - and sometimes these are decisive. Even when unions so play positive roles the reasons can be external as much as anything else (eg if events move before the union has been completely crippled by elitism or bureaucratic inertia).

Anarcho-syndicalists, such as the Friends of Durutti in Spain, knew that a specific anarchist organisation was necessary. Revolutionary or anarcho-syndicalist unions need mass membership to be effective (in their own terms) - but most members would not be anarchists and would be able irreperably to change the theory and practice of the organisation.

Critically, unions cannot behave appropriately in times of revolution. Most critically, revolutionary periods have seen all maner of workplace organisation. What has been sorely lacking has been a clear and sufficiently loud, clear, consistent and respected voice from the heart of the working class arguing for free communism against the parties and power brokers.

That is what the ACF should aim to become, a task not made easier by unnecessarily alienating those in the union tradition.

You could argue that the whole history of working class struggle has been profoundly counter-revolutionary since it taught capitalism and the State how to beat us. It's true, in its way. But its not a political analysis, is it?

Unions will be around in one form or another until revolution triumphs. Sometimes they will have their uses, often they will be counter-productive. It is important that our political commitment is not devoted to them

- I hope the ACF continues to explain why, without resorting to simplistic generalisations that reduce complex matters to an illusory choice between good and evil.

Workplace obsessed?

I ENJOY ORGANISE!, which is an improvement on Virus and has the potential to be a good paper once you've finally sorted out your 'aims and principles' and applied them.

Your criticisms of anarcho-syndicalism, for example, seem to me to be far too vague. What is the 'fundamental nature of unionism'? Are we talking about bourgeois unionism or anarcho-syndicalist unionism? Why confuse the two? How would the ACF organise in industry?

Do you not accept that anarcho-syndicalists have learned the mistakes of Spain, et al, and that your workplace-obsessed view of anarcho-syndicalism is out of date?

Fraternally,

Editors reply: (With regard to the above two letters) As W.L. points out, "unions cannot behave appropriately in times of revolution", and we apply this critisism as much to syndicalist unions as to more obviously reformist trade union structures (See 'What is the potential of rank and file action' Organise! 14). This is not purely because we respond to anarco-syndicalists as 'workerists' as R.E. suggests, but because the syndicalist structure is not one that can automatically be shunted into arenas like 'community'or 'women's struggle' just because it's exponants have realised that resistance to the ruling class doesn't end at the point of production.

If the article in question makes the issue appear too simple, it's a problem of only having a limited amount of space. We hope the authors of the letters will be interested in attending our dayschool so we can look at the issues in greater depth.

Tin Tin

I'D LIKE TO briefly comment on the unfair review of the Tin-Tin story Breaking Free (Organise! 16).

Rather than the plot being implausible (ie a sponateous rank and file revolt against exploitation), there are in fact plently of historic examples of such happenings. The most recent revolt took place in Tiananmen Square, and what about Hungary in 1956 or Paris 1968?

If one was to point to a weakness in the story, it is the weakness of all such revolts. They threaten the system, but cannot - on the basis of pure spontaneity - overcome it. It is precisely at this point that anarchist propaganda (the 'leadership of ideas') is vital to signpost the way forward, and it is at this point that the story breaks off.

As regards another of the reviewer's criticisms, yes, racism, sexism and homophobia are dealt with in a brief and simplified way - how refreshing! How clear to those, especially the young, who come across these ideas for the first time.

Tin-Tin is fun. It is also good basic anarchist propaganda.

CP
London ACF

AUTHOR'S REPLY: WHEN refering to the plot of Breaking Free as "implausible", I meant in terms of the escalation of protest and action from to the death of a worker, to a revolutionary situation.

'Leadership of ideas' is vital, but to is organisation, and that is something Breaking Free neglects.

And while the approach to racism, homophobia and sexism may be "refreshing", it doesn't offer any tactics for challenging them - especially in their institutionalised forms.

Yes, Tin-Tin is fun, but it is still not serious propaganda.

Workers against apartheid

THE ISSUE OF workers sanctions is a contentious one in the anti-arpartheid movement. The idea of workers taking industrial action against South African imports and exports is one that makes the fight in Britain a class issue. If the campaign against apartheid is just one of consumer boycotts and moral outrage against racism, it is simply in the arena of the middle class do-gooders.

In Leicester, two workers at Granby Plastics told their boss that they would not work on an export order to South Africa for 'Nyloil', a product used in the mining industry. They were promptly sacked.

The point has been made that taking individual action against the economy of South Africa has no impact, and that they would have been better off backing down and remaining in work so that they could agitate about the issue amongst the workforce.

But the workers, Ross Galbraith and Gary Sherriff, were faced with a reactionary and racist workforce and had no luck whatsoever persuading them to take action against the order. They decided that they had to make a stand on their own.

The effect of the sackings has been to greatly increase the awareness of people in and around Leicester about what is happening in South Africa. The press coverage has been phenomenal, and the issue is being discussed in other workplaces. A march staged at 8:00 am on Thursday 12th October to the factory drew 100 people.

It is only by workers being prepared to make a stand on such issues that other workers get the confidence to do the same.

Support has come from many quarters in and around Leicester, including many anarchists. They need a lot more publicity, fund raising and support nationally, however, and they are always keen to travel and speak at meetings about the issue. The next major event will a march in Leicester on the 9th of December. The contact address is :-

Oligarchy?

REGARDS YOUR REPLY to RSW's letter about the issues raised by Michel's book 'Political Parties' (Organise! 16):

Firstly, Michel does not confuse anarchy with chaos when he states that anarchists organise "in defiance of their own principles".

By this, he meant that the pragmatic requirements of organising, and the psychological attributes and role requirements of those who make decisions, mean that all attempts at organisation except on a very small scale create oligarchies.

This "ironlaw of oligarchy" happens because effective decisions can only be made by small groups. The larger an organisation, the smaller the proportion of its members who can be active in running it. Further, large organisations require complicated rules, which give those who already wield power greater opportunities to impose their wishes on the rank-and-file.

It is in that sense that anarchists, concerned about these problems, organise in defiance of their own principles.

Regarding delegates, my copy of 'Political Parties' says that they "acquire a moral right to that office": RSW and Organise! misquoted this phrase as "require a moral right". I suspect this misquote led your answer astray.

With this strange phrase, Michel was emphasising that the aparthy and indifference of the great mass of people is linked to their need for guidance and direction. In a large and complex society, any change can evoke anxiety. So, the advantes of continuity and accumulated experience will often seem to outweigh the less tangible benefits of rotation - in the minds of delegates and non-delegates alike.

Michel depicts oligarchy as an inevitable feature of human society, not hierarchy, and he doesn't ignmore the social organisation of capitalism. He says that many features of society and human nature, which anarchist blame on capitalist social organisation, are actually nothing to do with capitalism. They arose inevitably as society became larger and more complex. This view need not imply any anthropological belief in the primacy of hierarchy and enterprise.

Michel equates oligarchy with injustice. He offers a simplistic critique of leaders and their personal qualities, and takes their presence in an organisation as proof that it is oligarchic - and therefore unjust. But he does raise problems for anarchists, in our organising and in our conception of the anarchist society. For example:

1) In a repressive state, the need for clandestine organisation heightens the tendency to oligarchy. What do we do about that?

2) When we become a mass movement, how can we make sure that any oligarchies which develop are accountable and/or impermanent?

3) Without money, forced labour or the free market, how do we check the power of groups/individuals who will co-ordinate the supply and distribution of resources?

Perhaps Michel is right, and so we should build an anarchism based on the recognition that oligarchy is inevitable? Is a society of overlapping oligarchies necessarily hierarchical? Perhaps access and accountability matter more than the elimination of all hierarchies? Maybe information technology can solve all these problems? Or maybe it can't and the green anarchists have been right all along?

We must seriously debate these issues. Neither anarchist ideology, nor the glib refusal to consider the elements of a working anarchist society lest we are though to be a vanguard, should stand in our way.

In solidarity,
JC

Organise! back issues

Back issues of Organise! - and its forerunner Virus - are available from ACF (London), c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1.

Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To acheive our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide, and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class.

We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

4. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

5. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to acheive anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

6. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part in its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism.

The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to acheive a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours.

The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never acheive this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

7. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisation will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

8. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called 'socialists' or 'communists' we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.●

THE ANARCHIST COMMUNIST FEDERATION DAYSCHOOL

ANARCHISM FOR THE 90s

Saturday December 2 1989
Conway Hall, Red Lion Square
London WC1
(Holborn tube)

FIND OUT MORE about the poltitics of anarchist communism, and the activities of the ACF, by coming to our day-school in London on Saturday December 2 1989.

We be examining both current, contemporary issues - like the struggle against the poll tax - and looking back at some lessons of history.

All our workshops will be introduced by speakers from the ACF, and will be followed by discussion and debate.

Here just some of what we'll be talking about:

MARXISM IN DECAY - For over a hundred years, Marxism has presented itself as the only true road to human emancipation. Yet the ideas of Marx are fundamentally authoritarian and ultimately counter-revolutionary.

This workshop will show why the Marxist obsession with the winning of State-power has enslaved whole peoples in the name of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat'.

WORKPLACE STRUGGLES - This workshop will examine traditional ways of organising against capitalism at the point of production - including trade unionism and syndicalism, and expose their failings.

It will argue for a different strategy for workplace struggles, and will stress the importance of the revolutionary process moving beyond purely economic/workplace battles.

POLL TAX - This workshop will examine the strength of 'community', and workplace, resistance to the poll tax so far, will look at the role of the Labour Party, the leadership of the trade union movement - and of the authoritarian-Left - in trying to wreck the emerging struggle, and will weigh up the options for the crucial months ahead.

PROGRAMME:

10.00-10.30 - Introduction, welcome & registration

10.00-12.00 - Marxism - a critique or - History of class struggle anarchism

12.00-1.00 - Lunch

1.00-3.00 - Anarchism in practice:
workshops on: Fighting the poll tax

ANARCHIST COMMUNIST FEDERATION

THE ANARCHIST COMMUNIST Federation is an organisation of class-struggle anarchists. Its structure is based on membership of area and interest groups and individuals. We have members in the folllowing areas:

Birmingham, Blackpool, Chesterfield, Coventry, Co Durham, Essex, Glasgow, Halifax, Kent, London, Newcastle, Northampton, Northumberland, Nottingham, Oxford, Rugby, Sheffield, Sussex, Swansea, and York.

The ACF promotes the building of a strong and active anarchist movement in Britain and internationally, and has contact with like-minded anarchists in other countries.

Write to: P. O. Box 263, Sheffield S1 3EX.

ORGANISE

ORGANISE! IS THE national magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF).

Organise! is a quarterly theoretical journal published in order to develop anarchist communist ideas. It aims to give a clear anarchist viewpoint on contemporary issues, and initiate debate on areas not normally covered by agitational journals.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and others open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us develop our ideas further. Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! - as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will endeavour to publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree withour A&Ps at all).

The deadlines for the May 1990 issue are March 17 for features and reviews, and March 31 for letters and the news section.

PRESS FUND

THIS ISSUE'S PRESS fund appeal has brought in just over 100 pounds, which - though good - is way below our target.

Several fund-raising events are in the pipeline - but we do really need more donations in from readers and those interested in supporting Organise!.

The ACF has set-up as Publications Commission to examine the possibility of producing an agitational paper, and of improving the size and frequency of Organise!. But whatever plans we come up with, we'll need help in funding them - which is where the Press Fund comes in.

Our target for this issue remains 250 pounds. If you can help us towards that target, please send donations to:

THE ACF'S RECENT dayschool, held in London, was attended by about seventy people. Most of those present were defending anarchist/communist, or left-communist positions, although a few pro-Bolshevik organisations were also 'represented'.

The discussions during the day were based around five workshops presented by ACF members, examining the history of class struggle anarchism, Marxism, the poll tax, racism and workplace struggles.

The diversity of views expressed by people who came made the discussions lively. It's clearly necessary to thrash out areas of disagreement between revolutionaries if we are to achieve tactical unity in struggle, and we hope that the day was useful in providing an arena for this.

It was certainly positive in clarifying some areas of agreement between those present; information was exchanged and some possibilities for more co-ordinated activity were examined.

Since we feel the dayschool was such a success, we are planning another one later in the year.

The contents of part of the dayschool's polltax workshop paper will be covered in our forthcoming pamphlet on the issue, and the text may also be printed in it's entirety for wider distribution.

As well as the poll tax pamphlet, we have several others in the pipeline. The nearest to completion is the text of a speech on "the myth of Labour's socialism", which was presented by an ACF member at meetings in several towns last year.

The production of 'propaganda' continues to be a major aspect of our political activity as an organisation. Our recent national conference established a publication's commission, to examine the possibility of producing an agitational paper as well as Organise!.

We are currently clarifying our possition on Ireland (in particular the connection between anti-imperialism and nationalism), and our recent national conference set up a commission on Ireland, which will write a pamphlet examining questions arising from the struggle there.

Other major discussions within the ACF at present concern the relationship of sexism and racism to the class struggle, and how sexism and racism should be fought in practice. Our recent conference made some progress in clarifying our possition, as we agreed to abandon the use of the term 'patriarchy' as a separate social system. We will continue to critically reexamine our theory and activity, and welcome criticism and ideas from others in letters to Organise!.

London ACF holds discussion meetings on the first Thursday of every month at 8pm at the Marchmont Community Centre, Marchmont St, London WC1 (nearest tube Holborn).

Copies of London ACF's Common Cause broadsheet are available free - with an sae - from the London address.

999 crews move onto the offensive

AS THE AMBULANCE pay dispute enters its fifth month, there are encouraging signs of a major rift developing between the striking crews and the union's negotiators.

At stations throughout the country, demands have been growing for a major escalation of the action: breaking with NUPE's 'official' strategy of relying on passive public support, by going all-out onto the offensive.

After 20 weeks - suspended without pay - ambulance workers have seen the dispute reach an impasse. They realise that all the union is offering to break the deadlock, are more 'heartfelt appeals' to the Tories to take note of public opinion.

Ambulance workers' frustration with the union's strategy, grew sharply in early January when NUPE's chief negotiator Roger Poole decided to ditch key elements of the crews' claim - a full 11.4% rise, pay-linkage to other 'emergency services', and a permanent pay formula - in yet another 'final' bid to bring Health Secretary Kenneth Clarke back to the table for talks.

Time and again, the union has shown its 'flexibility, and eagerness to stitch up a quick compromise deal with Clarke - well short of their 'official' public claim - but he has repeatedly rebuffed them.

The union seems genuinely surprised by Clarke's 'intransigence'. Poole has made clear the union's willingness to agree (to what in practice would be) a 'no strike' guarantee - if Clarke will only deliver an ongoing pay review formula. Having failed to sell their members the derisory 6.5% offer last year, NUPE officials have publicly stated that they 'never want to have to go through another ambulance dispute'.

Deal

In pleading with the government to let the claim go to binding arbitration, NUPE has portrayed ACAS not as part of the bosses' pay apparatus, but as an independent, neutral third-party who can be relied upon for a 'just settlement'.

The government hope to decisively defeat the ambulance crews and - with the help of the union - enforce a minimal pay-rise on them, to set a benchmark for the coming round of pay negotiations with hundreds of thousands of other public sector workers.

A major pay victory for ambulance staff would encourage the nurses, civil servants, teachers and doctors (whose pay rounds open on April 1) to press ahead with higher wage demands - and so threaten the government's 'anti-inflationary' pay-restraint plans.

It's the union's hopeless, dead-end strategy that has encouraged crews to begin to take matters into their own hands.

Some ambulance stations have again decided only to take calls direct from the public, hospitals and doctors - and not those passed to them by 999 controllers. Other crews are planning to re-occupy their depots.

What's characterised the dispute so far has been the constant battle between crews determined to keep an accident and emergency service running, and health service chiefs determined to stop them. While suspended crews have worked double-shifts without pay, ambulance bosses have lifted insurance cover on vehicles to stop crews leaving their stations; they've confiscated keys and removed batteries. They've ordered telephone lines to ambulance stations be cut. Several have threatened court action against any crew that responds to an emergency call.

The stand-in 'emergency service' being run by the army and police, has left a steady catalogue of fatalities in its wake. Hospital consultants report a 'significant increase' in the number of patients found to be dead on arrival.

At least three people have died in army ambulance road smashes - as untrained squaddies try to navigate tight city-streets at speed.

Bosses who've suspended crews have had no hesitation in calling them out on duty, when the army service is caught out of its depth. After picking up the pieces at incidents often made worse by the army's incompetence, crews have been immediately re-suspended on their return to station. The callous cynicism ambulance bosses have displayed over this has been beneath contempt.

Now some stations - in London and elsewhere - having begun balloting on all-out strike action: including the withdrawal of all emergency cover. But it's unclear (as we write this) whether crews plan to continue answering calls direct from the public or not - different stations appear to saying different things.

Push

While the moves towards all-out action reflect the growing militancy of ambulance crews, and their willingness to push beyond the constraints of the union, its a strategy fraught with dangers and contradictions.

An absolute strike might just force the Tories to cave in and come up with a bit more money - but it could also threaten the lives of working class people in need of emergency medical help, and undermine support for the kind of effective class action that would win the full claim.

Ambulance crews work in a service industry vital to other working class people - and the kind of strike action they can mount is different to that open to - say - car workers.

Ultimately, an isolated all-out strike by ambulance crews is industrial action still stuck within the 'logic' of militant 'trade unionism'. Why must they fight alone?

Crews would do better to tackle a far bigger obstacle to them winning themselves a swift victory: their continuing - union-enforced - isolation.

Linkage

Roger Poole has made it clear throughout the dispute that the union regard ambulance workers as a 'special case'. He's emphasised that the union would in no way use a 'fair settlement' for ambulance workers, as a leverage to improve other health workers pay settlements.

While huge support for the crews' pay-fight exists right across the health service, and beyond, no real attempts have yet been made to mobilise that support into effective solidarity action.

Crews' growing disgust with their union, could be used as the basis for appealing directly to other health service workers to strike in support of both the ambulance workers and their imminent pay demands.

The widespread discontent that exists in the health service - from nurses bitter over regrading, staff threatened by competitive tendering, to opposition to the opt-out proposals - means there's a real basis for spreading the ambulance workers dispute, throughout the service.

In place of the competing union structures that will inevitably try to block such moves, open strike committees should be set-up to organise the most wide-scale plan of action possible.

A generalised pay-revolt throughout the whole of the health service, is exactly what neither the government - nor the unions - want to be faced with.

Spread

There have already been examples of industrial action in support of the crews - not just limited to the health service. In London on December 6, construction workers, local government workers, teachers, bus drivers, and engineers joined in a day of action. Rallies linking all health workers have been held at some London hospitals. Some Telecom engineers have refused to cut phone links to ambulance depots.

All of these examples are just a glimpse of the kind of action that is possible, if crews dump the divisive and damaging strategy of their union, and start to take direct control of the dispute themselves.

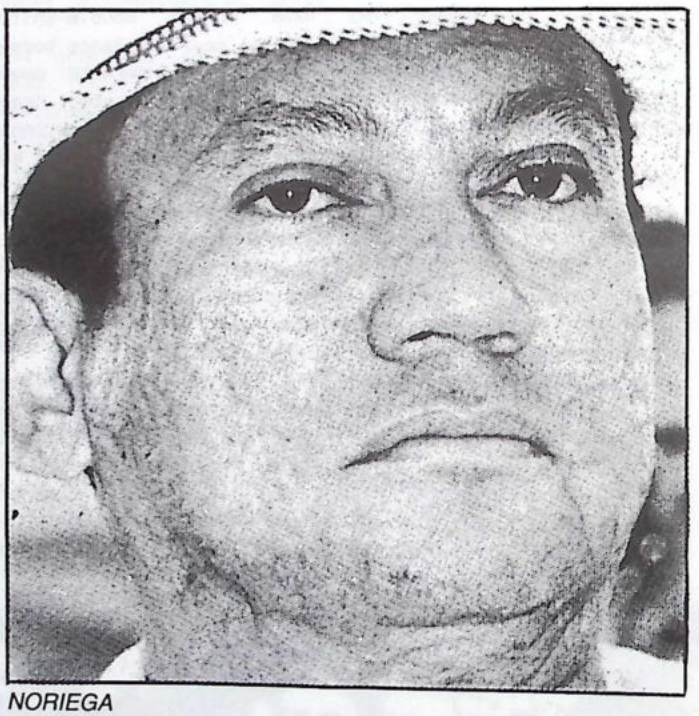
With the government feeling under increasing pressure from the simmering pay revolt (growing at Fords and elsewhere), victory for the ambulance workers could trigger cross-industry wage demands that would wreck all the Tories hopes of 'pay restraint'.

US topple their Panamanian puppet

THE EVENTS SURROUNDING the invasion of Panama by US troops on December 20 have again uncovered the role of the CIA as a major part of American imperialist policy. They have also made obvious the power of the Catholic church in Latin American politics.

George Bush declared the objectives of 'Operation Just Cause', which involved the transporting in of 7000 troops (supplementing the 13000 already stationed in Panama), as protecting US lives, honouring the canal treaty, restoring democracy, and bringing General Noriega to trial on drugs charges.

However for years the US have been happy to support the Panamanian dictatorships of first Omar Torrijos and then Noriega himself. Bush as head of the CIA had numerous meetings with Noriega, concerning military matters as well as drugs trafficking, which emerged in the Iran-Contra affair.



NORIEGA

Trained

Noriega was courted both as an informant on leftist activities in Central America and as a military ally. He was in fact trained in military intelligence by the US in 1967 and has supported the US in ventures ranging from the supply of arms and intelligence to the Contras in Nicaragua, to protecting the Shah of Iran for four months immediately after the 'Islamic revolution' in 1979.

The real reason for the invasion and this apparent turnaround by the US is more to do with the fact that according to the Panama Canal Treaty signed by Carter in 1979, control of the canal is due to be returned to the Panamanian government at the end of 1999. In spite of his usefulness to America, Noriega was never the most reliable of allies; he was also trading secrets, technology and arms with Cuba, the Sandinistas, the Eastern Bloc, Palastine, Libya and Syria, even as far as tipping Castro before the US invasion of Grenada.

This was known and tolerated but the last straw came in 1985 when Noriega refused to back America directly against the Nicaraguan government, and almost immediately drugs allegations appeared in the US press. The US is certainly not prepared to give over control of the canal to an unreliable and powerful regime, and required either a compliant puppet government or a reason to reverse the Treaty in the face of tyranny.

The invasion succeeded not only in deposing Noriega but also ensured the installation of such a government in the name of Guillermo Endara, who lost last May's elections due to a rigged ballot.

Church

The churches position in this is less clear. When Noriega entered the Vatican Embassy on Christmas Eve, the Vatican could not wait to get him out. How he stayed so long is probably for two reasons. Firstly the Catholic church is seen as one of the guardians against US imperialism, for instance in El Salvador where some church leaders have gained support of the left (and the left in Britain in some cases). It could not be seen to be giving in freely to an "occupying power" and compromise relations with other Latin American states. Secondly the church is well known for its worldwide money laundering activities including those through Panamanian companies as became apparent during the Banco Ambrosiano scandal and the mysterious death of Vatican linked banker Roberto Calvi, who was found hanging in London from Blackfriars Bridge in 1982. Noriega would be in a good position to make things difficult for Vatican business. Therefore it is also seems likely that US call for the freezing by European banks of accounts controlled by Noriega, on the very same day as his entry to the nunciature, was more to do with threatening the Vatican who would stand to lose financially by investigations into banking activities. Money talks, while on the surface both sides argue morality.

Democracy, it is said, is now restored. What the media does not like to say is during the invasion, far from celebrating in the streets the end of a corrupt dictatorship, the working class were busy looting shops and luxury apartments and Endara was forced to mark the beginning his rule by declaring an overnight curfew.

Hong Kong hypocrisy

WHILST WESTERN GOVERNMENTS are welcoming with open arms the so called "Refugees from Communism" of Eastern Europe, there is an ongoing situation in Hong Kong where the British government is forcibly sending back Vietnamese immigrants, and preparing for the hand over of the colony to China in 1997.

Past years have seen the exodus of thousands of 'boat people' from Vietnam, to escape the poverty and famine caused by the war, and the economic restrictions imposed by the US afterwards. They also hoped to escape the political repression of the ruling parties - many refugees are fearful for their lives should they return. In November 1989 the British government announced its plans to forcibly repatriate 39,000 of the 57,000 boat people living in Hong Kong refugee camps. In these concentration camps, far from extolling the 'goodwill' of the West, the authorities have subjected the Vietnamese to food shortages and there have been outbreaks of cholera. Riot police have been sent in to put down any attempts by the people to defend themselves against being dragged away against their will.

Handover

At the same time the government has announced its intention to give entry rights to Britain for up to 50,000 'important' people and their families (250,000 in total), when Hong Kong becomes part of China in 1997. These include the top business people, civil servants and the police.

The hypocrisy here is clear. It's all a question of economic worth. Britain and China both want to inherit the top people and ignore the rest, and this is why China is extremely unhappy about the British legislation. As for refugees, they are worth nothing.

In Britain, some politicians have used the situation to argue for even stricter immigration laws. Tory back-benchers like Norman Tebbit have gone against the government, worried that being 'soft' on immigration of any sort will lose them support in the next General Election, saying that Britain never wanted a multicultural society. Others are using the opportunity to argue against the handing over of Hong Kong to a 'communist' power. Labour's Shadow Foreign Secretary, Gerald Kaufman also spoke out against immigration from Hong Kong.

Racism has always been used by the ruling class to divert our attention away from real issues. When the capitalists need cheap or skilled labour at home, immigration is not a problem - hence the recent welcoming of Eastern Europeans by the West, and 'valuable' Hong Kong and South African professionals.

When the labour is no longer needed, racism is used to section out part of the working class for scapegoating. Their aim is to prevent us seeing that the capitalist class is international, and we can only fight them as a united international working class.

New ACF pamphlet:

Beating the poll tax

Published in mid-February, with the arrival of poll tax bills in England and Wales just a few weeks away, this new ACF pamphlet outlines the kind of collective class action that can crush the Community Charge.

It examines the strength of poll tax resistance in Scotland so far - and exposes the role of the Labour Party in trying to put down this revolt.

It explains the objectives that lie behind the poll tax, and the cynical way whole sections of the Left have tried to move in on, and suffocate, the growing opposition to it.

This is a brand-new pamphlet, completely revised and updated.

The real October of the workers and peasants

Libertarian communists criticise the current events in the Eastern Bloc from an entirely different starting point to those who describe the Soviet Union as a 'degenerate workers state'.

It was not just the 'evils of Stalinism' that 'corrupted' the 1917 revolution, leading to the necessary overthrow of dictatorships over the whole soviet sphere last year. Elitism, lack of accountability and brutal repression are the inevitable outcome when a Bolshevik party takes power.

This article, written only 10 years after the October Revolution by one of its most enthusiastic participants and virulent critics, shows the inherently authoritarian and capitalist nature of Bolshevism. It puts the current events behind the iron curtain in their true perspective. It also bemoans the abscence of an influential organisation capable of putting across truly revolutionary ideas in 1917, a criticism as relevant today to the situation in the Eastern Bloc.

This article was translated and published in 1974 by the Organisation of Revolutionary Anarchists, in London. It has been edited by the ACF.

THE TWO OCTOBERS, BY PIOTR ARCHINOV

THE VICTORIOUS REVOLUTION of the workers and peasants in 1917 was legally established in the Bolshevik calender as the October Revolution, but this is only partly the case.

Decisive

In October 1917 the workers and peasants of Russia surmounted a colossal obstacle in the development of their Revolution. They abolished the normal power of the capitalist class, but even before that they achieved something of equal revolutionary importance and perhaps even more fundamental. By taking the economic power of the capitalist class, and the land from it's country owners, they achieved the right to free and uncontrolled work in the towns, if not total control of the factories.

Consequently, it was well before October that the revolutionary workers destroyed the base of capitalism. All that was left was its superstructure. If there had not been this general expropriation of capitalism by the workers, the destruction of the bourgeois state machine would not have have succeeded in any way. The resistance of the owners would have been much stronger. On the other hand, the objectives of the social revolution in October were not limited to the overthrow of capitalist power. The workers faced a long period of practical development in social self-management, but it was to fail in the following years.

Therefore, in considering the evolution of the Russian socialist Revolution as a whole, October appears only as a stage, although powerful and decisive. That is why October does not by itself represent the whole social revolution. In thinking of the victorious October days, one must consider those historical circumstances as determined by the Russian social revolution.

Agrarian

Another no less important peculiarity is that October has two meanings- that of the working masses (including the Anarchist Communists) who participated in the social revolution, and that of the political party that captured power from this aspiration to social revolution, which betrayed and stifled all further development. An enormous gulf exists between these two interpretations of October. The October of the workers and peasants meant the suppression of the power of the parasite classes in the name of equality and self management. The Bolshevik October meant the conquest of power by the party of the revolutionary intelligentsia, and the installation of 'State Socialism' with its 'socialist' methods of governing the masses.

THE WORKERS' OCTOBER

The February Revolution caught the different revolutionary parties in complete disarray, and without any doubt they were considerably surprised by the profound social character of the dawning revolution. At first, no one except the Anarchists wanted to believe it. The Bolshevik Party, which made out it always expressed the most radical aspirations of the working class, could not go beyond the limits of the bourgeois revolution in its aims.

Bolsheviks

It was only at the April conference that they asked themselves what was really happening in Russia. Was it only the overthrow of Tsarism, or was the Revolution going further - as far as the overthrow of capitalism? This eventually threw up the question of what tactics to employ. Lenin became conscious of the social character of the revolution before the other Bolsheviks, and emphasized the necessity of seizing power.

He saw a decisive advance in the workers and peasants movement which was increasingly undermining the industrial and rural bourgeois foundations. A unanimous agreement on these questions could not be reached even up to the October days. The Party maneouvred all this time between the social slogans of the masses and the conception of a social-democratic revolution. Whilst not opposing the slogan of the petit- and grand-bougeoisie for a Constituent Assembly, the Party did its best to control the masses, striving to keep up with their ever increasing pace.

During this time, the workers marched impetuously forward, relentlessly running their enemies of both left and right into the ground. The big rural landowners began to evacuate the countryside, fleeing from the insurgent peasantry and seeking protection for themselves and their possessions in the towns. Meanwhile, the peasantry began a direct redistribution of the land, and did not want to hear of peaceful co-exsistence with the landlords. In the towns as well, a sudden change took place between the workers and the owners of industry. Workers' committees sprang up in every industry, intervening directly in production, taking it out of the hands of the owners. Thus in different parts of the country, the workers got down to the socialisation of industry.

Soviets

Simultaneously, all of revolutionary Russia was covered with a network of workers' and peasants' soviets, which began to function as organs of self-management. They developed, prolonged, and defended the Revolution. Capitalist rule and order still existed nominally in the country, but a vast system of social and economic workers' self-management was being created alongside it.

By their very appearance, this regime of soviets and factory committees threatened the state system with destruction. It must be made clear that the birth and development of the soviets and factory committees had nothing to do with authoritarian principles. On the contrary, they were in the full sense of the term organs of social and economic self-management and were opposed to the state machine which sought to direct the masses, and they prepared for a decisive battle against it.

"The factories to the workers, the land to the peasants" - these were the slogans by which the revolutionary masses of town and country participated in the defeat of the state machine of the possessing classes in the name of a new social system which was based on factory committees and the economic and social soviets. These catch-words circulated from one end of workers' Russia to the other, deeply affecting the direct action against the coalition government.

October

As was explained above, the workers and peasants had already worked towards the entire reconstruction of the industrial and agrarian system of Russia before October 1917. The agrarian question was virtually solved by the poor peasants as early as June-September 1917, and the urban workers too had seized the means of production, and put social and economic self-management into operation. The October revolution of the workers overthrew the last and the greatest obstacle to their revolution - the state power of the owning classes, already defeated and disorganised.

This last move paved the way for the full achievement of the social revolution, the creative reconstruction of society already pointed at by the workers in the preceding months. That is the October of the workers and peasants. It meant a powerful attempt by the exploited manual workers to destroy totally the foundations of capitalist society, and to build a workers society based on the principles of equality, independence and self-management of the towns and countryside.

However, this October did not reach its natural conclusion. It was violently interupted by the October of the Bolsheviks, who progressively extended their dictatorship throughout the country.

THE BOLSHEVIK OCTOBER

All the statist parties, including the Bolsheviks, limited the boundaries of the Russian revolution to the installation a social democratic regime. It was only when the workers and peasants of all Russia began to shake the agraro-bourgeois order, when the social revolution proved to be an irreversible historical fact, that the Bolsheviks began discussing the social character of the revolution, and the consequent necessity of modifying their tactics. There was no unanimity in the party on the questions of the character and orientation of the events that had taken place, even up to October. Furthermore, the October Revolution as well as the events which followed developed while the Central Committee of the party was divided into two tendencies.

Lenin

Whilst one part of the Central Committee, headed by Lenin, foresaw the inevitable ocial revolution and proposed preparation for the seizure of power, the other tendency, led by Zinoniev and Kamenev, denounced the attempt at social revolution as adventurist, and went no further than calling for support of the Constituent Assembly in which the Bolsheviks would occupy the seats furthest to the Left. Lenin's point of view prevailed, and the Party began to mobilize its forces in case of a decisive struggle by the masses against the Constituent Assembly.

The Party threw itself into infiltrating the factory

While the mass of workers considered them to be the organs of social and economic self-management, the committees and the soviets of the workers' deputies, doing its best to obtain the most mandates possible in order to control their actions. Nevertheless, the Bolsheviks conception of, and approach to, the soviets and factory committees was fundamentaly different to that of the masses.

Bolshevik Party looked on them as the means by which it was possible to snatch the power of the sinking bourgeoisie, and afterwards to use this power to serve the interests of the Party. Thus an enormous difference was revealed between the revolutionary masses and the Bolshevik Party in their ideas and meaning of October.

In the first case, it was the question of the defeat of power, being replaced by workers' and peasants' soviets. In the second case, it was the question of seizing power and subordinating all revolutionary forces to the Party. This divergence played a fatal role in determining the future course of the Russian Revolution.

Power

The Bolshevik's success is explained by their ability to substitute the idea of a Soviet power for the social revolution and the social emancipation of the masses. For them, these two ideas appear as non-contradictory for it was possible to understand Soviet power as the power of the soviets, and this allowed them to substitute the idea of Soviet power for that of the Revolution. Nevertheless, in their realisation and consequences, these ideas were in violent contradiction with each other.

The conception of Soviet power incarnated in the Bolshevik state, was transformed into an traditional bourgoise power, concentrated in the hands of a few individuals who subjected to their authority all that was fundamental and most powerful in the life of the people - the

Peter Arshinov (1887?-1937)

THE BREATHTAKING EVENTS of the last few months in Eastern Europe seem to have taken everyone by surprise. There have been mass demonstrations in Czechoslovakia, as hundreds of thousands of people took to the streets in Prague. The Berlin Wall, that hated symbol of the Cold War, has been physically destroyed and the border restrictions between East and West Germany have been relaxed.

Poland has seen a non-'Communist' participation in the government for the first time since the Second World War. And most dramatic of all, Romania has seen the demise of Ceaucescu and his corrupt Stalinist regime, as civil war broke out at the end of last year.

Who could have predicted - perhaps only six months ago - that one by one the Stalinist regimes of Eastern Europe would begin to crumble, and then, with the accelerating pace of change, totter on the edge of collapse.

However, despite the scale, pace and suddeness of these changes, it is possible to trace their origin in the events that have been shaping Europe since Stalin took power in Russia at the end of the 1920s.

Stalin instigated a series of policies that, in many ways, were the logical extension of Trotsky's 'War Communism'. Stalin, with the full backing of the 'Communist' Party, forcibly collectivised agriculture and instigated a massive industrial programme designed to 'modernise' the Russian economy. This was the ultimate expression of State power, a planned (or command) economy that was planned not by the working class who would do the work and need the products, but by the bureaucrats and gurus of the 'Communist' Party.

Worries

Until very recently, nothing much had changed in Russia, but it became increasingly obvious that the Russian economy, and those modelled on it in the Eastern Bloc, had failed even in the most basic terms : shops were empty, there were endless queues for bread, meat and other basic foodstuffs, and 'luxuries' (like warm clothes and shoes that would fit) were in even shorter supply.

This was all the legacy of Stalin's programme. Far from providing for the Russian people, Stalin's 'Socialism in one Country' had led to ridiculous and unplanned shortages and surpluses: anarchists have always argued that this must be the result when production and distribution are 'planned' by a centralised State, rather than by the full participation of the working class.

As Nikolai Shmelyev put it (ironically, in this context!), "Attempts to establish 100% control over everything lead to such spontaneity, to such an uncontrollable situation, that all anarchy (sic) becomes a paragon of order by comparison".

Party

It was clear to the 'Communist' Party that something had to be done if they were to retain credibility and power. But the inertia of the bureaucracy (which resisted all attempts at change), the enormous expenditure on arms that was required to finance the cold war, and the sheer stagnation of the Russian economy made any reforms extremely difficult to implement.

Added to this, previous reforms had failed. The events of 1956 in Hungary, and of 1968 in Czechoslovakia were witness to this. In both cases, it was not because Moscow wanted to crush reform movements in these countries that it sent in the troops, but because the reforms that it needed to revitalise the economy of the Eastern Bloc were so much less than the aspirations of the working class of these countries. People simply didn't listen to the reformers and given the hint of a chance, decided to take matters into their own hands. Moscow, fearful of a working class revolution toppling their regime, crushed the rebellions by armed force.

When Gorbachev came to power in 1985, he saw that for economic reform to be successful, political reform under

PEO

the guise of 'democratisation' would be necessary to overcome the inertia of the bureaucracy and the stagnation of the economy.

His hope was that this would lead to the rejuvenation of the economy, and thus secure the continuing dictatorship of the 'Communist' Party, and yet further strengthen it by increasing its economic muscle. It is this that is the driving motive behind 'perestroika' (or 'restructuring'), not some miraculous sudden abjuration of Stalinist doctrine.

Authority

Gorbachev's other well-known policy, 'glasnost' (or 'openness') is another vital part of this plan. If the Russian economy is to be reconstructed, Gorbachev will need to court the goodwill of Western governments to prepare the way for introducing 'free market' techniques. 'Glasnost', both within Russia and the world at large, is an integral part of this process. So, Gorbachev has broken with Stalinism, but he has absolutely no intention of allowing his class, the ruling class, to fall from power, nor any weakening of the CPSU as a leading party in Russia itself.

It is against this backdrop that we must see the events of the last few months in Eastern Europe. The 'Communist' governments of these countries have, since WWII, been the satellites of Moscow. They have been little but puppets, following Moscows line in all of their policies. Gorbachev and his supporters are themselves part of this same bureaucracy, and the reforms that they have forced through in order to introduce 'market forces' and retain power have lessened the overt oppression of the Soviet State, and have in turn created a 'space' into which protests could move throughout the Eastern Bloc.

The picture of 'peoples revolutions' that have toppled these regimes, a picture that has been put about by Western media and politicians, is quite simply wrong. We must ask, what is the difference between now and Hungary 1956, Czechoslovakia 1968, Tianamen Square 1989 ? The answer is: nothing ! Are we really to believe that a few mass protests could not be crushed by the regime if they wanted to ? No, it is precisely because Gorbachev sees these reforms as necessary that the room for these protests has been created by the bureaucracy, and why Gorbachev's supporters in the Politburos of these countries have not allowed the remaining Stalinist conservatives to crush them. Indeed, Gorbachev has made it clear that Russia will not back internal military action by the leaderships of these countries, a strategy not without its risks.

When we look at the changes that have occured in each country, we can see exactly how successful this has been. Poland was the first country to break with Stalinism when Solidarity formed a coalition government with the 'Communists' in the middle of last year.

But this 'deal' - which has finally seen Solidarity show its true colours as the ruler of the Polish working class, not the instrument of its emancipation - has left the 'Communists' in charge of the army and the security forces, much of the media, and allowed them the continued 'right' to impose martial law should they choose to do so. A few prominent 'Communists' may have been removed, but they have been replaced with new rulers in collusion with many of the old regime.

Revolt

The most striking example of how little these changes have to offer the working class has come with the 'revolution' in Romania. Despite the blood of many ordinary Romanians having been spilt to end Ceacescus dictatorship, little has changed.

It has become clear that even before the demonstrations in Timisoara and Bucharest, the so-called 'National Salvation Front' was meeting in secret sessions, ready to seize power should the opportunity present itself - in one of these sessions, the head of the Securitate was even present! The army, quick to protect its own interests, only sided with the people when it became clear that they could direct and control events to their own designs.

There can be no doubt that there was much sacrifice and bravery in the brief but bloody civil war that ensued, but after the victory, bought with working class blood, it was the political opportunists of the 'National Salvation Front' who seized power, not the people of Romania. They soon began to co-operate with 'dissenting' 'Communists' from Ceaucescus regime, all of whom were supporters and beneficiaries of his brutality. At the moment of writing, all this resembles a 'coup' rather than a revolution.

Terrorise

Meanwhile, the army remained their guarantor to power, and took to guarding the Securitate building in Bucharest that contains all the secret records that were kept on thousands of people, and were used to terrorise and oppress dissenters of the regime. These records have not been destroyed and no-one but the new authorities are allowed to look at them.

In the outlying regions, there have been reports that even these cosmetic changes have not been enacted. Securitate still walk free, 'Communists' still wield power. As Stefan Heym, a 'left wing' activist in East Germany has said of his own country, "The structures of the police, security and army are still there, and in the middle ranks, the same people are still in charge", and this seems typical of all of Eastern Europe.

This is just an indication of what seems to be in store for the working class of Eastern Europe. In every country similar groups of intellectuals, poets, playwrights, and 'dissidents' have surfaced to take power and co-operate with the authorities. East Germany has the 'New Forum', Czechoslovakia the 'Civic Forum'. The common factor is that these groups are all middle-class in nature, a ruling-class-in-waiting that will co-operate with the old regime in the new but equally devastating forms of capitalist oppression that they want to introduce.

Poland again provides us with an excellent example of what can be expected if these new governments are allowed to settle into their stride. Lech Walesa has vowed many times to introduce a rapacious 'free market', and has recently completed a tour of Western capital to encourage investment. The Solidarity government has outlawed strikes, and recent estimates from their own sources suggest that at least 400,000 people will be out of work once this programme begins to bite - we can expect this to be a low estimate.

Competitive

In the Eastern Bloc as a whole, the Russian government has estimated that at least 15 million people will lose their jobs as the reforms progress, and uncompetitive concerns are shut down. But this will not be the only contributor to cuts in living standards: State subsidies in housing and food production will go, prices will soar. People will be expected to work harder for less.

In the West, it has been hard to find opponents to these changes. Everyone, including much of the left, have applauded them - some 'Communist' parties have even gone so far as to change their names! The Western capitalist media is portraying it as the final defeat of communism, and are hailing a return to the 'natural higher order' of capitalism.

There can be no doubt that many Western capitalists are rubbing their hands in glee at the new opportunities that will fall to them to make even more vast profits on the backs of the working class. The cheap labour costs and complicity of the 'new' governments offers them an ideal environment for their exploitation. Japan has just announced $2 billion worth of investment to Poland and Hungary, and the IMF is talking of making loans to Poland and Romania. The EEC has just offered membership to East Germany when its 'democratisation' is complete.

Despite this, both Thatcher and Bush have pleaded with Gorbachev to exercise restraint. Their fear is that if the pace of change is too great, and that their ally Gorbachev may be toppled, leading either to a slide back into Stalinism, or the rise of a far more hostile political movement rooted in working class struggle. Above all, the stability of the East/West divide has been lost, and Western capitalists do not want to run the risk of losing their new-found markets and cheap labour pools in an uncontrolled re-alignment of countries.

But there are still many unanswered questions for the West. These changes mean that the rationale for the Cold War, rooted as it is in the idea of the 'Communist ' enemy, has collapsed. The USA and her European allies have for years poured enormous quantities of capital into the arms industries under this pretext. It is difficult to imagine these multinationals taking kindly to a cut in this expenditure, and indeed most Western governments will be extremely loath to cut back their armed forces, who after all are the guardians of the state.

In order to avoid these possibilities, it is not difficult to imagine them looking for a new enemy in the shape of Islamic Fundamentalism in the Middle East. Libya and Iran have already signalled in aggressive terms their ideas of a world 'Islamic Revolution', and the Soviet empire is already beginning to crumble on the Iranian border (see below). These might be the only pretexts they need.

Worries

Added to these capitalist worries, many Western leaders are nervous at the possibility of German re-unification. A united Germany would be a formidable economic power, and one that is in a strategically dominant position in Europe. Whatever the outcome of this debate, we can be sure that the issue will be decided by the rulers of Europe, not the working class.

Gorbachevs own position is extremely precarious. Other sections of the 'Communist' bureaucracy could easily move against him if they thought that the Russian empire was breaking up, or that their own power was being threatened. Just such a thing happened after Brezhnev took over from the 'reforming' Kruschev, with the Stalinist conservatives re-establishing their own program.

There can be no doubt that Gorbachev is expendable, and that he is not unassailable. He is pursuing an extremely dangerous strategy that many in the 'Communist' Party have shied away from before. Fully aware of this, Gorbachev has had no choice but to concede the right of 'self determination' to his Eastern Bloc allies, but is extremely reluctant to make such concessions in Russia.

Nevertheless, there has been widespread nationalist unrest in Azerbaijan, with many people in the province of Nakhichevan calling for their region to be united with Iran. In the same region there is now an ongoing state of civil war between Azerbaijan and Armenia.

Recent years have seen the re-emergence of active nationalist movements in the Baltic states, and the Lithuanian 'Communist' Party has just announced its formal separation from Moscow. Further secessions and fragmentations of this nature seem to be on the cards in Latvia and Estonia.

These nationalist tendencies have fermented under repeated invasion and Imperialist domination, and have found expression because of Gorbachevs reforms. But like all nationalist movements they are reactionary in nature, and the emergence of 'independent' statelets in the backwaters of the Russian empire has absolutely nothing to offer their working class, who will continue to be exploited by their respective rulers. But for Gorbachev, they are a formidable challenge, as the recent deployment of Soviet troops in Azebaijan has demonstrated.

A further challenge to Gorbachev's 'perestroika', and possibly a far more serious one, is the outbreak of labour unrest in Russia. The miners of the Ukraine and in Siberia proved to be one of Gorbachev's biggest embarrassments last year, when they defied the official 'no strike' policy. In so doing, they set up their own strike committees and support organisations, rejecting the official state unions which had become discredited as nothing more than another wing of the bureaucracy.

This dispute is just a foretaste of what is to come as the reconstruction continues, hi-lighting the role of the state unions as they begin to join in the governmental demands for wage cuts and job reductions.

But there is no doubt that the bureaucracy would rather see the growth of 'free' trades unions after the Western model, than a revitalised class struggle by the whole working class. It is an open question as to whether these workers can broaden their struggle to call into question the whole process of reconstruction in Russia.

Nationalist unrest and heightened class struggle are not the only manifestations of the instability in the Eastern bloc. There has been an explosion of fledgling opposition movements in Romania, Poland, East Germany and Czechoslovakia.

Rhetoric

This not only exposes the Western rhetoric of demands being made only for a political and economic re-alignment along the model of Western 'democratic' and capitalist lines, but also makes it clear that Gorbachev is far from being in total control of the situation. The outcome of 'Perestroika' cannot be predetermined by the ruling classes, neither East nor West.

There is a great potential for revolutionary change, but in order that the people of Eastern Europe and ultimately Russia as well, do not become the latest and most tragic victims of the exploitation and degradation of capitalism, it is necessary to fight capitalism on a global scale. It is the working class of the whole world, united and determined in our own creativity, that can make true communism a reality.

social revolution. Therefore, with the help of the 'power of the soviets' - in which the Bolsheviks monopolized most of the posts - they effectively attained total power and proclaimed their dictatorship throughout revolutionary Russia.

This enabled them to strangle all revolutionary currents in disagreement with their doctrine of altering the whole course of the Russian Revolution, and make it adopt a multitude of measures contrary to its essence. One of these measures was the militarisation of labour during the years of War Communism- enabling millions of swindlers and parasites could live in peace, luxury and idleness.

Another measure was the war between town and country, provoked by the policy of the Party in considering peasants, as unreliable elements, foreign to the Revolution.

Finally, there was the strangling of libertarian thought and the Anarchist movement, whose social ideas and catchwords were the force of the Russian Revolution. Other measures consisted of the proscription of the independent workers movement, and the smothering of the freedom of speech in general. Everything was centralised, from where decrees were enforced on the thought, actioin and way of life of the working masses.

That is the October of the Bolsheviks. In it was incarnated the ideal followed by decades of the revolutionary intelligensia, finally realised now by the wholesale dictatorship of the All-Russian Communist Party. This ideal satisfies the ruling intelligensia, despite catastrophic consequences for the workers; now they can celebrate with pomp the anniversary of ten years of power.

THE ANARCHISTS

Revolutionary Anarchism was the only politico-social current to extol the ideas of a social revolution by the workers and peasants, as much during the 1905 Revolution as during the October Revolution. In fact these ideas could have played a collosal role, and could have been the means of struggle employed by the masses themselves. Likewise, no politico-social theory could have blended so harmoniously with the spirit and orientation of the Revolution.

The interventions of the Anarchist orators in 1917 were listened to with a rare trust and attention by the workers. One could have said that the revolutionary potential of the workers and peasants, together with the ideological and tactical power of Anarchism, could have represented a force which nothing could oppose. Unhappily, this fusion did not take place.

Some Anarchists occassionally led intense revolutionary activity among the workers, but there was no sizeable Anarchist organisation to lead to more continuous and coordinated actions (outside the Nabat Confederation and the Machnovchtina in the Ukraine). Only such an organisation could have united the anarchists and millions of workers. During such an important and advantageous revolutionary period, the Anarchists restricted themselves to the activities of small groups instead of orientating themselves to mass political action.

They preferred to drown themselves in the sea of their internal quarrels, not attempting to pose the problem of the common policy and tactic of Anarchism. By this deficiency, they condemned themselves to inaction and sterility during the most important moments of the Revolution.

Organisation and a common tactic have always been raised as fundamental anarchist principles. But their abscence prevented them making a single organisational, enabling them to orientate the social revolution in a decisive fashion.

Thought

However, there is no actual advantage in denouncing those who, by their demogogy, their thoughtlessness, and their irresponsibility, helped to create this situation.

The tragic experience which led the working masses to defeat, and Anarchism to the edge of the abyss, should be assimilated as from now. We must combat and pitilessly stigmatise those who, in one way or another, continue to perpetrate the chaos and confusion in Anarchism, and all those who obstruct its re-establishment or organisation. In other words, those whose actions go against those efforts of the movement for the emancipation of labour and the realisation of the Anarchist-Communist society. The working masses appreciate and are instinctively attracted by Anarchism, but will not work with the Anarchist Movement until they are conviced of its theoretical and organisational coherence. All of us should give our utmost to attain this coherence.

Gulyai-Polye Insurgents.

The Bolshevik practise of the last ten years shows clearly the counter-revolutionary nature of their dictatorship of the Party. Every year it restrains a little more the social and political rights of the workers, and takes their revolutionary conquests away. There is no doubt that the 'historic mission' of the Bolshevik Party is emptied of all meaning and that it will attempt to bring the Russian Revolution to its final objective: State Capitalism of the enslaving salariat.

That is to say, of the reinforced power of the exploiters and at the increasing misery of the exploited.

In speaking of the Bolshevik Party as part of the socialist intelligensia, exercising its power over the working masses of town and country, we have in view its central directing nucleus which, by its origins, its formation, and its life-style has nothing in common with the working class, and, despite that, rules all the details of the life of the Party and of the people.

Nucleus

That nucleus will attempt to stay above the proletariat, who have nothing to expect from it. The possibilities for rank and file Party militants, including the Communist youth, appear different. This mass has passively participated in the negative and counter-revolutionary policies of the party, but having come from the working class, it is capable of becoming aware of the authentic October of the workers and peasants and of coming towards it. We do not doubt that from this mass will come many fighters for the workers' October. Let us hope that they rapidly assimilate the Anarchist character of this October, and that they come to its aid. For ourselves, let us indicate this character as much as possible, and help the masses to reconquer and conserve their great revolutionary achievements.

Gerry Healy: a red who's better dead

GERRY HEALY - FOR 35 years leader of one of the largest, most influential and wealthiest Trotskyist organisations in post-War Britain - died of a heart attack at his London home on December 14, aged 76. This happy event was long overdue. As one overjoyed obituary writer commented: 'With a bit of luck, we'll never see his like again'.

Healy - General Secretary of the Workers Revolutionary Party (the WRP) and its forerunners since the 1950s - was unquestionably the single most universally hated figure on the Trotskyist Left.

Healy gained tabloid notoriety in 1985 when the WRP exploded after it came to light that This Great Trotskyist Leader had been raping young women in the Party's youth section for years; had been guilty of 'the physical abuse of comrades and slander against political opponents'; and of setting up shady and corrupt financial deals with the governments of Iran, Iraq, Libya and elsewhere. These 'hidden' crimes had been carried out with the full knowledge (and active assistance) of Healy-loyalists on the Party's Central Committee.

Obedience

The chain reaction of splits and re-splits that followed The Healy Revelations, saw the Party fragment within weeks into half a dozen warring factions - battling it out for control of the Party's substantial assets: printing presses, youth centres, bookshops, the heavily fortified central office, and the party's daily-paper The News Line.

There is no definitive, impartial history of the violent and bitter power struggle that followed Healy's fall from office, since - naturally enough - each faction has written their own, claiming that their breakaway is the legitimate descendant of the real WRP tradition. But there's no need to pick through the confusion of claim and counter-claim in search of the The Truth about the split. In the WRP Story there really are no 'good guys' - just rival sets of bad ones.

The exposure of Healy was not down to the 'shock discoveries' of aghast comrades who'd just uncovered the sordid truth and now felt compelled to tell the world.

The one thing that unites the leaders of all the subsequent WRP-splits is that they were all high enough up in the Party to know exactly what Healy was up to. And they all chose to keep quiet about it for years, until some of them decided that (for their own reasons) the time was right to move against him. It was a straightforward cynical, tactical decision. Morality didn't get a look in.

That the resultant power struggle descended into episodes reminiscent of a gangland war should come as no real surprise - seeing as, in many ways, that's exactly what it was. Assault, burglary, raids on rival premises, the physical seizure of Party property, asset stripping, street-fighting - you name it, it went on. One group sledge-hammered its way into a Party bookshop to stake their 'rightful claim' to the stock. Court room battles became common - with defendants readily denouncing their opponents 'flight to bourgeois law', whilst keeping quiet about the legal cases that they were lodging themselves.

For a while there were two rival daily editions of The News Line, with vans following each other around London bookshops to buy up all the copies of the 'bogus' edition and re-stock the 'genuine' one - often several times a day.

As the Party Empire gradually became carved up between the ex-comrades, the full extent of the WRP's collapse became clear. Where once - under the ruthless iron fist of Healy - there had been a large, disciplined, tightly organised Trotskyist machine, now (admist the wreckage) were eight or nine burnt-out grouplets, waging war on themselves and eachother - with aptly-named protaganists like Slaughter and Hunter slugging it out for control of the dwindling membership.

Loyal

The ever-loyal Redgraves - Corin and Vanessa - presided over the service, attended by representatives from both WRPs (Workers Press and News Line) and by Labour MP Ken Livingstone (who apparently was 'not very happy' when photographed). Corin explained that the collapse of the WRP in 1985 was - in fact - all a clever plot 'engineered by the state', designed to get Healy and wreck the Party.

In her three-page obituary in The News Line on December 21, Shelia Torrance too neglects to mention the rape of YS women, and other crimes that led to Healy's ousting. She points to the desire of 'a small group of spiteful, selfish petit-bourgeois intellectuals' inside the WRP who sought to 'smash the party' in pursuit of 'their quest for personal comfort and even better jobs'. At the time of the splits, ex-Party members report that - in protecting Healy - she argued that his greatness as a political leader far outweighed any trifling details about his personal life.

Describing Healy as a 'giant of Trotskyism', Torrance declares that

'when those who revile him are forgotten in the dustbin of history, his acheivements will inspire new generations' (to do what we aren't told). In Vanessa Redgrave's tearful farewell to her 'dear comrade' in The Guardian on December 18, she honours the debt she owes Healy for all her 'subsequent development as a political woman and artist'.

Dot Gibson - at one-time Healy's close 'financial adviser' and trusted forger of the Party's accounts - takes a different view. In an obituary in the other-WRP's paper, Workers Press (on Jan 6), she denounces him as a 'renegade from Trotsky' who 'depended on the Redgraves as a dead man relies on a life support unit'. A later piece in The Guardian by Jim Higgins (December 22) points out that Healy's bullying, paranoic meglomania had created 'more ex-Trotskyists than anyone else except Stalin'.

Paranoia

Whilst in power, Healy ran the WRP with an ideological rod of iron (and an actual iron rod when necessary). His swift despatching of perceived rivals in the Party, and his obssessive fear that the Party was constantly under surveillance by MI5, helped create a climate of uncertainty and fear of infiltration that Healy used ruthlessly to protect his position at the top. He broke up sections of the Party that he feared might be getting strong enough to mount a challenge to his leadership, and frequently 'uncovered plots' to destroy the Party.

Healy demanded a staggering amount of work, committment and money from the Party faithful. One of the purposes of The News Line was to absorb as much of the membership's energy as possible, through the never-ending round of writing, photographing, selling, fund-raising, and daily paper-round distribution. A membership locked in a cycle of hyper-activity was a membership less able to question the Party apparatus.

One of the criticisms made by Healy's opponents in the split, was that the constant demands and costs of the daily-paper made it a liability not an asset. To Healy's supporters this claim was a heresy of the highest order.

Healy ended his political life as he began it - as a supporter of, and apologist for, the Soviet bureaucracy. In 1928 he had joined the Young Communist League as a fresh-faced young Stalinist. After the demise of the WRP, Healy and the Redgraves formed The Marxist Party which quickly decided that Gorbachev's 'Political Revolution' was 'entirely progressive' in character.

In The News Line Torrance explains this political about-turn was due to the 'shock' Healy suffered after the split of the Party, which was - apparently - 'too much for him to bear'.

Five years after the split, have the different splinters of the WRP learnt anything from the 'degeneration' of their Great Leader and the collapse of their Party organisation?

The answer - clearly - is no. Even now, no faction has offered the slightest explanation for Healy's behaviour. How was it that this Giant of Trotskyism became a corrupt, madman, mobster and rapist?

Splits

No breakaway-Party has drawn the slighest connection between Healy's actions and the nature of Trotskyist political organisation. In place of blind obedience to the omnipotence of Healy's 'political genius' they have simply substituted a new leadership clique for the membership to unquestioningly obey.

Healy is explained away as an 'abberation': an unfortunate accident. You know, a bit like Stalin.

In 1985, in the final hours before Healy and his supporters were forced to flee the Party headquarters, they removed crucial files from the WRP's records that have never been recovered. The evidence of Healy's crimes that we know about come largely from files that they overlooked.

What horrors were documented in the files that Healy took and surely destroyed? Now that the old bastard is dead, we'll never know.

Trashing tyrant Lenin

OPEN LETTER TO COMRADE LENIN, Herman Gorter; Wildcat, BM CAT, London WC1N 3XX, 3.00

THIS IS A long overdue but very welcome reprint of Gorter's reply to Lenin's pamplet Left-Wing Communism, An Infantile Disorder. Written in 1920, the Open Letter first appeared in English in Sylvia Pankhurst's anti-parliamentarian communist paper Workers' Dreadnought in 1921. This is its second printing in English after seventy years of obscurity.

Battle

The Open Letter outlines the arguments of the 'Left-Wing' communists and their disagreement with the opportunist reformism of Lenin and the Third International. Gorter was a member of the Communist Workers' Party of Germany (KAPD) which had formed after differences with the German Communist Party (KPD). The political arguments were not peculiar to Germany, they existed in the Communist parties in the more 'advanced' capitalist countries at the time, and the disagreements are most clearly seen in Left-Wing Communism and the Open Letter.

In Left-Wing Communism Lenin claimed that the coming European revolutions would be similar in nature to the Russian Revolution, and therefore European communists should follow the "fundamentals of Bolshevik theory and tactics". These "tactics" included participation within reactionary parliaments and trade unions "because they will still find workers who are duped by the priests and the dreariness of rural life". Lenin's argument is that wherever the workers are, the revolutionary must go to them, and encourage their faith in bourgeois parliaments and unions because that is where the "underdeveloped, downtrodden, ignorant rural masses" are.

Opportunist

In the Open Letter, Gorter calls Lenin's argument an "opportunist fraud" and correctly maintains that all bourgeois parties both in and outside of parliament are opposed to the workers and the revolution, and therefore no revolutionary should deceitfully encourage proletarian "illusions of the impossible" in bourgeois parliamentary democracy.

To Lenin he writes of Left-Wing Communism "it is the first book of yours which is no good. For Western Europe it is the worst book imaginable".

In his Open Letter, Gorter does not criticise Lenin because his tactics are 'wrong'; he writes that Lenin's tactics were right for Russia (although he later changed his opinion) but wrong for Europe because of the different nature of capitalism. And although Gorter argued for organisation from below and against the dictatorship of the party, he still defended the need for "centralisation and iron discipline".

History has shown the counter-revolutionary nature of centralised organisation, whatever the context. Overall though, the book is well worth reading, both as a historic document, and a concise criticism of Leninism.

Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide, and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class.

We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

4. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

5. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to acheive anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

6. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism.

The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to acheive a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives wil always be different to ours.

The boss class is our enemy, and while me must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never acheive this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

7. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

8. As anarchist we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called 'socialists' or 'communists' we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

LABOUR'S POLL TAX PANIC

WITH ONLY THREE months to go until the first poll tax bills are due to be sent out in England and Wales, Labour councils in Scotland are conceding that their attempts to break the non-payment movement - through threats, intimidation and legal action - are failing.

Strathclyde region despatched 400,000 'final demands' at the end of last year, ordering non-payers to settle the whole of the first year's poll tax within 7 days 'or face the consequences'. When - at the end of the week - over 80% of those 'final' demands had been totally ignored, exasperated council officials admitted that the response had been 'disappointing'. Strathclyde's experience has been typical. Lothian regional council are now well over 25.5 million pounds short in poll tax receipts. They're having to borrow money to make up the shortfall.

Ineffective

Many Scottish councils are now abandoning the use of bailiffs raids against those fined for non-payment, because they have proved so violently unpopular, and - in the face of large scale community mobilisations against them - completely ineffective.

Their plans to turn, instead, to 'arrestments' direct from people's bank accounts have also run into trouble. In late-November - the head of Scotland's clearing banks announced that they 'would be unable to cope with thousands of requests to trace the bank account details of thousands of non-payers'. Even if councils insisted on the costly and time-consuming process, he couldn't guarantee they would be able to find even 5-6% of the names.

Faced with a seeming dead-end in either direction, and an ever growing back-log of court action, Scottish councils are rapidly running out of options. Eric Milligan, head of Lothian region Labour council's finance department, spoke for many councils when, in December, he admitted: 'Such is the scale of the non-payment movement in our region, that we may have to write-off large sums of outstanding poll tax'.

The December deadline for completing registration in England and Wales passed with many councils nowhere near finishing the job. Some have publicly warned the government that - because of the bureaucratic chaos that they're in - they may be unable to dispatch the first bills until May or June: putting everyone two months in arrears to start with.

Further government changes to poll tax law now seem certain, following the outraged response by industry bosses to news of the levels of Uniformed Business Rate (UBR) they'll be paying from April. In what can only be explained as a genuine civil service cock-up the upshot of the UBR calculations is that small business bosses in the south-east (ie loyal Tory voters in the Tory heartlands) face crippling rate rises, while big businesses in the Labour-heartlands of the north and north-east are set to enjoy massive cuts in their bills. The main bosses organisation - the CBI - has warned of tens of thousands of job losses and hundreds of business-bankrupcies.

The reason this should concern us, is, that in finding the money to sort out this mistake and relieve the burden on business, the Tories may well look to increasing the burden on domestic poll tax - meaning bigger poll tax bills - or in reducing the level of grant they give to councils - meaning an even greater threat to services. Businesses meanwhile, will look to make cost-savings by reducing their workforces, or trying to drive down wages.

Action on the industrial front against the poll tax received a major boost in January, when a majority of 17,000 local council workers in Leicester voted in favour of industrial action, if the city council tried to issue any redundancies because of poll tax-driven service cuts. The decision has already forced the council to back-track and - for now - withdraw the threat of job losses. Leicester's example is certain to be followed by other council workforces as the extent of the threat to jobs and services hits home in the months ahead, as councils announce their budgets for the coming year.

Elsewhere, dole office workers in London have been on strike in protest at management plans to get them to pass claimants details from DSS files straight to poll tax officials. They've been joined by other groups of dole office workers who plan to refuse to process 'arrestments' of unpaid poll tax from non-payers who are signing on. And in Edinburgh, a group of local government workers are among the latest to announce plans to mount walk-outs if any employee in their department is penalised for non-payment.

Anxiety

The Labour Party's growing anxiety over the anti-poll tax movement is reflected in the decision of the National Executive not to sanction a national demonstration against the Charge in April - against the advice of Labour's front-bench poll tax spokesmen who desperately want an 'initiative' they can hide behind. In the past, Labour has been willing to sponsor harmless demonstrations as a low-risk way of parading its 'anti-poll tax' credentials. Now, Kinnock is quoted as fearing that groups committed to non-payment and strike action might 'take advantage' of the situation and expose Labour's true poll tax colours.

The implications of the Labour Party's total compliance with the Community Charge, seem, at last, to be sinking in with some sections of the party's 'Left' - particularly those whose dreams of building havens of 'municipal socialism' have been brought to an abrupt end by the poll tax. Amongst Labour-'Leftists', demoralisation and despondancy is rife. In inner-London, for instance, Hackney Labour Party can't find any candidates willing to stand in 33 out of the 60 council seats to be contested in the May elections.

As the futility of pleading with council bureaucrats becomes ever more apparent, and council workers begin to organise themselves against threats from their employer, the necessity of linking the non-payment campaign in the community directly with the battle being waged by local government - and other - workers, becomes ever clearer.

The strength, resolve and determination of the non-payment campaign in Scotland must be used as inspiration to build the struggle in England and Wales. The coming weeks and months will be critical.

ANARCHIST COMMUNIST FEDERATION

THE ANARCHIST COMMUNIST Federation is an organisation of class-struggle anarchists. Its structure is based on membership of area and interest groups and individuals. We have members in the folllowing areas:

Birmingham, Blackpool, Chesterfield, Coventry, Co Durham, Essex, Glasgow, Halifax, Kent, London, Newcastle, Northampton, Northumberland, Nottingham, Oxford, Rugby, Sheffield, Sussex, Swansea, and York.

The ACF promotes the building of a strong and active anarchist movement in Britain and internationally, and has contact with like-minded anarchists in other countries.

Write to: P. O. Box 263, Sheffield S1 3EX.

As regular readers will have seen, we've been forced to increase the cover price of Organise! from 30p to 40p with this issue. This first increase in over two years, has been forced on us by increases in printing and postage costs.

But 40p is still not enough to cover all those costs. If we're to keep the cover price from rising again, we desperately need a regular flow of cash into the Press Fund to help make up the shortfall.

We've added four pages to this issue (at even more expense!) to allow us to include all the material on the Trafalgar Square riot and the poll tax struggle that we needed to.

This issue's appeal has brought in less than £100 - well short of our regular £250 target. Many thanks go to everyone who contributed.

If you can help us reach the next £250 target, please send donations, by June 17, to:

ACF Press Fund, Box 1, Hiziki, 15 Goosegate, Hockley, Nottingham.

ORGANISE! IS THE national magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF).

Organise! is a quarterly theoretical journal published in order to develop anarchist communist ideas. It aims to give a clear anarchist viewpoint on contemporary issues, and initiate debate on areas not normally covered by agitational journals.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and others open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us develop our ideas further. Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! - as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will endeavour to publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree withour A&Ps at all). The deadlines for the August 1990 issue are June 17 for features and reviews, and June 30 for letters and news.

All contributions for the next issue should be sent to: Organise!, Box 1, Hiziki, 15 Goosegate, Nottingham.

New ACF pamphlet:

Beating the poll tax

Published in mid-February, with the arrival of poll tax bills in England and Wales just a few weeks away, this new ACF pamphlet outlines the kind of collective class action that can crush the Community Charge.

It examines the strength of poll tax resistance in Scotland so far - and exposes the role of the Labour Party in trying to put down this revolt.

It explains the objectives that lie behind the poll tax, and the cynical way whole sections of the Left have tried to move in on, and suffocate, the growing opposition to it.

This is a brand-new pamphlet, completely revised and updated.

Available from: ACF, c/o 84b Whitechapel High Street, London E1.

POLL TAX FURY

EVENTS IN MARCH and April saw the unleashing of working class anger towards the hated poll tax. As local councils attempted to set poll tax figures ranging from 149 in ultra-Thatcherite Wandsworth, to a massive 566 in Labour controlled Haringey, thousands of people took to the streets.

Demonstrations tookplace in countless boroughs around the country. Meetings were stormed, and as a result, some were abandoned.

* In Hackney, East London, thousands blocked the main street, and shop windows were smashed in an outburst against the poll tax and the whole rotten system. In Lambeth, thousands massed and fought the police. In Islington, the police brought out their horses against a 2,000 strong crowd. Time and again, Labour councils whined that it wasn't their fault. However, they were still prepared to implement the tax, and denounce those who argued for non-payment.

* Similar scenes were to be repeated outside the inner-city, in places like Southampton, Swindown, Bath, Bristol, Birmingham, Reading, Norwich, Plymouth, Leeds and Liverpool.

* And in the Tory heartlands, there was conspicuous anger against the tax. In Tory-controlled Maidenhead, the town hall was surrounded and bombarded with eggs, stones and pennies. In Walton-on-Thames, in the stockbroker belt, 800 turned out to similar scenes.

* And in Scotland, it was revealed that at least 250,000 people were behind with poll tax payments, after having paid an initial first payment.

* On March 31, massive demonstrations against the tax took place in Glasgow and in London - where working class anger was felt in the heartland of upper class decadence.

Mayhem

Depending on which daily paper you may have read, the 'blame' for such 'mayhem' lies with either the Militant Tendency, the Socialist Workers Party, or mysterious 'anarchist groupings'. The capitalist press love to talk about violence, 'rent-a-mob' and 'outside agitators'. The Labour Party too has talked its fair share of such rubbish. It is typical hypocrisy of such supporters of the capitalist system, who support the use of armed forces to maintain the status quo, to defend 'our Britain', and then cry foul when ordinary people take action to attack the system that attacks them.

Apologies

The Labour Party, which is steeped in the tradition of not only respect for law, but also of implementing the law, will never find itself on the same side as the working class - it can only 'apologise' for us when we take meaningful action.

Militant and the SWP are a hinderance to the fight against the poll tax. Militant has been quick to distance itself from any class violence - after all, they are part of the Labour Party. Neither do they see it as productive in their attempts towards total hi-jacking of the anti-poll tax movement.

The SWP, on the other hand, mainly seeks to sell its papers and boost the membership of their party. Yet after so many twists and turns from the party leadership on what to do about the poll tax, it is unlikely that they know what to think about it all.

As for 'anarchists' - we are involved in such activities no more than the thousands of other ordinary working class people involved in genuine anti-poll tax organisations. The media talks of 'outside agitators' because the bosses cannot bear to admit or believe that ordinary people would dare to act without being manipulated by mysterious trouble makers. Such talk of outsiders is also used to attack the principle of working class solidarity.

The fact the not all those involved in Hackney were from that borough shows a healthy amount of inter-borough solidarity. For the ruling class and their supporters it merely indicates the existence of 'rent-a-mob'.

What the hell do they expect when the government tries to impose something like the poll tax? We are not going to sit around debating its rights and wrongs, lobbying our MPs and waiting till the next Labour government get elected. Fighting the poll tax is all about not paying it, and working class people showing we are not fooled by the State.

We are inspired by such examples of working class resistance and we are optimistic too. But this is not enough. It is important that people against the poll tax not be isolated, and that they be involved in non-payment organisation right now.

In England and Wales, it will not be long before we see the bailiffs assisted by police, attempting to invade our homes for non-payment. We need to build on current support and activity in order to create a concrete response to such future attacks on our numbers from local government and the State.

MANDELA: (not) talking 'bout a revolution

NELSON MANDELA'S RECENT release from prison has been the cause of much celebration and massive media hype. However, for anarchists, his release can bring no such joy - as we see the struggle of the black working class in South Africa restrained and controlled even further by the African National Congress (ANC), in the name of a "negotiated settlement" to end apartheid.

Within hours of his release, Mandela was busy spelling out the nature of his politics: "I hope you will disperse with discipline, and not a single one of you will do anything that will cause other people to say that we can't control our own people" (our emphasis).

Vigilant

Elements of the Left in Britain have not been slow to focus on the reactionary politics which Mandela espouses. They talk of the need to be "vigilant", to "keep a watchful eye" on Mandela. Predictions of a "sell-out" are already resounding.

Yet a brief look at the politics and context of the so-called Freedom Charter and the history of the African National Congress clearly indicates that a "sell-out" cannot be on the cards. For never in the ANC's history has it had a committment to any uncompromising revolutionary politics. The ANC was born of grovelling for a better deal, and pleading with the ruling class in South Africa and abroad, for a lesser version of exploitation and oppression.

The Freedom Charter states that: "the mineral wealth beneath the soil, the banks and monopoly industries shall be transformed to ownership of the people as a whole". Even this classic nationalisation clause was disowned by Mandela only a year later in the face of criticisms of the Charter being a 'socialist' programme. Mandela explained that what was meant by this was: "...non-European Bourgeois will have the opportunity to own in their own names and rights, mills and factories - and trade and private enterprise will boom and flourish as never before"

Capital

So, from private capital to nationalisation and back to private capital in a few short breaths - and not a hint of 'anti-capitalist' politics.

We need look no further than Mandela's address to the Rivonia Trial in 1964 for further evidence: "It (The Freedom Charter) is by no means a blueprint for a socialist state. It provides for nationalisation of mines, banks, industry, because they are owned by one race only" (our emphasis).

It is clear clear that the conflict is not that the ruling class own the wealth and land and means of production. The problem is that the ruling class is white. It follows that the solution is a multi-racial ruling class.

The reasons for Mandela's release are manifold - and nothing to do the "effect (sic) of sanctions", or "international pressure". The containment of the Black working class in South Africa is a major financial and political burden for the ruling class in that country.

The intensification of the struggle which took place in the mid-eighties was something they could have well done without. Having failed to suppress this recent increase in militancy in the townships and workplaces, the ruling class now realise that another solution is necessary.

Leaders

Whilst granting some political power to black leaders, the white ruling class hopes it can retain hold of economic power and thus stay in control of the 'new' multi-racial capitalist state. But to do this, it needs an organisation which is willing to control the black working class, is willing to do business, and one which will leave alone the white ruling class control over capital.

That organisation is the ANC. The realease of Mandela was simply necessary to provide the environment for this to take place.

The white ruling class and the ANC are not locked in a bitter battle. The ANC is willing to provide a smooth negotiated settlement in return for a larger slice of their slice of the cake. Mandela and the ANC are not fools, they are shrewd politicians, their defence of the "armed struggle", or outrage at the recent murderous activities of the regime, are simply rhetoric in the negotiating game.

"We want Johannesberg to remain the beautiful and thriving city that it is now. Therefore, we are willing to maintain seperate living until there are enough new employment opportunities and new homes to allow blacks to move into Johannesberg with dignity", says Mandela.

The refusal to renounce the armed struggle by the ANC is a bargaining chip with the Apartheid State. It is a distraction from the backdoor negotiations with the ruling class. Already the ANC has turned their minimum demand of 'one person, one vote' into a maximum demand which Mandela has described as "negotiable".

Bitter

Whilst all this is pretty disheartening, it is important to remember that the many sections of the black working class - especially the young women and men who have grown up in the throes of bitter struggle against the racist State - are far from being ANC lap-dogs. Those involved in the struggles of the eighties have experienced the controlling nature of the ANC. During the 1976-7 and 1980 uprisings the ANC was conspicuously absent. It tried to minimise the importance of the uprisings and workplace militancy, calling them leaderless, chaotic and even infantile. And although the ANC had many requests for weapons from the 'Young Comrades' they only came in a trickle and then only to loyal supporters.

They were usually squandered on elite military actions. They changed their tune during the 1985-7 uprising - realising like the apartheid rulers - that internal revolt was the threat to the white State. The uprising was outside the control of the ANC or any political faction. The townships became no-go areas for the police and military, and collaborators received popular justice.

Street and township committees were set up so that everyone in the insurgent communities directly controlled the struggle. This left the ANC and other groups as leaders without followers.

The ANC do face a difficult task. With a major visual role to play they need to 'appease' all sides. Many working class black South Africans are aware that they have already waited too long, and are not prepared to see the ANC take the struggle from them for the sake of a pot pourri of limited political reforms.

Whilst Mandela calls for a 'pacification' of the struggle in order to facilitate negotiation, black workers have been calling for a strengthening of the struggle, for increased strike action, for mass rent boycotts - for more militancy.

The black working class in South Africa face the continuation of a long and bitter battle, not only against the racist ruling class regime in place at the moment, but also against the ANC - who are willing to do anything to reach their precious 'settlement'.

The Mandela Myth will grow and grow. He is media and capitalist friendly, and will play a key media role in the future of South Africa.

As anarchists, part of our agenda in practising solidarity with the South African working class, must be the smashing of the Myth and in doing so we can expose the failure of nationalism. A change of boss means no change of exploitation - no change at all. Mass revolutionary action from the exploited, the black working class of town and country, the poor and young people, can still foil these plans for normalisation.

A RIOTER'S ACCOUNT

sent anonymously to Organise

EVERYONE WHO FULLY participated in the events of March 31 will agree that they were uplifting.

The sight of tooled up riot police being given a good thrashing, and the sense of liberation from being in control of the streets was almost euphoric.

The police provoked the whole affair. Rather than allow the march to pass off peacefully, they used a combination of arrogance, macho posturing and arbitrary arrests to stir up an already angry crowd of people. That the police were unable to judge the dire consequences of that aggression must mean severe admonitions behind the closed doors of Scotland Yard. They miscalculated and miscalculated badly.

Opportunity

The demonstrators seized the opportunity, and in often very creative ways took command of the situation. The police's tried and tested methods of crowd control were found wanting. That many of the street fighters were young, poor and very determined in their anger proved to be the police's undoing. We would not be pushed around, indeed in huge numbers we surrounded the police in Trafalgar Square and wrought our revenge for years of Thatcherite hostility. Orgreave and Wapping were avenged.

Psychologically, after the first reverses of the riot police, the demonstrators were unstoppable. Perhaps the single most important factor in the police defeat was the psychological one - a combination of anger, determination and lack of fear.

The police use of temporary fences was turned against them. Demonstrators utilised them as barricades or as a means of hemming in the police, allowing them to receive their fair share of missiles. At a later stage, when the events moved to their highly mobile stage, London provided a whole host of builders' materials to construct barricades.

Missiles

Missiles were used with great effect, though the riot police, when facing the crowd, were well protected with helmets and shields. In retreat, however, their backs were totally exposed and vulnerable. In Charing Cross Road, for example, three riot police were obviously terrified at the prospect of missiles from behind, as they passed by a crowd of young demonstrators.

Also, riot police officers' legs are exposed and vulnerable, even when facing a crowd. Their helmets prevented head injuries, which unfortunately was not true for their opponents. Some of the injuries sustained by the crowd came from the demonstrators themselves - as missiles fell short of their targets. Since the uprising was spontaneous, no-one had head protection. This must be considered in the future, though if only a few people are properly protected they will draw the attention of the police. People should throw from nearer the front, to be more accurate. Those present who were used to 'having a go' at the police in areas where they live pointed this out.

The police were taken aback by their inability to cower the crowd with animals - namely horses and dogs. Cavalry charges certainly cleared the large crowds in and around the Square, but only temporarily as the demonstrators re-grouped in between sorties. Also, the mounted police officers were highly vulnerable to missiles - according to one report over 50% of them sustained injuries. They were an easy target. The mobile demonstrators were hardly affected by the mounted police, with a ready supply of missiles and shop doorways to dive into, the cavalry charges were almost laughed off. As for the dogs, they proved totally ineffective. Dog handlers never got near enough to be able to use them.

Of course, with their vans, the police were highly mobile. However, they were also highly vulnerable to ambush - on several occasions police vans were surrounded and stoned. The mobility of the crowds were in the initial stages at least, the learnt effect of the police clearing Trafalgar Square. With the police tied down in pitched battles, the streets were safe to be looted well in advance of the arrival of the riot squads. Later, as the police pursued them, the crowds fanned out to let affluent London know what the poor and oppressed think. The stoning of Stringfellows night-club brought forth squeals of delight as neon lights crashed to the ground. Mobility must be seen as one of the greatest strengths of the day and resulted in a host of lightening attacks and victories.

The use of arson was more questionable. Whilst the firing of the portacabins in the Square was quite spectacular, it did allow the police to use fire engines to move the crowd away from the scene of previous pitched battles. Also, that part of the Square became unsafe as the whole unit could have collapsed on us. The brief burning of the South African Embassy, however, was a delight to behold. It is interesting to note that the windows hide a false facade. The whole Embassy is constructed like a fort. As regards the upturning and burning of cars, they did provide the danger of explosions, and several small family cars were gutted - which is surely to be criticised. But our true enemies - the rich - felt our fury to its fullest.

Future

In the future, we can be sure, the police will used alternative methods if they start to take heavy casualties. One option would be to use CS gas - but this is indiscriminate and would affect wealthy tourists who swarm around the West End. Plastic bullets may be used next time, but the political costs here are high and their use - like CS gas - marks a display of defeat.

People who watched the riot on TV, or from the safety of the far side of Trafalgar Sqaure (unable to participate for whatever reason) have said the police got what they deserved. Such events give our class confidence, and we learn how to co-operate together and effectively take on the State.

We don't need anyone to organise us, anyone who had tried to take over would have been told to fuck off. We laugh when they try to point to ring leaders, just like we laugh at people who try to take over anti-poll tax campaigns.

The working class is on the march again. We will learn the lessons of battles in the past and defeat the poll tax and defeat the ruling class.

ECOLOGY AND CLASS

MANY PEOPLE ARE now aware of the massive worldwide problem of environmental pollution and destruction.

Rainforests such as Amazonia (home to native peoples and thousands of unique animal and plant species, and an important source of oxygen and absorber of carbon dioxide) are being decimated. Large areas of land are being turned into desert. There is an increasing number of 'natural' disasters such as droughts, floods and earthquakes affecting ever more people. Pollution is causing dangerous climatic changes such as the global warming from the Greenhouse Effect.

Acid rain, poisoning of the sea and drinking water, increasing cancers from industrial radiation, the list is endless. But what are the causes and solutions, and what is the relationship of ecology to the class stuggle?

Ecology is science of living things and their relationship to the environment in which they live. There are three central ecological principles:

(1) All life on Earth is interdependent.

For example plants provide the air we breathe and food we eat (directly, or indirectly as meat from other animals who eat plants). Our shit and dead bodies enrich the soil that plants grow in.

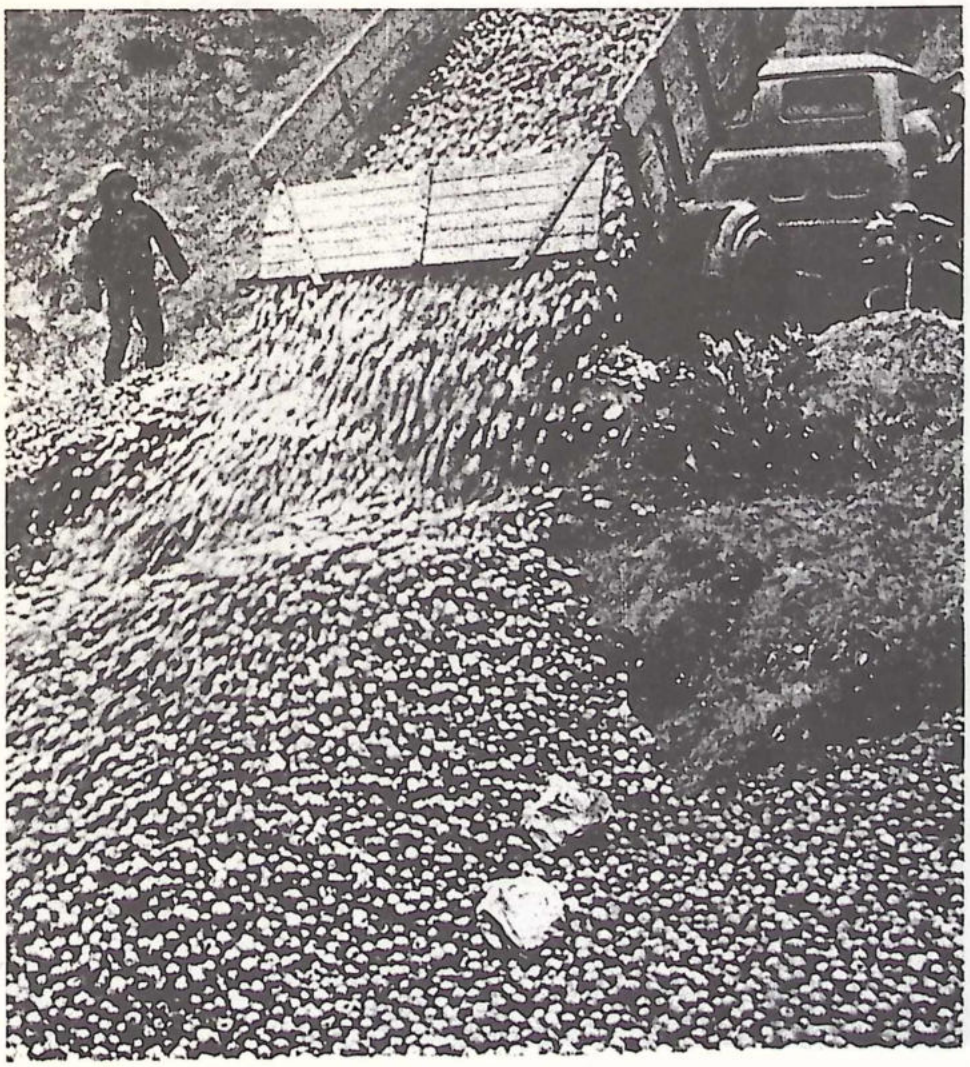
(2) Plants and animals naturally achieve balance with each other through dynamic equilibrium.

For example when there is a big increase in the population of field mice (upsetting the balance between species), it is followed by an increase in the population of creatures that eat them, such as owls and foxes, until a new balance is achieved.

(3) Unity in diversity.

The more species there are in a natural environment, the more stable it is. Conversely the less species there are, the more unstable it is.

All of these principles have been radically undermined by the environmental crisis.



People are acting in many different ways to try and green society - as consumers, dissident shareholders, in mainstream/green parties, in green pressure groups. Green ideas are trendy and topical: even companies and governments are getting in on the act. What is the effect of all this talk and action?

Governments of the industrialised countries signed a treaty in 1987, the Montreal Protocol, agreeing to halve the production of CFC's (Chloro-Fluoro-Carbons which damage the ozone layer, causing global warming) by the year 2000. It's been estimated however that a reduction of 85% is needed to enable the ozone layer to repair itself. Acid Rain is being similarly 'tackled' - too little, too slowly and never tackling the root cause.

Lead free petrol supposedly makes cars OK, but they are still major polluters and profoundly anti-social (killing 6000 people a year in Britain and injuring 40,000). Thatcher's belated conversion to enviromentalism (for example her condemnation of the Greenhouse Effect resulting from fossil fuels) is little more than a subterfuge for the expansion of Nuclear Power which lessens the reliance on coal, undesirable because of the power and militancy of the miners.

Protocol

Companies are making an increasing number and ranges of 'environmentally-friendly' and 'healthy' products such as bleaches and detergents, unadulterated food. These products are invariably more expensive (and so can only be afforded by the better off) and they are also often the 'acceptable face' of big companies who continue to make the same old junk in large quantities. Big firms such as Shell spend millions of pounds on advertising and PR, letting us know how green they are - reclaiming the land after they've used it, putting their pipelines underground, and giving money to green projects, yet they continue (with governments) to be the environmental terrorists.

Consumerism (alienated buying-to-be-happy) is part of the problem. Capitalism wants us to spend all of our 'free' time (when we're not working-to-live or busy with domestic drudgery) buying 'leisure'. Although green products are preferable they are not the answer: they're an individual solution to a social problem - who controls what is produced and how. As individuals the majority of us - the working class - have no control over our lives. We certainly don't exercise any social say or control through what we do or don't buy (or as dissident shareholders). Organised consumer boycotts linked to workers action can have a significant effect, however.

Rural

The green policies and promises of the mainstream political parties are so much populist window-dressing. Green Parties are superficially more attractive. They have some radical policies such as decentralism, federalism and opposition to leaders. But if they achieve power, they will (like the mainstream parties or Bolsheviks) be running the state, the rule of the few which is the root of the problem. They will also - inevitably - be corrupted by power as illustrated by the German Green Party: in power at State level they supported nuclear power.

One of their central rules was that no-one could be a spokesperson for more than two years, yet this was vehemently opposed by the first generation of non-leaders such as Petra Kelly when their time was up. In Britain the Green Party (though still in opposition) has refused to support mass non-payment of the poll tax because it won't support illegal action. The 'radical' Greater London Council of Ken Livingstone showed the same lessons: you cannot impose radical policies and people power from above: people must collectively take power for themselves, outside of and against political parties.

Green pressure groups such as Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace International do some good practical work (particularly the local groups) but are flawed by their 'apolitical' stance (which means that they accept the state and capitalism) and their single issue politics.

Social problems do not exist as single issues, so they can't be tackled as such. Greenpeace's initial anti-fur-trapping campaign brought them into conflict with Native Peoples because they failed to distinguish between subsistance activity and the big business trapping of the major fur companies. For years CND refused to oppose nuclear power, even though it is inextricably linked to nuclear weapons.

Some green activists lack of class analysis has led them to the misantropic conclusion that people in general are (equally) responsible for the ecological crisis. This means that the Earth would be better off without people and has led (for example) to the American direct action group 'Earth First' stating that Aids is a good thing because it kills off so many people, and to racist outbursts about the detrimental effects of Third World 'overpopulation'.

What is striking about pollution and environmental destruction is the scale of it, and the fact that most of results from routine, daily practice rather than 'accidents' or 'disasters' such as Bhopal, Soveso, Chernobyl or the Exxon Valdez Alaskan oil spill.

To take the example of agriculture. In the 'developed' world, it is mostly large-scale industrialised agribusiness. The emphasis is on growing single crops in huge fields - monoculture - an unstable ecosystem. The crops are much more vulnerable to pests, necessitating chemical pesticides. Chemical fertilisers are used to obtain (short term) high yields, in the long term these deplete the soil of nutrients and yields fall. Pesticides kill both pests and the creatures that prey on them, and poison food and drinking water.

Factory farming - concentration camps for animals - is morally indefensible and produces unhealthy meat, eggs and milk. There is massive, government-subsidised over-production leading to examples such as the famous butter mountains and wine lakes. This food is fed back to animals or destroyed - more economic than selling it cheaply or giving it to people who need it. Farmers are also paid to keep good land fallow.

Poorest

In Africa and Asia the rural population live on the poorest land. They are forced to grow cash crops for export, although their primary need is to feed themselves: 15 million children die every year from malnutrition. In Brazil the IMF (International Monetary Fund) is insisting that the huge $120 billion debt is paid by reducing imports and maximising exports. This has inevitably led to the worsened rape of Amazonia through increasing the output of primary products such as minerals, meat, coffee, cocoa and hardwoods.

Living on the worst land, these growing populations overcultivate, deforest and overuse it, making themselves more prone to 'natural' disasters such as floods and droughts. This land is also the most dangerous: the poor live in shanty towns on flood-prone river basins or foreshores, or in huts of heavy mud brick on steep hills.

Mass pollution and environmental destruction is the inevitable consequence of a system based on dominating the rest of nature (and therefore exploiting and destroying it). This domination has it's roots in the domination of people - class society, where power and wealth is in the hands of a few, the ruling class, who oppress and exploit the working class majority, and the related oppressions of racism and sexism. Production is for profit not need. It is the ruling class who decide what is produced and how - peasants don't choose to live on the worst land, or grow cash crops, individual consumers can't stop pollution through buying, boycotting or voting.

Technology

It is important to examine technology (the machines and tools used by society and the relations between them implied by their use). Existing technology is rarely neutral - it has been developed under and by capitalism for profit (exploitation) and social-economic control. It is therefore not just a question of control - a nuclear power station controlled by the workers and community would still be unhealthy and oppressive. VDUs monitor whether and how fast their operators are working, production lines force people to do boring repetitive tasks at an inhuman pace (that of machines).

The ruling class is constantly modifying technology developing new machines, tools and techniques in response to working class struggles: containerisation (enabling goods to be equally transferable between ship, rail and road) was developed in response to the power and organisation of the dockers.

Technologies which are potentially more liberating are suppressed. Sucessive British governments have put massive funds into nuclear power, tiny ammounts into research and development of renewable energy resources such as wind, solar, tidal and geothermal energy. This paltry funding has been deliberately chopped about so that research into each renewable energy never progressed too far.

Large scale industry neccesitates large scale centralised energy production from fossil fuels (Coal, Oil and Gas) and nuclear power, with the consequent waste, acid rain, radiation and global warming. Renewable energy could equally be used.

We need to develop a technology which extends human capabilities, can be controlled by the community and is friendly to the environment as part of the struggle for a free anarchist-communist society. A genuine alternative technology can only be developed on a significant scale in a new society.

There are a number of examples of workers taking ecological action. In the 1970s a number of groups of Australian workers instituted Green Bans, through which they boycotted ecologically destructive projects. Builders, Seafarers, Transport and Railworkers, and Dockers boycotted all work connected with the nuclear industry, the Franklin River project - flooding the Tasmanian National Park (including Aboriginal land) for a large Hydro-electric project: a victory. Similarly workers blacked Amax's attempts to drill and mine for oil and diamonds and other minerals on aboriginal land at Noonkanbah. They also actively supported the militant occupation of the site by aboriginal people.

In Britain the boycott of dumping Nuclear Waste at sea by rank and file seafarers forced the government to abandon the policy in the 1980s.

In Brazil, rubber tappers forged an alliance with native peoples and environmentalists to oppose massive deforestation of the Amazon rainforest by big landowners and business interests. Their success led to the murder of union activist Chico Mendes by hired assasins in December 1988, but the struggle continues.

Mass direct action by communities (occupations, sabotage and pitched battles with police) has prevented Nuclear power stations and reprocessing facilities being built at Plogoff in France, and Whyll and Wackendorff in Germany. In Britain communities mobilised in 1987 to end government plans to dump nuclear waste at 4 sites. In Thailand several years ago. 100,000 people rioted to destroy a 70m steel factory.

Class

Ecological issues and class struggle are inextricably linked. The struggle for a green society where people live in harmony with the rest of nature therefore goes hand in hand with the struggle for a society free from human domination. Capitalism cannot be reformed - it is built on the domination of nature, and of people.

We need to take direct control of every aspect of our lives through social revolution: collectively seizing control of the land, workplaces and streets, and sharing decisions, work and wealth - deciding what is produced and how, dissolving the divisions between and home, work and play, people and the rest of nature.

THE POLL TAX:
The Peasants Revolt

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT, the Labour Party, the media and the All Britain Anti Poll Tax Federation alike, have declared anarchists to be 'public enemy number one' after the demonstration in London against the poll tax on March 31.

According to them, anarchists in general - but specifically groups like Class War, the Anarchist Communist Federation and the Direct Action Movement - were behind the Trafalgar Square riot and the subsequent assaults on the West End.

According to us, anarchism in Britain has never had it so good. The influence that our ideas have had in the working class has always been misrepresented by the State and the 'State-in-waiting' (the Left-wing parties). The events in Trafalgar Square have caused much speculation about who we are, what we believe, and what we do.

We have worked consistently over the years to introduce our ideas (politics and working practise) into the class struggle in all its forms. Increasingly, we have gained respect for the work we do around various aspects of that struggle, and our ideas have been taken up and put into practise. We support working class resistance to the State whenever we see it.

Over the last decade in particular class struggle anarchist organisations have grown in strength and influence. We are currently seeing a massive upsurge in working class resistance to the State, focused largely around refusal to cooperate with the poll tax. The effectiveness with which working class people take up anarchist forms of organisation is no accident. When resistance to a government necessitates also taking on the 'reformist' and 'revolutionary' Left - as well as the Trades Union movement, the Police and the media - then the time is right for Anarchy!

After the Trafalgar Square riot, given the exciting scale of resistance to the poll tax, and the role that anarchists play (and are claimed to play), the Anarchist Communist Federation would like to State our case on various issues thrown up for us by the current attention we are receiving.

"VIOLENCE AND LOOTING IS NOT THE WAY TO MAKE THE CASE AGAINST THE POLL TAX"

People say that taking on the police and the ruling class has nothing to do with the poll tax. They either believe that the rest of capitalism isn't too bad, but that the poll tax is unfair, or they believe the working class needs leading a stage at a time, through the various battles (NHS, Wapping etc) that we face before their own party takes over.

The truth is that class violence is always effective in getting results, and the working class at its most angry will attack its ultimate oppressor - not the just poll tax, not just the Tories, not just the Labour leadership, but the whole ruling class and those who support it.

The Left has always been terrified of class violence, that is why it seeks to control or crush it. Whenever the working class is at its strongest they tell us to pressurise our 'elected leaders', bring change through the ballot box or restrict our activities to the workplace. This is because they are afraid of class action they cannot control. They try to dismiss class violence as a symptom of Thatcherism, a sign of human unhappiness, but deny it is a part of the real battle against the ruling class, that will eventually sweep them away too. The 'State-in-waiting' cannot allow the working class to dismiss all authority, because that means them too.

Why shouldn't we steal from the rich! They steal from us all the time by forcing us into wage-slavery and making huge profits out of our work. Anarchists have no moral qualms about trashing or stealing the 'property' of people who own hundreds of times more than what they need and what we have.

Why is violence alright in the Eastern Bloc, in South Africa, in Nicaragua, but not here? Why was it alright for Watt Tyler and the peasants in the 1300s to kill officers enforcing the poll tax, but not for us? Is it because things here are 'not as bad'? Because we have a 'democracy' as a final resort instead? Anarchists treat bourgeois-democracy with scorn. Why should the working class wait for things to get worse, before the Left allow us to fight?

Violence is inevitable in a situation of class conflict - it is also necessary to bring about ultimate change.

At our most angry, those who can will fight, and those who can't will perform the more important role of enabling and supporting those who do.

Battles like Trafalgar Square increase the confidence of the class, and they also teach us to organise ourselves collectively and support each other so it is more frightening for the ruling class than it is for us in times of class conflict.

Violence and looting makes the case against the poll tax, the case for class anger and against poverty, very well indeed. The working class is on the march aganist the rich, and the Left struggle to keep up.

"ANARCHISTS ORGANISED THE VIOLENCE"

No we didn't - and we wouldn't take the credit. Such patronising suggestions that riots on demonstrations, picket lines and on housing eStates are organised by 'outside agitators' are simply not true.

Certainly plenty of Trotskyists would like to be accepted by the working class as leaders, but people always tell them to fuck off and sell their papers somewhere else.

We sometimes wonder if the State believes its own lies, that 'Rent-a-Mob' comes down to 'organise the violence'. The truth is that the ruling class want people to see the 'parliamentary road' as the way to change, and see people opposing that as 'extremists' imposing their views on 'decent people'.

Anarchists throughout the world have been, and are, active in opposing all dictatorships whether Fascist, Bolshevik, Monarchist or Bourgeois-democratic. But in any situation, not least over Trafalgar Square (or the fight against the poll tax in general) if we tried to impose any kind of leadership or manipulate people like the Left does, we would be told to fuck off, and quite rightly so.

The media can produce all the pictures they want of people 'coordinating the violence', but the truth is that people can and do organise mutually and more cleverly that that. Anyone who has been involved in class violence will know how it works, and how unwelcome any 'stewarding' or self-appointed leadership is.

Rioting is only one form of class anger - generally speaking only the young and able bodied without children to look after get involved. This does not negate the legitimacy of the violence - as communities throughout the world fighting the State know. The State organises the working class to fight for it in war time, and fools or forces it into supporting the war effort. When the working class fights the State, men and women united by class, not by colour or nationality, are involved and supported by the rest of the class because they choose to.

Unlike many marches, the majority of people who were on the London demo, and involved in fighting back against the police, were not in political parties, or apologists for Labourism. They were people affected by the poll tax. Many among them, anarchists too, were well used to fighting the police. The joy of this occasion was that we were hitting the State where it hurts - wealthy areas. They aren't just outraged becuase Militant didn't steward us well enough and we routed the police, but because we interupted the rich at play!

"VIOLENCE AND 'ANARCHY' WILL PUT ORDINARY PEOPLE OFF FIGHTING THE POLL TAX"

The truth is that working class people are sick and tired of being told to wait for a Labour government to get rid of the poll tax, or wait for the Tories to give in. They are glad to see the pressure increased and the pace livened up a bit.

This is why the strength of non-payment is so great. In Scotland, the poll tax has been resisted for over a year now - non-payment is a success! As it enters its second year, people's confidence has increased by seeing the English and Welsh working class so angry.

Campaigns have grown - not shrunk - since the start of April. People don't believe the State lies about the 'violent minority', they have no faith in the State and are are glad to see it opposed, as demonstrated by the massive anti-poll movement.

Many working class people in England thought the anti-poll tax campaign was full of moralist, middle class Lefties - like CND or Anti-Apartheid. Now they will get involved because they see it not as a 'protest' campaign, but one of direct action and resistence.

What certainly will put people off is Leftist politics dominating campaigns, and the refusal or reluctance by many Left groups to support those involved in violence against the State. What horrifies them further is self-appointed leaders of campaigns threatening to shop people 'involved' to the police. But what else would you expect from the enemies of the working class?

"THE POLICE STARTED THE VIOLENCE - BUT PEOPLE SHOULDN'T HAVE CARRIED IT ON"

Why do people always have to use the notion of police brutality as an excuse for attacking them? Of course they are violent and push us around - that's what they are there for! Anarchists are never afraid to advocate people, en masse, 'having a go' when there is any chance of getting away with it. It's important that this happens.

The middle class Left is afraid of class violence, they always say 'the police started it', 'the police didn't let me have my rights in custody', etc. They always present working class people as victims of police brutality.

When do the working class get the credit for fighting back? Only when we credit ourselves! Anarchists aim to show the police as vulnerable, so that people know they can be defeated.

Sure, the police very often provoke the actual violence in a situation of mounting class anger (as at Trafalgar Square), but going on about it implies that the class isn't angry enough to take on the State unless the State decides where, when and how it will happen, and this simply isn't the case.

"ANARCHISTS AND THE LEFT SHOULD UNITE AGAINST THE POLL TAX"

The Left often accuses us of being sectarian because we aim to expose the destructive role they play in struggles. We do this to stop them disempowering the class, so that struggles like the one against the poll tax stand a better chance of succeeding.

The Left are always on about uniting, but they engage in working class struggles for political gains to their own organisations, and so always end up in-fighting over irrelevant issues to 'prove' their point.

Anarchists are not part of the Left. We oppose cross class collaboration, so-called 'revolutionary' vanguards and those who pretend we can 'vote away' the ruling class. We are the enemies of any State leadership. Like most of the rest of the working class, we have a healthy mistrust of party politics.

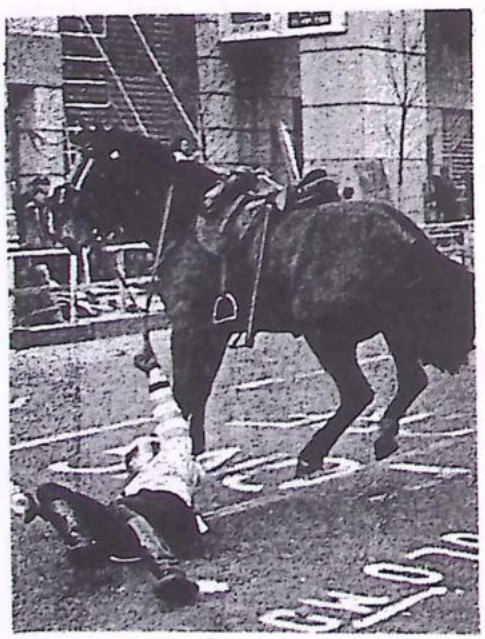
try to make meetings and anti-poll tax activity as boring and bureaucratic as they can in order to control them, and people often feel alienated by this process and don't get involved in organising themselves, however committed to non-payment they may be.

Leftist forms of organisation are elitist and empire building, which does nothing to make people enthused or inspired about coming out of their homes to organise with others of their class. The most exciting and effective actions nationwide against the tax, have not been inspired by Left politics. The very notion of non-payment as the major strategy, as opposed to industrial disruption, is one that comes from a distinctly non-Leftists tradition of rent strikes, and is one that the Left tail ended when it was clear how widespread it was becoming.

The Trafalgar Square riot was the most memorable battle with the police since the Miner's Strike, the '81 riots and the Wapping dispute. On all occasions the class were not afraid to take up the challenge. On all these occasions the Left were nowhere to be seen - except selling papers. As organisations, they were entirely irrelevant. It was a good job there were so many of their placards at the Trafalgar Square rally, however. For the first half hour there was nothing else to throw!

The Left are the enemies of autonomous working class organisation and action. Militant in particular, hold the theory that the 'disaffected' working class, the 'lumpen proletariat' (the homeless, criminals, uneducated and the most poverty stricken) are quite likely to 'flare up' occasionally. They believe this 'backward layer' must be contained until they can control it. They will come out with many arguments against anarchism, but what it comes down to is the fact that our ideology recognises the revolutionary impulse of the whole class. We expose Militant's fear that this 'layer' will seize the day and realize the irrelevance of Militant, the Labour Party and the whole lot of them.



The Socialist Workers Party (SWP) are making their own bid for leadership of the struggle, only less cleverly than Militant as they failed to recognise the capital they could make at the start. Along with most of the Left, their strategy is to get working class people to call on the TUC, Labour Party councillors etc to 'lead the fight'. They know that these people will 'let the class down', and the need for a better leadership - themselves - will be 'proved'. This tactic diverts energy away from the real fight against the poll tax, and dissillusions and even further disempowers working class people who are fighting back for themselves. This is why we oppose and expose it whenever we can.

At the end of the day, the class will reject 'their' leadership. One effect of community based anti-poll tax campaigns is to bring this time closer, as the tax is defeated.

"WHO ARE ANARCHISTS AND WHAT IS THEIR ROLE IN THE ANTI-POLL TAX STRUGGLE?"

The kind of anarchism with a tradition of organisation as part of the international working class - the kind the ACF advocates - is 'class struggle anarchism'. We oppose 'life-stylist' anarchism, where people think they can change society by 'dropping out', like the hippies in the '60s, and create a cultural alternative without a revolution.

Class struggle anarchists believe in organisation and close coordination in the working class. We are in revolutionary organisations like the ACF and Class War, although much specifically revolutionary activity goes on outside these groups. The Direct Action Movement, a 'syndicalist' anarchist organisation, are also class struggle anarchists, but we have some differences with them over the effectiveness of setting up alternative trades unions, which is their aim.

What really worries the State and the media is that you can't tell a class struggle anarchist from any other working class person.

We exist to expose the State and inspire the struggle against it. We see it as counter-productive to try to 'lead' this struggle, but we try to influence it with our ideas. Similarly, we don't impose a leadership on our movement. If the Left and the media find this confusing, that's their problem. Our methods come from historical experience in struggle. The State does not and cannot understand how we organise, because it can't lock up our leaders (as we have none).

Our role in the struggle against the poll tax is to encourage activity that takes its strength from the direct involvement of working class individuals, in the communities where we live, and the places where we work. It is hard to inspire people with the confidence to fight the State, as capitalism teaches us to leave 'change' up to other people. But any struggle - not least where a strategy like non-payment is involved - needs the direct input and mutual solidarity of the people concerned.

The ACF totally supports such confrontations with the State as Trafalgar Square - as they give the working class the confidence and skills needed to overthrow the ruling class. They teach us to show our anger and enjoy our class strength. Although life under capitalism is a bastard, we can change if we refuse to let them intimidate us.

What the State, the Left and the media choose to ignore, is that anarchists don't seek the job of 'co-ordinating' or 'organising' such action. We recognise the responsibility of the working class as a whole to respond to capitalism . Unlike Trotskyists and other Leftists, we don't think it needs us to do it for them, as though we were the conscious brain of a class too stupid to use its strength without leadership.

It is capitalism that isolates us, and makes it hard for us to act together. Anarchist communism is about showing people their collective class strength, towards overthrowing all rulers and all forms of capitalism, and organising instead for mutual benefit.

Our role is to encourage dissatisfaction and resistance wherever it raises its head, and to inspire other working class people with self confidence (through things like fighting the poll tax), and the desire for revolutionary change.

Polish anarchists begin to organise

THE POLISH ANARCHIST Federation (AFP) was set up on November 11 1989. It consists of at least 19 local groups, in 13 towns - which, for a newly emerged movement, is a considerable success. Nearly all these groups publish magazines or papers.

On January 12, anarchists shouting 'Down with capitalism', 'We don't want price rises' and 'Turn Kuron into soup' (Kuron - a former 'dissident' - now Minister for Labour in the new Polish government) interrupted a session of the Senate (Polish Parliament) in Warsaw for fifteen minutes.

The AFP is widely regarded as the main revolutionary force opposed to both the 'Communist' bureaucrats and the Solidarity advocates of austerity measures.

Evidence for this can be found in the following interview with Josef Pinior: a leading member of the Polish Socialist Party-Democratic Revolution (PSP-DR) - which has been translated from a French journal and re-edited.

How do you explain the evolution of Solidarity?

I don't think it is possible to talk about the evolution of Solidarity as if it were a single unit, united by a single programme. On the contrary, Solidarity is today deeply divided.

On one side, we have a new bureaucratic set-up, around Lech Walesa, which is trying to turn Solidarity into a classic reformist union.

On the other hand, there is the Solidarity made up of the rank and file, trying to address the problems that the majority of Polish society is facing: the questions posed by the struggle against 'pauperisation', etc.

If the leadership of Solidarity continues to oppose the struggles being led by the rank and file - strikes and wage-demands - sooner or later there will be open conflict between the two groups.

Do you think a revolutionary alternative to Solidarity will emerge in Poland?

I have no doubt that such an alternative is likely to appear. Why? The system which reigns throughout the Bloc cannot continue. Gorbachev knows this perfectly well and this system is now confronted with a turning-point.

The leaders of the emerging 'opposition' movements dream of a 'capitalism with a human face'. You know of the proposals of the International Monetary Fund for Poland: as throughout the world, we are to 'tighten our belts' to meet the costs of economic reform. I am certain that the majority of workers, of society, will not accept pauperisation. We cannot allow ourselves to. The Poles are ready to fight.

You cannot solve the crisis by accentuating social differences. The people that economic reform will throw onto the street are going to struggle. They will defend themselves with strikes and demonstrations, and this resistance will come from all the rank and file structures of Solidarity.

Rank-and-File Solidarity, is the real workers' movement, it's also getting involved in all the opposition groups that are being created at the moment. I think that in these strikes, in these wage struggles, a revolutionary consciousness will be born, and with it a search for an alternative way to organise society, destroying once and for all, all vestiges of Stalinism.

The ideas of workers' control over production, and the creation of grass-roots democracy will flourish. This new socialist alternative, because it will be confronted by the experiences of Stalinism, will naturally have anarchist elements within it. It will necessarily be an alternative based on self-management.

Can you give a brief sketch of the present Polish opposition and its different tendencies?

Starting off with Rank and File Solidarity, the factory committees, where a process of re-evaluation is going on, a new consciousness can be seen in the new structures that are directly political and in new thought that is explicitly left-wing.

It is the same for the anarchist groupings which have been organised, and which are becoming an important element on the Polish political landscape. There is finally the effect that this radicalism has caused on Fighting Solidarity, which has not yet arrived at a clear political position. This is a group which separated itself from Solidarity, mixing very different elements in its programme, including self-management and 'social solidarity', with the free market and parliamentary democracy.

It seems that we are seeing in the last few years a questioning of traditional religious and nationalist ideas held by the Polish workers' movement and by the young. What can you tell us about the emergence of these anti-authoritarian currents?

Young people are a very important element in the Polish political scene. Growing up under the State of Emergency, they've experienced tear gas and tanks on the streets. And now they see no future for themselves. They cannot find housing or well-paid work - they have no future other than hunger.

This generation is clearly opposed to the leadership of Solidarity as well as to the Church, and - of course - to the government itself. It realises that all these forces share the aim of 're-modelling' young people, to help maintain the system of exploitation and domination.

This spontaneous rejection led to an influx of young people into the new opposition groups. The PSP-DR, the anarchist groups of Fighting Solidarity are 80-90% made up of people under 30. While the Church and its following exercised an enormous influence on the young generation before August 1980, the young opposition is completely made up of those outside and the Church and sometimes actively opposed to it.

The first signs of anti-clericalism are appearing - and will develop. This

Creating a Hungarian

AFTER POLAND, A second anarchist movement has developed in Eastern Europe: in Hungary.

In 1986, the idea of creating anarchist groups was raised during a meeting. But, if the interest in anarchist ideas was already important, there was - as yet - no feeling for the need to organise.

At this time, some anarchist ideas were being expressed through the underground paper Egtajak Kozoth ('Between the Cardinal Points'). In 1988, twenty people met in Budapest, to form an anarchist group, calling it Autonomia. Three other groups were formed: Eger, Nyiregyhaza, and Szekeskhervar.

Autonomia holds weekly meetings, devoted to both theory and practice. It takes an active part within the Hungarian opposition. Several of its members were among founders of Hungarian Solidarity (Munkasszolidaritas - 'Workers' Solidarity'). It participated in the giant demo of March 15 1989, when between 90,000 and 100,000 people turned out in Budapest.

It gave full support to the struggle against the hydro-electric dams on the Danube.

What hopes for the movement? A lot of time has passed since the workers' councils of 1919 and 1956. In reaction to the totalitarian system there is often a systematic rejection of all structures that are too rigid and hierarchical. This attitude can sometimes become complete apoliticism, or even a kind of nihilism.

Nevertheless, the development of the movement points to the clear revival of anarchism in Eastern Europe.

Hungary - Background.

AT THE END of the 1970s, the 'goulash socialism' of Hungary began to run out of goulash. It was the end of the 'Hungarian economic miracle'.

During the next ten years, the development of the struggle seemed to follow the development of inflation. And now, for over a year, the situation has accelerated, the economy has dived, tension has mounted and the rulers are vacillating.

On March 15 1988, 15,000 people (compared with 1,000 in 1985) marched to commemorate the 1848 uprising, and - by association - that of 1956 against the 'Communist' Government. People coming out onto the streets began to realise their power, and to rid themselves of a feeling of isolation. The following year, between 90,000 and 100,000 demonstrated. The 'Communist' Party, in the face of this mass movement, has been compelled to grant reforms and to destroy its own political monopoly.

Many political groups have emerged. A fortnight after the 1988 demo, the Fidesz (Young Democrats) was formed - an important organisation, uniting different political tendencies of the young opposition.

In the Autumn, the SzDsz was born fron the Network of Independent Initiatives. At its origin, it was a loose co-ordination designed to encourage the circulation of information between the many 'informal initiatives'. Now, it was felt that a more structured organisation was necessary. The SzDsz (Federation of Independent Democrats) united the great majority of well-known personalities of the intelligensia. It is a fertile forum for ideas, but its influence is limited to 3,000 people amongst the intelligensia, nearly all in Budapest.

Since 1987, a 'Counter-Parliament' organised by dissidents has existed in Budapest. This mutated in Autumn 1988 into a forum laregly dominated by right-wingers. Within it there are three tendencies - liberal, conservative and popularist. This Hungarian Democratic Forum (MDF) groups 15,000 people together, and is more influential that the SzDsz with its solid network of local committees.

Parties

The Party of Smallholders has also re-formed. Before the 'Communist' take-over, this group was important in a Hungary that was essentially rural. But now with massive industrialisation, this Party has no future, unless it breaks with its exclusively peasant role.

Other groups that have emerged include the Hungarian Party of Independence (extreme-right wing) who support Christian and Nationalist values. There is also a Nazi Party - the Hungarian National-Socialist Party - led by some old-timers of Hungarian fascism, who control a hundred skinheads who regularly attack Jews and Gypsies. They phenomenon was very visible in the campaign against the Bill banning abortion, which the Church has tried to get through Parliament. A left-alternative, composed of the PSP-DR, anarchist groups and feminist groups, developed during the struggle against the Bill.

Can you talk more precisely about the anarchist groups in Poland?

These groups appeared in many towns throughout Poland. The PSP-DR collaborates very closely with them. The most important groups are in Gdansk and Warsaw where we let them use our office.

Here, the anarchists are in the workers' movement. Radically opposed to Walesa, and all compromises between the leadership of Solidarity and the POUP (the Polish Communist Party). They are often with us in the front-line of strikes and demonstrations. This is only the beginning of this movement and we shall soon see how it will develop, but in any case this libertarian current testifies - in my eyes - to the renewal of the Polish workers' movement.

The AFP (Polish Anarchist Federation) has the problem that it's a movement composed essentially of young people cut off from the Polish anarchist tradition, and which often have 'anti-organisational' reflexes. It has grown in a very short time from a few dozen to around 500 militants. The movement organised a demonstration to commemorate the Krondstadt Rising which drew several thousand people in Gdansk.

Anti-nuclear actions in Gdansk and Pozman in April and May 1989 drew 10,000 people and stopped the construction of a nuclear power station. International contacts have increased, especially with other East European countries.

In August 1989 a demonstration against the Berlin Wall was organised on the same day in Poland and in Hungary in co-operation with the Hungarian libertarian group 'Autonomia' in Budapest.

are a tiny minority, but a recent poll showed that 80% were in favour of a Hungary 'free' of its 150,000 Jews and 100,000 Gypsies.

The Trotskyists are working within the Group for an Alternative Left. Their ideas, and their rhetoric of 'workers' councils', could have some influence amongst Hungarians - but are hindered by a language little different from that of the 'Communist' rulers. They are developing international contacts, and plan to create a Revolutionary Workers' Party of Hungary.

Finally, the Hungarian Social-Democratic Party wants a Swedish-style set-up. It was created by old Social-Democrat militants who were meeting together to campaign for the 'rehabilitation' of some of their comrades, shot by the 'Communists'. There is a fairly strong current amongst the young which supports this group, and it could become the second force of opposition behind the MDF, if not the first.

But the opposition is not limited to political parties. Some intellectuals are grouped within the Union of Scientific Workers (TDDSz). The independent union Munkasszolidaritas (Workers' Solidarity) is more important. It was born at a meeting of SzDsz for the workers. It limits itself to defence of workers' interests. It refuses all links with political groupings, but also refuses any vision of a new society.

It is no more than a large committee, several hundred strong. But it could be an important force if the economic situation becomes more aggravated.

Strikes have taken place in the mines and in industry. The 'Communist' bureaucrats, terrified by the spectre of 1956 and the Polish strikes in August 1988, gave in to the demands. The ecologist movement is relatively strong in Hungary, concentrating on the struggle against the hydro-electric dams on the Danube. But it has failed to take up the struggle against nuclear power.

In May 1989, the tensions within the ruling party came to a head, when a group of four was placed at the head of the political bureau. These were among the most well-known 'reformers' within the Party (Pozsgai, Nemeth) alongside a more moderate reformer (Nyers) and a 'conservative' (Grosz). However, this compromise failed, and an alliance of 'ultra-reformers' and the 'moderate' reformers led to the dissolving of the party, and the establishment of a new party - the Hungarian Socialist Party - pledged to social-democracy and rejecting all allusions to communism, and democratic centralism within the Party.

Promises

The new Party hoped to dump the conservatives and rally most of the membership. However, only 70,000 have joined (10% of the old Party membership), whilst an equal number, rallying to the conservatives, have kept the old name Socialist Workers Party.

The new 'reforming' Party has so-far retained its 'cells' in the factories and in the 'workers militia' and its leadership is a compromise between 'moderates' and 'ultra-reformers'.

In the first round of Hungary's complex multi-party 'free elections' on March 25, all parties with their roots in the old 'Communist' government performed badly, with many leading party figures suffering humiliating defeats.

In the second round, on April 8, the 'centre-right' Democratic Forum fared best - winning 165 of the 386 assembly seats. The Forum announced plans to form a 'grand coalition', probably including the rightist Alliance of Free Democrats and the Smallholders Party.

Socialist Party candidates won only 33 seats, with the hardline Stalinist Socialist Workers Party being all but obliterated. The Socialist Party is in a very weak position to scrabble for a place in the coalition.

The ex-'Communists' gamble - that by offering to share power they could avoid losing it all together - seems to have gone badly wrong.

Hungary - the Past...

1907 - The journal Tarsadalmi Forradalorm appears, advancing anarchist communist ideas up to 1911. One of the editors is Ervin Batthyanny (born 1877) who after having spent a long time in England - where he met the anarchist thinker Kropotkin - devotes himself to work with agricultural workers. With other young anarchists he breaks away from the group of Eugene Heinrich Schmitt - Tolstoyan pacifist - to create a popular libertarian organisation.

A group led by Ervin Szabo (1877-1918) opposes its collectivist programme, and believes that the movement should be built on the lines of French anarcho-syndicalism.

1914-1918 Szabo organises coordination of shop stewards in key factories with anti-militarist movement initiated by Galileo Circle, composed of socialists and liberals. At his funeral in 1918, thousands turn out. As a result - and because of the Russian revolution - the Budapest Soviet is set up, but crushed by reactionary forces. Many anarchists are killed, but many also rally to the new 'Communist' Party, fooled by Lenin's apparent libertarian rhetoric. Among them are Tibor Szamuely, the anarcho-syndicalist Rabinowicz and Otto Korvin. Many of these later perish in Stalin's purges when exiled in the USSR.

The fascist Admiral Horthy sets up a regime and continues the liquidation of anarchist groups.

1944 - Anarchist groups re-emerge around the veteran Torockoi (who was 80 in 1945). The first libertarian action is against German forces, by an anarchist student group. One of them, surnamed Christ (!) - a 15 year old poet(!) - is captured. In prison he meets comrade Aton M of the Hungarian-Yugoslavian anarchist group Bacska ('the South') which is a hundred strong, and is one of the most important resistance groups.

October 1944 - Christ and the Russian anarchist Alexei Korsakin are freed after ther Szalazi coup against Horthy.

They make contact with Torockoi and with P.M. - a student who had set up an anarchist group supported by the 'Communists'. They start to harass the Nazi and Fascist military, adopting the legendary red-belt of Korsakin. They refuse unity of action with 'Communists', who denounce them to the Germans - who arrest 67 militants including P.M. His group splits, and two thirds go over to the 'Communists'.

Korsakin's group - wearing red belts - attack and destroy two units of the Hungarian river fleet, in central Budapest. The following night, Christ's group - Sz. F. ('Libertarian Youth') blow up a munitions dump. A third group are executed after an attack on Nazi Party headquarters. The movement continues attacks up to the Battle of Budapest, which claims 200,000 lives. The movement decides to safeguard its forces for the political struggle to come after the expulsion of the fascists.

July 1945 - The movement regroups. Three tendencies emerge. P.M.'s group wants a working arrangement with the 'Communists' against the ruling class. Torockoi's group wants the legalisation of the movement, Korsakin's and Christ's groups want to continue the armed struggle against the State and the Russian troops. Torockoi's views gain majority. A print-shop is set-up, and propaganda distributed. The movement has 500 militants, and its influence spreads.

'Communists' then ban the movement. Torockoi dies after arrest. Four anarchist students open fire on Russian troops, and die in the fighting. In the factories of Csepel island, anarchists lead the only strike after liberation from the fascists. Thirty workers, including 24 anarchists, are subsequently executed. The movement is liquidated. P.M. flees to Italy, Christ and Korsakin to France.

B Traven: the voice of anger

"MY BIOGRAPHY WOULD not disappoint you, but it is my own private affair, and I want to keep it to myself. I do this not out of egotism... the biography of a creative person is completely unimportant. If the person cannot be recognised in his works, then he isn't worth a damn, and neither is his work", B Traven, letter to his publisher.

B Traven was the author of The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (made into a film with Humphey Bogart) The Death Ship and many other novels written between 1920 and 1940.

In the sixties his books began to be reprinted, and many radicals and revolutionaries began to read him. They felt great admiration for his depiction of working people's lives and of the great elemental forces than run through times of revolution.

The shadowy Traven appears to have been born as Otto Feige, son of a potter in 1882, in what was then Germany and is now Poland. He left home after military service, re-emerging as the actor Ret Marut. During the First World War he began to bring out a fiery little anarchist magazine Die Ziegelbrenner (Brickburner), railing against the war and the ruling class.

In 1919 revolution broke out in Bavaria, and workers formed councils and armed militias. with other anarchists and revolutionary socialists, he participated in this uprising, and when the troops from Berlin viciously smashed this manifestation of freedom, he was sentenced to death by a military tribunal. He escaped by minutes from a firing squad and continued to publish the Brickburner underground. He greeted the "six hundred honest revolutionaries" who had been slaughtered by the soldiers, "I greet you all again in death! All of you, without a single exception, not even excepting the so-called 'murderers of hostages'. All of you died for the sacred cause of human progress; and all of us make mistakes."

He left Europe in 1924, arriving in Mexico. Here he claimed tha he was American, born in Chicago of Scandinavian immigrants. About this time he began to write his books, adopting the name B Traven. The first of these were published in Germany.

Not until he was on his death bed did he admit he was Ret Marut. He had wished to remain obscure because of the exposure in his books of the terrible exploitation of the Mexican Indian peasants and because he had become an organiser for the 'Wobblies' - nickname for the Industrial Workers of the World, a revolutionary workers' union based in the US (His organising activities are graphically and amusingly described in The Cotton-Pickers).

He masqueraded under the name T Torsvan and even worked as a consultant on the film The Treasure of the Sierra Madre - never revealing that he was the author.

One of his finest books is the Death Ship. In hard-boiled style, it tells the story of an American sailor stranded in Antwerp without papers. He becomes the stateless person shuffled from country to country and harasses at all turns by the bureaucracy and by the police. Because he cannot get a job on an official ship, he is forced to work on the Death Ship, which runs arms to whoever will buy.

The book is a brilliant exposure of the evils of the Nation State and national frontiers. The Death Ship itself represents all the horrors of the system of exploitation - militarism and profiteering out of war, and the utter degradation its sailors suffer. Yet through the agonising conditions that they face, we see them preserve their humanity and their willingness to resist.

Six books - The Jungle Novels - deal with the lives of the Mexican Indian peasants - how they are fooled, exploited and beaten by the landlords, and their servants, the police and foremen. They deal with the horrific conditions in the lumber- camps and build slowly and excruciatingly to a revolutionary climax. These books are filled with scenes of brutality; and revolutionaries in their turn inflict brutality on the bosses. Traven raises his voice in anger again and again, against the obscene set-up. "It was no fault of the rebels that they were animated by sentiments of death and destruction...they gave proofs of cruelty only because their adversaries and oppressors were a hundred times more cruel and savage than they themselves, and such proofs were provided only to safeguard their interests".

Traven fully appreciates the power of mass action. As one of revolutionaries says, "If you are in mass, you begin to be worth something. With the mass you possess a thousand heads and two thousand rigorous arms; and when you're in mass, you have the superiority... the strongest lion is disarmed when he faces ten million ants, and is compelled to abandon his prey which he wishes to capture. You are the ants, and the bosses are the lions".

Traven writes with intimate knowledge of working lives especially the Mexican Indians. His books aren't pretty. They are not about refined, cultured people with complicated psychological problems. They are about the wretched of the earth. They are about class struggle. they are about revolution.

As the sailor Stanislav says in the Death Ship, "There is justice in this world. Heaps of it. But not for sailors, and not for working men making trouble. Justice is for the people who can afford to have it".

Many of Traven's works are available in paperback.

How can ambulance crews win?

YOUR ARTICLE ON the ambulance dispute in Organise! 18 raises some important issues. Here are some comments on them.

In your comments on the move towards all-out strike action (under the subheading "Push") you argue that such a move would be "fraught with dangers", and say it would be better to concentrate on spreading the strike to other health workers. You also say that an all-out strike would undermine support. There is a basic contradiction in saying ambulance workers should not strike because they could threaten working class people's lives and then going on to advocate strikes by other health workers. Surely strike action by these other workers could also threaten life?

What you don't mention in the article is that low pay in the ambulance service had led to understaffing before the dispute, which was already resulting in people dying unnecessarily. The pay dispute was in part aimed at rectifying this situation.

Anarchist

The strategy of the unions involved was to build public support (the same strategy which failed in both the News International and P&O disputes). You seem to have partially taken this strategy on board. We would say that, as ambulance workers are primarily part of the working class rather than some 'special case', they should use all the tactics which revolutionaries would recommend to any other group of workers.

Your recommendation that the ambulance staff should have concentrated on spreading the dispute to other workers rather than on escalating their own action is too abstract. Secondary picketting is illegal and the union would have attempted to stop it. Your recommendation therefore assumes that the ambulance workers are mostly anti-union. In reality the reverse is true.

That is why wildcat strikes, which would have been a first step to breaking the unions' control, should have been supported by you. In any case, we would say that it is virtually a principle of class struggle anarchism that you support the rebel workers against the union leaders.

There are also tactical reasons why the strikes should have been supported. Firstly, it is important that action is taken as rapidly as possible. A war of attrition only helps the bosses. Secondly, workers are more likely to strike in support of your cause if you yourself are on strike. Finally a nationwide strike would have strengthened the ambulance workers because management would no longer be able to keep them divided by suspending some, whilst others were still working.

The basic position that we put in our leaflets was to spread the dispute to which ever workers would be likely to strike in solidarity. This included health workers but also other workers who have more 'industrial muscle'.

We hope that these comments will help further the discussions about what our orientation towards strike action should be.

AUTHOR'S REPLY: Thanks for your comments. Here are a few of my own.

You seem to take two 'facts' as self-evident truths. Firstly, that the maintenance of accident and emergency cover was 'holding back the dispute', and, secondly, that its withdrawal would guarantee the ambulance workers a swift victory.

I think both these views are flawed. To begin with, though I want to look at the arguments that underlie your assertion that there is a single 'group of tactics' which we should recommend to all workers.

Our article utterly rejected the unions' 'special case' argument - a strategy that set out to isolate ambulance crews from other health workers. But it's no use pretending patients, but if workers asserted their direct control over levels of 'emergency cover' on the wards and elsewhere, that risk would be minimised.

There's another difference to the kind of dispute strategy we should argue for with different that every single group of workers can and should follow an identical course of industrial action in each and every dispute.

Workers punching out Monster Munch shapes in a crisp factory are hardly in an identical position to nurses working in a premature baby unit. They're both groups of workers, both undeniably part of the working class - but in different economic circumstances. We'd argue that crisp workers in a dispute should walk off the line, shut the factory and spread flying pickets to other plants and suppliers. Your blanket argument would lead you to argue that those nurses should switch off the incubators and walk off the ward. It would mean telling workers in nightshelters, or in women's refugees to lock the doors and kick the residents out onto the streets. It would mean telling benefit and dole office workers to shut up shop, and stop the sending of giros to the unemployed.

We shouldn't mimic the Left's myopic worldview that supports any sectional action by a group of workers, regardless of the consequences that action might have on other sections of the class.

Certainly, it's often impossible for groups of workers to take action that doesn't have an impact on other working class people. The crews' withdrawal of outpatient cover certainly inconvenienced many patients. But there's an obvious distinction between pulling people out of car crashes and saving heart attack victims, and routine work on the wards - it's just plain puerile to suggest there isn't. Action by other health workers might affect groups of workers. We'd never advocate that - faced with a lock-out - those Monster Munch workers should re-occupy the factory and start up the production lines again themselves. Neither should printworkers, car workers, steel workers, builders, or any other group of manufacturing or production workers involved in a strike seek to keep the wheels of their industry turning.

But the situation in the ambulance dispute was blatantly different. We should totally support the crews' seizure of their stations, vehicles and equipment, and back their efforts to run an accident and emergency service direct to the public - completely outside the control of the Service bosses'. This has nothing to do with seeking to maintain 'public support' as you seem to think - it was the course of action most threatening to ambulance bosses, most likely to win support from other sections of the class, and a good position from which to appeal to other groups of workers for solidarity action.

Unity

Where it happened, crews' seizure of the service clearly panicked ambulance bosses who threw everything they had into trying to put a stop to it. Why did they do that unless they feared the consequences of seeing such action spread? Had that happened nationally, it would have succeeding in uniting the crews and put them all on the same footing.

Had the Tories then moved in to try to shut down a national accident and emergency service that the crews were running themselves, the resultant carnage would have been directly the government's responsibility, and the spotlight would have been on them, not on the crews.

But to return to the 'assumption' that I began with: why would an isolated all-out strike have given the crews that crucial bit more leverage to tip the scales their way?

In manufacturing and production industries the strength of any group of workers is plainly economic. The damage they can inflict on a company's profits through a strike can force a 'better deal' from their bosses. Ambulance workers have near-zero economic clout. Unless we believe that the Tories fear 'outraged public opinion', why should an all-out ambulance strike force the government to back down? Would their 'concern for humanity' bring them back to the negotiating table? As the body count rose - who would be liable to crack first - Thatcher or the crews?

Is it not also likely that faced with one Hillsborough-type incident, and an all-out strike would crack as crews responded to a major emergency?

You're right that most of the more militant ambulance workers were in support of an all-out strike as a way to bring the dispute to a head. But there was practically no talk of this being the pre-cursor to spreading the strike throughout the health service and to other groups of workers beyond. The demand - whilst against the wishes of the unions' leadership - was (as our original article stated) still locked in the confines of trade unionism. It reflected more a sense of desperation than of a rising tide of conscious militancy. The overwhelming ballot vote in favour of a universally hated settlement was later proof of this.

Spread

Calls to spread the dispute to other workers were far from 'abstract' as you claim. For a start ambulance workers were never going to win on their own, and we shouldn't peddle the myth that they could if they only acted 'militantly enough'. Secondly, the health service is teeming with anger, resentment and bitterness - there's a huge groundswell of opposition to all manner of government plans for the NHS. The ambulance dispute could have been the focus to turn that anger into generalised action on all fronts. Of course secondary action is illegal and, certainly, the union would move against it - but should revolutionaries simply 'go with the flow', and not challenge workers' acceptance of the union?

The article welcomed the growing split between many of the crews and the union negotiators, but it's hardly a 'principle of class struggle anarchism ' to mutely and uncritically tail-end rank and file feeling if we think it's focusing in the wrong direction.

You're dead right that a 'war of attrition only helps the bosses', but that wasn't what we were advocating. You're right too over the need to unite crews in national action. We agree. But I'm unsure whether you think the ambulance crews could have won by themselves or not: at one point you say the idea of '...spreading the dispute to other workers... is too abstract', but later you say that such a strategy is you're 'basic position'.

Decisive

It wasn't the maintenance of emergency cover that led to the defeat of the ambulance dispute. It was the crews total isolation from other health service workers, and the lack of widespread, effective solidarity action from other workers. It was the fact that despite Roger Poole's deep unpopularity, workers' resentment towards the union never resulted in a decisive break from it.

We can only hope that the bitterness left by the appalling settlement, and the politicisation of a traditionally 'moderate' group of workers, provide a better basis for building the kind of action needed to win the next ambulance dispute.

Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. Women's oppression predates capitalism and cannot be solely explained in terms of class. Anarchist communism will not be achieved without abolishing sexual oppression. However, women are divided across class lines and therefore should not attempt to form a united women's movement. But working class women, may in times of struggle, need to organise autonomously and they may at times feel more united as a sex than as part of a class. The unity between working class men and women will be stronger in the long term than the interests that women have cross-class. However, this unity must be based on full equality.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide, and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class.

We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism.

The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives wil always be different to ours.

The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9. As anarchist we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called 'socialists' or 'communists' we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

PRISON RIOTS ERUPT

THE LAST FEW weeks have seen a great upsurge in working class fight back, not just on the streets of Britain during the anti-poll tax demonstrations and riots, but also inside the walls of Her Majesty's prisons.

As soon as prisoners took over the wings of Strangeways in Manchester, burnt and demolished their cells and other parts of the prison, the state and press were ready with stories of bodies strewn around the prison as violent prisoner attacked sex offender. Just what you'd expect from the uncontrollable elements in our society, so they said. We now know this to be completely untrue.

Media attempts to remove any public support for the prisoners failed as they climbed on the roof and told us the truth. Since then the state has engaged in out and out psychological warfare on the prisoners. They told us that outspoken spokesman Paul Taylor was a convicted rapist, that other prisoners were afraid of reprisals from the 'hard core' if they gave in, and that prisoners were ill with food poisoning. And all this while police and screws in riot gear attempted to regain control by force, and blasted the prisoners on the roof with loud music sirens and firecrackers, whenever it looked like they might be getting the facts across.

The Strangeways riots inspired similar unrest in many other prisons and youth institutions; Bedford, Bristol, Brixton, Cardiff, Dartmoor, Durham, Glen Parva, Humberside Eventhorpe, Hull, Leeds, Lindholme, Long Lartin, Pentonville, Perth, Shepton Mallet, Shotts, Stoke Heath, Wandsworth. To name but a few!

Whilst the mainstream press have been spreading lies, the Left press have been falling over themselves calling for better, nicer prisons and more screws to 'take care' of them, so that it won't happen again.

An incredible 1 in 1000 people of Britain's population are in prison at any one time, mostly working class people. Are the liberal prison reformers trying to tell us all prisoners want is cleaner cells, longer exercise periods, and one to one attention from a personal screw?

Of course, some people (like rapists) will need to be reckoned with even in an anarchist society. But prisons are just the hard end of the state which locks away people it can't control. We support as equals in the class struggle, prisoners fighting the state in the the only way left open to them. And they'll need all the support they can get. As we go to press, the outcome of the Strangeways occupation is uncertain, but the prisoners still on the roof must know they face either life sentences in isolation, or worse if the government gets tired of waiting.

ORGANISE

ORGANISE! IS THE national magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF). Organise! is a quarterly theoretical journal published in order to develop anarchist communist ideas. It aims to give a clear anarchist viewpoint on contemporary issues, and initiate debate on areas not normally covered by agitational journals.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and others open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us develop our ideas further. Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! - as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will endeavour to publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree withour A&Ps at all). The deadlines for the November 1990 issue are September 17 for features and reviews, and September 30 for letters and news.

All contributions for the next issue should be sent to OUR NEW ADDRESS:

Nottingham ACF, PO Box 97, West PDO, Nottingham NG7 5LQ.

PRESS FUND

Organise! doesn't carry pages of advertisements so revenue doesn't automatically come in. It survives on sales and the goodwill of its readers and supporters. That goodwill is probably more important now than it ever has been.

As the fightback against the poll tax grows, as the collapse of Leninism in Eastern Europe provides the chance for a renewed class struggle anarchist movement on an international level, it becomes vital that the ideas of libertarian communism become widespread within every section of the working class - the ideas of running society in a free and self-organised way, where there are no longer classes, borders, or armed forces, where money has been abolished and where racism, sexism and exploitation are things of the past.

If you support our ideas then help us to spread them. Not only by sending us as much money as you can afford to our Press Fund, but also by taking a bundle of Organise! to sell at your workplace, dole queue, tenants association or poll tax group. (Bundles on sale or return basis from ACF, c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1).

AFTER THE TRAFALGAR SQUARE RIOT:

The State goes on the offensive

THE EVENTS DURING and after the 31st March in Trafalgar Square graphically demonstrate the various ways in which the State will attack working class people when they fight back against its oppressive political, social and economic measures.

When 200,000 people took to the streets to protest against the Poll Tax, the State - in the shape of the Metropolitan Police and its riot squads - had already decided that everyone on that march was a de facto criminal, to be dealt with by baton, riot shield, charging horses and any other violent measure that it took to keep us off 'their' streets.

Courts

But smashing us in the face with a truncheon isn't the only way in which the State keeps us down. Once they've done that, the massive power of the Judiciary and Courts can be brought to bear. Immediately after the 31st the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) and the Metropolitan Police set up a 'riot prosecution service' - the first of its kind - made up of 137 full-time officers and 13 lawyers, to prepare cases and help make yet further arrests.

One of the first acts of this so-called 'Operation Carnaby' was to seize photographs from the press, who - with the exception of the 'Guardian' and 'Independent' reporters - willingly handed over up to 30,000 still pictures to complement 90 hours of the Mets own video tape.

These scum then orchestrated a massive and hysterical campaign to help the CPS and Met. track down others involved, running such features as "Gallery of Hate" (Sunday Mirror, 13/05), and the infamous "If you know 'em, shop 'em" (The People, 13/05).

It is clear that the Press is nothing but the instrument of the State, and our first consideration as a class in any similar situation should be to stop anyone taking pictures of us. We must smash any cameras before taking on the Pigs as an absolute priority. Secondly, we must start to consider "masking up" before the march, as they have done in other countries around the world for years.

Inevitably, there followed many more arrests (over 100 in addition to the 350+ arrested on the day), with paramilitary-style dawn raids in the Stamford Hill and Dalston areas of Hackney to name just two incidents. Meanwhile, wherever the CPS has had half a chance, it has upped - or added on - charges to those arrested. Or, to keep cases from being heard before a potentially sympathetic jury, reduced them instead : basically, whatever it takes to secure a conviction.

One example among many was of a Nottingham student sentenced to a month for nothing more than throwing an empty can that hit no-one (he pleaded guilty, the prosecution asked for leniency, but the State wants blood). As one defendant put it "People were arrested at random and charged at random had no idea what offence I was supposed to have committed. It was like a lottery."

Trafalgar Square (and the recent events in Bucharest) have shown once again that there is no such thing as a "benign" State, that the buzzword "Democracy" is a sick myth. All States will crush working class people when they try to fight back against poverty and oppression, all States must be be destroyed.

Scum

The reaction of the Left has been typical of what working class people have come to expect. 'Militant' were the first to show themselves as police collaborators after the 31st, with Steve Nally losing no time in announcing that the 'Miltitant' dominated All British Anti Poll Tax Federation (ABAPTF) would be "naming names", swiftly followed by them calling on the 'labour' movement to "unmask" and "deal with ... the disruptors and disorganisers (sic) of Saturdays demonstration" ('Militant' Editorial, 6th April).

Tommy Sheridan concurred, saying the ABAPTF would have "no qualms" about "informing the police" of any rioters it could identify. In Nottingham, "Militant" scum echoed this threat in an open meeting of anti-poll tax activists held on the 1st April.

Since then, they have been scrambling to backslide from this position after the wave of anger that met these announcements. But it doesn't matter what pitiful excuses they make now, they will always collaborate with the State against working class people, or (like the Socialist Workers Party) tail-end real struggles with laughable whinging about "a lack of leadership". Among all this mayhem, the Trafalgar Square Defence Campaign (TSDC), and several affiliated local campaigns have provided valuable support and aid for defendants. The message is clear : Fuck the Left and let's organise ourselves for anarchist communism ! •

The Trafalgar Square Defence Campaign was set up by defendants and their solicitors in the aftermath of the 31st of March to help counter the massive State campaign against those arrested both on the day and since.

It's avowed aims are to "unconditionally support all those arrested", to be "run by and accountable to those arrested" and to be "independent of all other organisations".

The campaign has gathered information on on over 150 defendants, raised money to help with legal costs etc., co-ordinated solicitors and defendants, and provided a forum for discussion and solidarity for those arrested. Representatives try to be at every court case, and it is currently fighting to get access to the 30,000 still photographs and 90 hours of video tape evidence that the CPS is trying to withhold from defence lawyers.

The TSDC has become the national focus for defendants, but local groups affiliated to it have sprung up in Birmingham, Nottingham and Brighton, to help people locally.

The campaign urges anyone who has been arrested, or anyone who has any information that may be of use to defendants to contact them or their local affiliated groups as soon as possible. It is vital that we build a strong and co-ordinated front against the forces of the State arrayed against us, so setting up local support groups raising the matter at local anti-Poll Tax groups and raising money by benefit gigs, collections etc, will all be of help. Anarchists from East and West meet

ORGANISED BY THE 'Germinal' group of the Italian Anarchist Federation, this conference was one of the first of its kind, especially since the recent events in Eastern Europe.

200 people were present, including most of the Western European countries as well as the United States, Canada, and most Eastern European countries.

There were discussions on fundamental questions facing the international anarchist movement. It was vitally important to make contact, and above all to share our experiences of struggle and our conceptions of society, in order to move forward to transform it.

During these debates certain 'comrades' in the West have implied that a market society is compatable with a libertarian society, that society cannot be analysed in terms of social antagonisms. In other words, the class struggle is not a priority. This was most noticeable with the U.S. and Canadian delegation.

Others affirmed the Great Vague Ideas of Anarchism - abstentionism and anti-clericalism, but how useful were these incantations to the East European comrades?

What's more, when it came to discussing concrete solidarity, again the American delegation proposed the setting up of an International Press Agency via computer network! But is this this possible for the Eastern Europeans, or politically interesting for militants of both East and West? Especially if it was merely an exchange of information without analysis?

The events in Eastern Europe have shaken the preconceptions of many Western comrades. As anarchist communists, with a class analysis of society we must base ourselves on our experiences in social movements. We need to reach accurate and useful conclusions about the nature of international capitalism, but not with a feeling of superiority over our Eastern European comrades. This is the sense of the motion drawn up by some French, British and Austrians present.●

STATEMENT FOR THE TRIESTE CONFERENCE 14-17 APRIL 1990 DRAWN UP BY DELEGATES FROM THE ANARCHIST COMMUNIST FEDERATION, THE ANARCHIST WORKERS GROUP AND THE NORTHERN ANARCHIST NETWORK [BRITAIN], UNION DES TRAVAILLEURS COMMUNISTES LIBERTAIRES AND THE COLLECTIF JEUNES LIBERTAIRES [FRANCE] AND TAT BLATT, SCHWARZE DISTEL AND AUSGEMEINSCHAFT [AUSTRIA].

The representatives of libertarian communist organisations present at this meeting of Western European Libertarian comrades want to draw attention to certain points in the debate with our Eastern European comrades.

Because of the tenor of the debates in the different commissions that have been held, we hope that our Eastern European comrades do not return to their countries where state capitalism and authoritarian marxism are collapsing, and where the building of a new mode of organistion of society is the order of the day, with a false image of the libertarians of the West. These comrades should know that:

1. We are not advocates of the Western consumer society.

2. We are totally and unreservedly opposed to the market economy and the doctrine of free enterprise

3. We aim not to act on the margins of society, but in its' midst, to transform it, in social movements, because for us the central agent of the revolutionary process is the working class.

We find it disquieting , to say the least, for some libertarians to seek to export anarchist dogmas to countries where anarchism had as its theoreticians and has today such reference points as people like Bakunin, Kropotkin, Archinov and Makhno.

Within a re-defined framework of discussion, we will be ready to fully contribute to the debate and we think it possible that some initiatives of concrete solidarity will be possible.

NEWS FROM EASTERN EUROPE

Based on Reports from countries present at the meeting.

POLAND : The longest established and strongest anarchist movement in Eastern Europe. Within the Anarchist Federation, there are twenty local groupings. There is little political unity between these groups, which are active mainly in the 'counter-culture'. The Federation has difficulties in gaining influence in the working class because of these problems.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA : There are two hundred activists within the Czechoslovak Anarchist Union (CAS), and there are also several active independent groups (e.g. in Prague there is the group Prague Beruschki). About 50% of the CAS is workers, 25% unemployed and 25% students, all from working class backgrounds. CAS has no clear political perpsectives as yet.

ROMANIA : There was no constituted group at the conference, although Nicolas Trifon who is exiled in France was present - he is editor of the excellent libertarian magazine on Eastern Europe,"IZTOK".

YUGOSLAVIA : Again there is no constituted group, but some individuals were present at Trieste. Some were in favour of a market economy, some were opposed.

USSR : The anarcho-syndicalist group KAS was set up in May, and it drew in the network around the magazine OBCHTCHINA, giving it several active groups throughout the federation. Its' representative at Trieste were against the class struggle, for a market economy, for non-violence and for participation in municipal elections. Nevertheless the KAS has several currents within it which do not agree with these views. Outside the KAS are two other groupings, the ASSA (individualists and anarcho-syndicalists) and the AKRS (Union of Revolutionary Anarchist Communists) which was not represented at Trieste.

BULGARIA: Appearing in autumn 1989 the Anarchist Communist Federation of Bulgaria was set up on the iniative of exiles. It has libertarian communist positions, but for the moment seems cut off from youth and the social movements.

The East European movement is very young. It has emerged after many years of a political Ice Age. The only experience to which it relates is the 'Revolution of 1989' with its many contradictions. It will committ many errors. It is up to class struggle anarchists in the West to debate with those in the Eastern European countries, exchange experiences, provide literature and material support. Only in this way, and not from an arrogant, sterile 'principled' position, can worthwhile developments take place.●

ROMANIA'S MINERS:

Loyal thugs of the ruling class?

THE 'TRAMPS, GYPSIES, students and oppositionists' who hurled molotov cocktails at police lines, stormed and set fire to their main headquarters, and attacked a government-run TV station in Bucharest, on June 13, were "the same sort of embittered youth that battled with your police in the Trafalgar Square riots", Romanian President Ion Illiescu confided to a visiting Labour Party MP later that month.

Peripheral

These 'golani' ('down-and-outs' as they were dubbed) had, he explained, launched an "organised attempt" to bring down his National Salvation Front (NSF) government. In a later thank-you speech to Romanian miners who he summoned to Bucharest to stamp out the protest, he described how their actions had prevented "an attempted coup by a force of extremist, rightist elements... with iron-guardist and fascist character(istics)... (who had drawn on) all kinds of peripheral, parasitic elements of our society".

These included, 'black-marketeers', 'pimps', 'smugglers', 'ex-prisoners', and - refering to the protestors who for seven weeks had been camped in University Square - "those who lived in a drugged climate of moral misery and corruption".

It was Illiescu's success in painting the Bucharest rioters as a diseased, quasi-fascist mob of degenerates and untouchables (made easier by the NSF's total control over the national media and the orchestrated destruction of opposition newspaper offices by the miners) that enabled him to first isolate, and then crush, this the most serious threat to his rule since the December coup and the ousting of Ceausescu.

Attempting to contain and neutralise uprisings - by claiming them to be the work of hostile, alien elements, seperate from the rest of the oppressed - is a favourite ruling class strategy. In Hungary in 1956, the Government blamed the workers' uprising on "fascists and reactionaries"; Thatcher blamed "criminal elements" for the poll tax riots; Lech Walesa blamed recent railworkers strikes in Poland on the agitation of "dis-affected ex-Communists"; Strangeways Governor Brendan O'Friel blamed "an explosion of evil" on "the work of the Devil". It's proved to be an effective tactic.

When Illiescu called on the miners to rush to Bucharest to "defend the revolution" from the golani he was confident both that they would come, and that they would do their job with a brutal enthusiasm.

Like Ceausescu, Illiescu realised the importance to the regime of maintaining the loyalties of powerful, key groups of industrial workers. After a damaging strike in 1977, the mines were flooded with Securitate (secret police) agents, to quell unrest and spy on militant workers.

On assuming office, one of the first acts of the Illiescu administration was to double miners' wages, introduce a four-day week, and halve some production targets. Whilst the vast majority of the poor and working class in Romania have continued to exist in abject poverty, since the 'ending' of the Ceausescu dictatorship, the miners have enjoyed some tangible material benefits from NSF rule. Their living and working conditions remain utterly miserable (90 miners were killed in accidents in the Jiu Valley field alone last year). They still often have to crawl to the pit-face on their hands and knees in baking heat and choking dust - but now they earn twice as much for doing so. After years under the yoke of Ceausescu "people are grateful, pathetically so, for small improvements in their daily lives" as one commentator put it.

When news came from Bucharest on official TV that a gang of 'hoodlums and work-shy students' were attempting to overthrow the government and put those improvements at risk, the miners collected their clubs, boarded the government-organised trains and prepared (for the third time this year) to protect Illiescu, and - by doing so, they believed - themselves. For the present, the NSF has bought itself the loyalty of the miners.

As Bucharest hospitals filled up with the seemingly random victims of the miners' violence, Securitate agents in the capital donned miners work-clothes and directed operations to ensure all important targets (ie the homes and headquarters of NSF opponents) were hit. Riot cops joined in too. The threat of a 'coup' allowed Illiescu a cover under which - through the miners - he could move to terrorise into silence all forms of opposition. Rival party offices were ransacked, their printing presses smashed. Known militants and dissidents were arrested, others escaped the net and fled into hiding.

If ordinary Romanians needed any more persuading of just how little had been changed by 'the revolution' - for all their bloody sacrifice - the return of an atmosphere of fear and panic to the streets of the capital was a graphic confirmation that though the tyrant Ceausescu was dead, the tyranny lived on.

To make any sense of the confusing alliance of class forces that did battle on the streets of Bucharest, and examine what might happen in the future, we need to study the politics and objectives of the different sets of combatants.

What then of the golani, the 'great unwashed'? They took Illiescu's intended insult, and turned into a sign of their resistance: 'yes, we are the golani, and proud of it'. Their encampment in University Square became a focus for opposition after the NSF (who first pledged to stand down after a 'caretaker' period in government at the start of the year) won the elections, stitched up for them by their control of the national press and TV. As Romania's first new Parliamentary session opened, a crowd of demonstrators gathered outside chanting "Down with Communism", reflecting the growing realisation of a vocal minority that the new government was in fact stuffed full of Ceausescu's old hench-men and officials.

Class

The golani that set up camp in the Square, were - it seems - mainly students, but included groups of workers and the unemployed too. They were united in their opposition to Stalinist-style 'communism' and in the belief that the NSF "have stolen the revolution". Beyond that, as in every other cross-class, intellectual 'opposition movement' elsewhere in Eastern Europe, they will have differed wildly: between those wanting an immediate introduction of a western-style market, or the return of a monarchy; some left-ists, syndicalists, Trotskyists; and anarchists and libertarian communists too.

What got quickly lost in the media coverage of the initial rioting in this country, was that some of the golani were totally opposed to attacks on the police station and tried to defuse the situation by agreeing to end their camp-protest, and disperse peacefully. Only a section of the golani had prepared "what was obviously a vast reserve of petrol bombs", and were willing to take on the cops and try to seize the TV station to spread news of their uprising.

From this distance, forced to rely on the capitalist media, it's impossible to objectively assess the political make-up of the minority that battered their way into the police station and set light to bus-barricades in the street. It'd be encouraging to think that that minority didn't risk their lives for the chance to shop at Laura Ashley, eat at McDonalds, or wave a plastic flag while watching the changing of the Palace Guard.

Sadly, recent events in Eastern Europe are all too full of instances of 'militant struggles' (including those fought for by working class groups) for thoroughly reactionary ends.

Certainly there will have been a minority of positive anti-capitalist forces at work amongst the golani rioters. How significant they were, we can't as yet say. But our job is to try to identify and support those elements - not simply dismiss the whole affair as a squabble between rival groups of would-be capitalists.

Weaknesses

What is also unclear, is whether those who joined in the attack hoped and expected other sections of the dispossessed and downtrodden, (including the industrial working class), to join them in mounting a serious challenge to NSF rule, or whether theirs was a largely spontaneous reaction to the police attack on their camp. If it was the former, the golani seriously overestimated the level of support they enjoyed. If growing numbers are rapidly concluding that their 'revolution' never really happened, they currently lack the confidence to confront the Salvation Front head-on, and certainly don't agree on what the NSF should be replaced by. As a result, the golani faced first the police truncheons, and then the miners' clubs, alone.

This highlights the two massive weaknesses that crippled the rebellion. Firstly, the 'broad-front' nature of the opposition movement - in which proletarian interests are submerged in a mish-mash of conflicting and contradictory politics. And, secondly, despite the presence of a small number of workers in the golani's ranks, they are clearly detatched from the bulk of the working class, failing to organise around issues of even immediate concern to Romania's poor. The fact that the most visible and militant form of resistance to the regime mounted thus far was - basically - a 'peace camp', is proof of this detachment.

The crushing of the golani revolt won the praise of some sections of the British Left. As well as the predictable Stalinist support for the miners' "speedy response to President Illiescu's call to defend democracy" (Morning Star, June 15), both the Militant Tendency and the Revolutionary Communist Party (RCP) - to name but two - joined the chorus of approval.

Accepting without question the regime's portrayal of the rioters as being "led by middle class intellectuals and students whose aims is the introduction (sic) of capitalism", the RCP put the riot down to the disaffected jealousy of an intelligensia who had "largely been excluded from the corridors of power" (tns 23 June). Militant - as might be expected - put things more crudely: the 'provocative' violence of the demonstrators, incensed the miners who "showed themselves to be a formidable barrier to capitalist restoration (sic)". "The workers", it explained, "understand the advantages of a planned economy", adding ominously: "They were putting down a counter-revolutionary minority and we'd do exactly the same". (Militant 29 June).

It's worth recalling that both these groups gave enthusiastic support to the Tiannamen Square protests in China last year - although the demands of the Chinese students were equally as class-confused and politically incoherent as the golani's are.

What's disturbed Western capitalist commentators is not so much the catalogue of smashed skulls and broken limbs chalked up by the miners, but by the spectacle of seeing Illiescu encouraging sections of his own working class (those "dirty faced runts" as The Observer described them) to take matters directly into their own hands. Having evoked the power of the working class, Illiescu may in the future be unable to diffuse or control it.

What, then, persuaded the National Salvation Front to take such a risk? The battle of Bucharest seemed to take them completely by surprise. Illiescu's alarm call to the miners was more of a panic gut-reaction than a calculated tactical move. While Illiescu dealt with this eruption of political street violence with relative ease, it was really the last thing he - or the Front - needed.

Divisions

The NSF are beset with problems. There are deep divisions within the Front over the pace and direction of economic change. Since taking power, the NSF has seen productivity in the factories slump alarmingly. There is a growing rift between Illiescu and the Prime Minister Petre Roman, and between army and police chiefs. The miners' action led to the (doubtless temporary) suspension of millions of dollars of investment from the West, which they need urgently.

Illiescu lacks the total support of either the leaders or the ordinary ranks of the police: he blamed the severity of the rioting on their half-hearted response to the initial violence. He since switched control of the police to army officials, established a National Guard and replaced the Minister of the Interior. Some analysts are predicting the break up of the NSF under these pressures.

The deployment of the miners as the government's stormtroopers, highlights two things about the Illiescu regime. First, that they have successfully driven a wedge into the Romanian working class, by convincing the miners that their interests are bound up in the survival of the regime. Second, it shows that Illiescu understands where the ultimate power in his society - in any society - lies: in the hands of the working class. As long as that power remains passive, divided and confused about its own real interests, the ruling class (if not Illiescu himself, or the NSF) will survive intact and in control.

In the city of Timisoara, birthplace of 'the revolution', protests sprang up in response to the miners' attacks. In a development typical of the distortion of class alliances endemic in Romania (and elsewhere in Eastern Europe), local army chiefs pledged to defend nervous protestors against any future assault by maurading miners.

What then of the future? The NSF's problems look set to multiply. The ruling class needs to try to stabilise an increasingly volatile situation, probably by moving towards more 'democratic' methods of control, to buy time and passify its liberal-democratic opponents. It could purge a few sacrificial Ceausescu-ites from its own ranks and offer more social reforms too. But its freedom of manoeuvre is limited by economic constraints: the Treasury's coffers are empty.

Austerity

Within days of the miners' return to the coalfields, Illiescu was forced - by the need to unfreeze an EEC trade deal - to publicly criticize the miners' "over-reactions" and "excesses". Since then, Prime Minister Roman has attacked lazy and incompetent workers - including miners - for the productivity losses that the country can barely afford. He's warned that the losses must be made good.

And there, for the regime, is the rub. To turn round Romania's chronically backward, inefficient economy, means railroading through a major austerity package at the expense of the already impoverished Romanian working class. As one Liberal Party spokeswoman understood: "One can not easily ask a miner for his help one day, and then shut down his mine - however unproductive - the next".

With the fall of Ceausescu, the poor's expectations have risen, not declined. Many workers, miners included, will simply be unwilling to suffer further attacks on subsistence living standards, in return for the promise of 'jam tommorow'.

During the 1977 coal strike, 30,000 Romanian miners struck in protest against punative wage-cuts imposed by Ceaucescu after they failed to meet impossibly high production targets. They took the Prime Minster hostage for three days during the dispute.

As the reality of the NSF's reform programme becomes clearer, many of the criss-cross class alliances already under strain in the Romanian 'opposition movement', will snap - and the poor's real class interests come into sharper focus.

If that happens, Illiescu may reget the day he taught the miners how easy it was to impose their will on the streets of Bucharest.●

ublicanism and the in Ireland

play the communities off against each other. The protestant leaders say 'the catholics complain too much, they have it easy now, they've come a long way and there's no longer any discrimination'. But, the catholics see they have worse standards of housing, worse jobs and worse facilities and they blame their protestant neighbours.

The struggle is more intense in Belfast because that's where the unionists have more at stake. They are better organised, and because there is always the possibility to have an entirely protestant workforce it is easy for them to piss on the catholic minority.

Q: ARE THE FOLLOWING THREE STATEMENTS WHICH ARE ALL COMMONLY HEARD IN ENGLAND REALLY CORRECT OR ARE THEY MERELY MYTHS OF THE LEFT? FIRSTLY, 'THE REPUBLICAN MOVEMENT IS THE IRA AND SINN FEIN'?

A: It's much more than a myth of the left, it's also a myth of the right. It's very useful for the right to group the IRA and Sinn Fein together and call them the enemy.

Hoods

Similarly it's handy for people in England to forget or ignore the fact that there are many groups in northern Ireland fighting for emancipation but with different goals in mind, and with different methods to hand.

Q: SECONDLY, 'THE IRA AND SINN FEIN ARE THE ONLY PEOPLE OPPOSING THE BRITISH STATE'?

A: There are many people, and groups, opposing not only the British state but also the way our society is at the minute, and for a change in it. The IRA and Sinn Fein say they're fighting to change society, but they are fighting for a society on their terms.

For example, those high up in the IRA and Sinn Fein enjoy enormous privilieges. Also there are massive profits to be made from extortion and protection rackets in northern Ireland. The IRA own many drinking and gambling clubs (which is preying on their own people) and also taxi services.

It's well known that those high up in the IRA enjoy good houses and cars particularly. They are all paid for by the profits of racketeering. We often see the local IRA Brigadier driving through our shitty council estates in his brand new Mercedes Benz.

The only reason why the IRA try to stop 'hoods and gangsters' in catholic communities, is because these 'hoods' are muscling in on the IRA's own business.

In Belfast there are meetings between catholic and protestant paramilitary leaders to, in effect, carve up the city in terms of extortion.

Demise

Until 1987, the INLA was the most significant republican grouping after the IRA. The demise of the INLA was caused by disagreements concerning money. The INLA was at maximumn only 200 people. They split into two groups, the IPLO (Irish People's Liberation Organisation) and the 'Belfast Brigade' which was still known as the INLA. In 1987 they were ripped apart by a feud: the IPLO actually wanted to do some fighting, while the Belfast Brigade were quite content to simply rake in profits from extortion.

Feud

Apart from Belfast, the main centre for the feud was Armagh. There were regular shootings and beatings. They self-destructed as could quite easily happen to the IRA.

Q: LASTLY, 'THE IRA ARE THE ONLY THING STOPPING A SECTARIAN POGROM'?

A: It's in the IRA's interests to maintain this 'myth' because it's a way of recruiting a lot more people. At times of stability and relative peace between the two communities the IRA don't do very well at all. They then revert to their old hardcore of members who try to stir up trouble between the communities.

Catholics always look to the IRA as their last line of defence, because they're seen to be armed and strong, but they're being misled.

Q: IS THERE A NEED FOR ORGANISED CATHOLIC SELF-DEFENCE?

A: There was at the time of NICRA (Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association) because that was more of a sectarian struggle than a class struggle. Now the communities are interacting more, there's a need for class based struggle and self defence.

When the blinds that have been brought down by the middle class, Orange Order and church etc, are lifted slightly, the two communities will see they have the same enemy. Then workers' self defence will be necessary. The IRA are not going to support cross-community struggle, because it's not in their interests to.

Q: ARE THE IRA AND SINN FEIN AS NON-SECTARIAN AND SECULAR AS THEY'VE BEEN PORTRAYED BY THE LEFT AND THEMSELVES?

A: If they're secular and not tied up with the church it's not through their own choice - they'd love to be associated with the catholic church, but they've been 'disassociated'.

As for being non-sectarian, well they may have one or two protestants, but that is it.

That's the main problem with the IRA, they say that they're non-sectarian, but on the ground they threaten people who make links between the two communities. For example, I myself and others have been threatened for being involved in a cross-community 'social group' in Armagh.

School

Also, I went to a mixed school in Armagh, where there was real pressure to only mix with your own community. That was my real education, going to this school and finding out that these people were the same as me. These people lived in some of the shittiest housing in Europe, but they still look down on us and say 'we're better than you'.

Q: DO YOU FEEL THAT SINN FEIN'S NATIONALISM IS A HINDRANCE TO THEIR ABILITY TO OFFER SOLUTIONS TO THE IMMEDIATE PROBLEMS FACING THE WORKING CLASS?

A: Yes, absolutely. Nationalism is a narrow minded ideology which to some extent runs contrary to the needs and aspirations of a working class. You only have to look at examples of how Sinn Fein has pissed on the demands of the working class (eg refusing to support abortion rights, or to organise rank and file trade union activity to defend workers' struggles).

Sinn Fein will never be a movement of the working classes. They are at the minute, and probably always will be, a section of society encompassing all classes, which does not hold the interests of the working class dear to its heart.

Q: WHAT DO YOU THINK OF THE TROOPS OUT MOVEMENT, WHOSE DEMANDS ARE FOR 'TROOPS OUT NOW' AND 'SELF-DETERMINATION FOR THE IRISH PEOPLE AS A WHOLE'?

A: These people see 'troops out' as a cure-all solution to the problems of northern Ireland, when in fact immediate withdrawal will create many more.

It would create a pre-1969 situation with an Orange Order backlash against catholics because of the perceived withdrawal of 'Britishness'. It would strengthen and not weaken the Orange State and protestant supremacy. Thatcher would only withdraw after strengthening the Orange forces of the RUC and UDR.

Enemies

In my own experience the UDR and the RUC are seen as much more of a threat than the British troops. The British troops are seen as a foreign and historic enemy, while the RUC, UDR and UDA are very much the enemy at home.

Of course I want the troops out, but the withdrawal of troops must come with the emancipation of the working class. 'Self-determination for the Irish people'? What does that mean?"

Anthony is a socialist who has been alienated from the republican movement because of his faith in the masses rather than the organisations who try to act on their behalf.

In the early years of the present struggles it was the radical nature of the republican movement and especially the small groups who held sway within it that shook the British state to its core. We must identify and show solidarity with the most progressive elements of the movement. Assist our Irish comrades in the building of a strong cross-community all Ireland anarchist movement.

Although it is partition, the Orange state and sectarian politics which divide the Irish working class, the nature of republican resistance is a problem we cannot ignore as revolutionaries.

The IRA and Sinn Fein will undoubtedly try to hold on tight to the reigns of power in the republican movement, just as they try to control all struggle against the British state, in the guise of 'community policing':

Message

"This is a special message for young people - no hi-jackings, no joy riding, no stone throwing at the Brits. If you want to do these things, there are organisations to do this for you", Gerry Adams, Sinn Fein President.

But, they must be challenged. We must not be sycophantic, afraid to criticise: Sinn Fein's politics are rotten to the core, and their right to leadership of the working class must be challenged, just as we deny the legitimacy of loyalist organisations 'representing' the class.

Otherwise the struggle for freedom will go on, well after the present 'troubles' have ended.•

THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT was drafted by the ACF's Ireland Commission, based on discussions at our last national conference, and has been endorsed by the rest of the organisation:

"The working class of Ireland is divided and exploited by British structures of imperialism, which are part of a wider Western imperialism. This imperialism has many forms - political, economic, cultural and strategic. In this context it is clearly a myth and a media lie that the Irish war is a religious war. Religion has been used by the British state to divide the Irish working class in order to maintain their interests. We support the class struggle in Ireland - North and South - that is attempting to oppose these divisions, oppressions and exploitations.

The presence of British troops in Ireland is only one aspect of imperialist domination. As in any fight against imperialism, we support the removal of capitalist troops through united internationalist working class action. The removal of troops on any other basis would only occur if the interests of the British and international ruling class were maintained, and such a move would have nothing to offer the Irish working class.

As anarchist communists we see that nationalistic and hierarchical resistance can merely unite a capitalist Ireland. Both the "stages theory" and the idea of "self determination" would lead to such an outcome, neither benefitting the Irish working class, nor advancing the international fight against capitalism and its protectors, nation states. Thus they are an irrelevance to the class struggle, as are the nationalist and elitist organisations that advocate these methods and goals.

It is only through a generalised class struggle - both social and armed - that a world wide anarchist communist society can be envisaged."•

The poll tax flagship heads for the rocks

THEY BADLY NEEDED a clear cut, decisive victory to dent the growing confidence of their opponents. In the end, the government suffered a series of messy, humiliating defeats as the first attempts by local councils in England and Wales to force poll tax non-payers to pay up through the courts ended in chaos and confusion.

The government - both local and national - had hoped a swift series of 'enforcement orders' dished out to the first poll tax defaulters hauled up before the bench, would show (in the full glare of the media spotlights) - the futility of trying to evade payment of the Charge. Instead, they saw the non-payment movement clock up a series of inspiring, confidence-boosting victories.

First in the Isle of Wight and then in South Tyneside, cases collapsed in a morass of bureaucratic incompetence in early June, as the first 'official' estimates of non-payers to be published admitted that - nationally - around a third of those on the Charge register had yet to pay a penny of their first bills.

The same official (under)estimates acknowledged that in some areas the situation was even worse. In most inner-London areas, officials were conceding that around 75% of those obliged to pay has so far ignored all reminders. By the end of April, Camden council in north London had received only 4% of poll tax monies owed. In the Tory-run 'flagship' borough of Wandsworth (with the lowest poll tax level in the country) council officials had sent out an initial 4,800 summonses to defaulters. Greenwich had got in £1.6m, instead of the £5m it expected; Hackney £1m out of £4m; Southwark £1.5m out of £5.2m. In Chelsea, Lambeth and Kensington, poll tax administration is in too much of a mess for their Treasuries even to guess at the levels of non-payment.

In Rotherham, 40% of residents had paid nothing. In Birmingham 50%. In Scotland, where the tax has now been in force for 17 months, total arrears of unpaid poll tax now stand at above £170m, and show no signs of coming down. Such high levels of arrears are putting an enormous strain on council financing: there simply isn't sufficient cash in many authorities' coffers to meet all their own bills. "We have something like a £15 million gap between what we pay out, and what we are getting in", the borough Treasurer for Wigan council explained to the press. "We've already forked out £300,000 on interest payments, on money we borrowed to cover the shortfall. It's costing us £3.50 a minute, 24 hours a day - and our situation is not unusual".

Treasury analysts comfirm that Wigan's experience is, indeed, typical. Council borrowing in April was £900 million higher than in the same month last year - a clear indication of the extent of non-payment local authority's were preparing for.

In Strathclyde region (Britain's biggest authority) £87 million of last year's poll tax remains unpaid. Council officials there estimate that as much as £50 million of that may have to be written off as "bad debts".

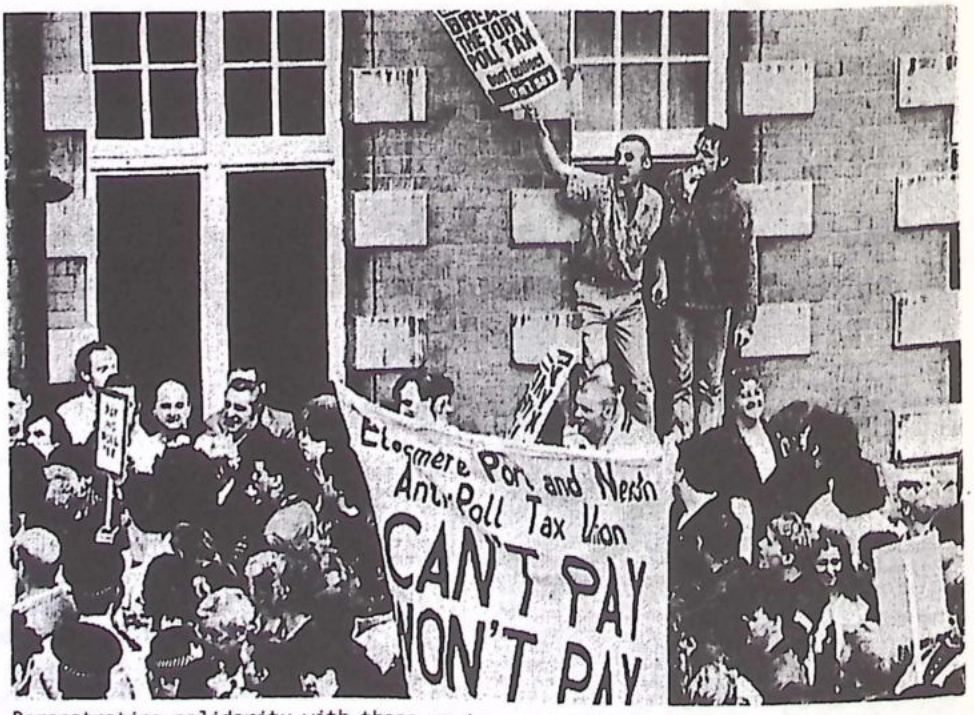
Labour local government spokesman David Blunkett told the BBC evening news on July 17 that Labour councils threatening non-payers were doing "a first-class job in almost impossible circumstances".

Mass non-payment of the poll tax is now an incontestible nationwide fact. A year's experience in Scotland shows that, while the numbers of non-payers may dip a little (as a trickle of court enforcements and wage arrestments take effect), a mass campaign of payment refusal can sustain itself over time. In the current political climate, we were never going to see a majority of the working class joining a movement centred on non-payment. But a significant, sizeable section of our class has proved its determination not to bow to poll tax law. The task before us now, is not so much to convince people of the need for non-payment, but to encourage the mass of non-payers to organise their resistance collectively.

The bureaucratic inertia that has dogged the poll tax from the beginning, is - if anything - worsening as the months go by. "I've described the poll tax as a nightmare", a tired and emotional Birmingham Treasury official explained. "But the poll tax is different... You wake up from a nightmare". Birmingham's council has already prepared to write-off £7m as "uncollectable", admitting that "it could prove much higher". In Labour controlled Birmingham's poll tax nerve centre, they're preparing to send out 250,000 final demands. As office clerks slog through an awesome mountain of unanswered mail, council officials have taken to hiding truckloads of unopened mail-bags in a secret store room, fearing the sight of them "would have an adverse effect on our staff's motivation". Other councils' officials are equally depressed.

Inner-city bureaucrats are also discovering to their cost just how mobile 'their' populations are - making the compiling of accurate poll tax registers impossible. "The Government has no idea of how many changes of address we're supposed to keep us with", complains Islington council leader Margaret Hodge. "99% of the rates were collected. Houses, unlike people, don't do inconsiderate things like moving around". How accurate, then, were her lists of potential payers? "God knows".

Problems with computer systems



Demonstrating solidarity with those up in court, in Warrington in June custom-designed to administer the tax are rife too. In many authorities, the software in use is unable to accurately log a payment against an individual account, or work out deductions for those on housing benefit or Income Support. The system in Rugby still isn't ready to be used. Manchester City Council admits to having "lost" thousands of names from its records. The result? that many of those who've paid received threatening final demands, as non-payers are overlooked.

Industrial action against the poll tax, while increasing, remains sporadic and, as yet, largely unconnected to the non-payment movement.

Disputes involving poll tax workers have broken out in a number of places including York, Hammersmith, Sunderland, Slough and - most notably - in Greenwich, London. There, 160 housing workers went on all-out indefinite strike, in support of cashiers suspended by the council for refusing to take on poll tax duties. But the strike was never a political anti-poll tax one. The cashiers weren't up in arms over the poll tax, but wanted better terms and conditions for taking on the extra work.

We obviously support such action, but (to coin a phrase) "without illusions".

Efficiently

As one of the strikers wrote in Labour Briefing "the strike could be resolved if Greenwich Council coughed up some more money to collect its poll tax more efficiently". In the end, that's exactly what happened, as NALGO and the council stitched up a compromise deal. While on strike workers distributed leaflets to Greenwich residents (including the 30% who aren't paying), urging them not to cross their picket lines. Now the dispute is settled, those same workers will begin the job of sending out final demands to those non-payers urging them to "cough up".

Turning that sectional dispute into the kind of action that sought to unite those housing workers with the thousands of local non-payers requires a major shift in the political orientation of the action. Attempts to achieve that are made more difficult by the actions of Left-ists who make out we've just witnessed an "anti-poll tax strike".

More encouraging have been the first examples of concerted action against the threat to workers' jobs from poll tax capping. In June, around 1,000 teachers in Barnsley struck for a day in protest at the announcement of the loss of 23 teachers job in the borough due to poll tax cuts. The 'unofficial' strike was in defiance of an NUT ban on any industrial action on the issue. Local teachers have responded to the union's threat to discipline the organisers, by planning a further three one-day strikes. Teachers in Bristol have held a one-day strike too.

Council workers in Haringey - where a £14 million package of cuts threatens over 600 jobs - voted in mid-July for an eight day programme of strike action, and indefinite strike action in selected areas. Haringey NALGO officials immediately called on the council to enter "meaningful talks on the cuts to avoid confrontation".

While the Barnsley, Bristol and Haringey developments are significant, the action being taken and planned is nothing like as widespread or militant as we should now be witnessing. Many council workforces have yet to meet - even in their seperate sections - to discuss the threat to their jobs. The scale of action necessary to seriously challenge the poll tax cuts threat, is in a different league to that we're seeing discussed now. And while the votes at both NALGO and NUT conferences not to sanction industrial action against the poll tax left some workers angry and determined to fight regardless of the union, it left others demobilised and unwilling.

As attempts to beat poll tax capping through the courts fail, and the scale of resultant cuts in services becomes clearer, limited action will certainly spread. But as yet, the industrial wing of poll tax resistance looks set to badly lag behind the community campaign of non-payment.

Elsewhere on the industrial front, the very first wage arrestment orders against Scottish non-payers have been granted against workers in a Dundee sweet factory. Workers at the Keiller plant have held mass meetings to discuss their response. This is against the background of growing unease amongst employers at being drawn into poll tax enforcement. The Engineers Employers' Federation has warned the government that workers seeing their bosses deduct their unpaid poll tax at source could "lead to a serious deterioration in labour relations". The Financial Times too has warned of the "potentially disasterous consequences" of the widespread use of such powers.

Elections

The May local election results sent a mixture of confusing messages to both Labour and Conservative camps about the impact of the poll tax on voting habits. We've long argued that the poll tax is a means of ensuring local councils destroy their own services in a "battle of the budgets" with their opponents, competing to offer the local electorate the lowest possible Community Charge.

In Wandsworth and elsewhere in London, 'low-spending' Tory councils swept to power in defiance of the national swing towards Labour. But in Bradford, home of the infamous axe-swinging Pickles administration, the Tories were ousted and a Labour council returned.

But if the Tories have yet to totally win the argument that high Community Charge levels are the fault of spend-crazy local councils, Labour officials country-wide have taken full note of the dreaded "London effect".

One of the first statements of the newly-installed Bradford Labour council was to explain it "could not promise to reverse the planned cuts" of the Pickles period. Haringey Labour leader Toby Harris announcing plans to shut day centres for the elderly, end free home helps, close swimming pools, and chop £1.5m in grants to voluntary bodies, bemoaned his lot: "We have been faced with choices none of us imagined possible", he complains: "Do we close libraries or schools? sports centres or nurseries?". His 'disbelief' at the butchery he is preparing to perform will be of little comfort to those he expects to bear the brunt of his axe-blows.

His colleagues in Derbyshire face similar dilemmas in deciding exactly where to clobber the poor. Faced with imposed budget cuts of £40m it is clear that nothing is safe: not even the agreement of no compulsory redundancies for local teachers - "There is no absolute promise that that cannot change", one official warned.

On a national level, the Government is clearly worried. The day after it was revealed that high levels of non-payment were forcing up government borrowing, the Tories announced plans to shelve their 'care in the community' legislation for two years. If introduced now, the new law would have upped poll tax bills by an average of £50 a year. But poll tax levels look set to rise by around 10% next year anyway, even allowing for the government's expected multi-million cash-handout to local authorities.

All things considered, the Tories' 'flagship' looks like it's heading for the rocks at full steam ahead.•

Striking errors

DUE TO AN unfortunate error on the Letters page of the last issue of Organise!, a section of our 'author's reply' to a letter about the ambulance dispute appeared in the wrong order.

The first eight lines at the top of the third column should have been at the bottom of the third column.

The column breaks would then have read: (from the bottom of column 2) "But it's no use pretending that every single group of workers can and should follow an identical course of industrial action...", and (from the bottom of column 3) "Action by other health workers might affect patients, but if workers asserted their direct control over levels of 'emergency cover' on the wards that risked would be minimised. There's another difference to the kind of dispute strategy we should aruge for with different groups of workers..."

Also, the letter we were replying to was from "The former members of the ACF M4 Corridor Group", and not "former member..." as it appeared.

Our apologies. Since the discovery of these errors, one of the Nottingham Organise! editors has decided they now "wish to spend more time with their family" and has agreed to retire early on health grounds.

Yours suitably purged,

Ecology and class

I HAVE A couple of questions about the "Ecology and Class" article in the last issue of Organise!: these basically concern your sources for certain claims.

(1) The German Green Party's support for nuclear power at state level: I am confused about this as I thought they had always firmly oppsed it, indeed that such opposition had been crucial to their growth and support.

(2) "Earth First"s support for AIDS.

(3) Britain's Green Party refusing to back mass non-payment (of the poll tax - Organise!): To quote from a "Briefing for Local Green Parties" handed out at a recent anti-poll tax meeting - "The Green Party... considers non-payment and non-implementation as positive options for those who choose them". Admittedly this can be read in an individualistic way, but it still doesn't bear out your claim.

So on this and the other two points, I'd be interested in your evidence for making these statements.

In the meantime, congratulations on a worthwhile read, which I hope to receive regularly in the future!

Adrian

AUTHOR'S REPLY: THANKS for your letter. I contended that when in power at State level, the German Green's sanctioned continued construction of a nuclear power plant. That source was an article I read in an old Black Flag a few years ago, but that's from memory, so... On firmer ground (and making the same point) despite gathering support from the squatters movement and having themselves risen through it, Die Grunen, when in power in the West Berlin senate (in coalition with the Social Democrats) sent in 300 police to forcibly evict the large squatted communities in Kreuzberg and Schoenberg. When the squatters (who included many radicals) resisted, Green politicians announced a 'declaration of war' on anarchists and autonomists (Black Flag, 1990).

"Earth First!" advocate higher infant mortality and disease as a solution to overpopulation (sic) since "the only way to control population is to let natural processes do it" (from an article by Miss Ann Thropy in Earth First 1986). The same author wrote the notorious article "Population & AIDS" (Earth First! 1987) which cheer-led epidemics. In the same vein Daniel Conner wrote "Is AIDS the answer to an environmentalists prayer?" (Earth First Yule 1987) which describes the virus as a kind of revenge by Gaia (the Earth as an super-organism).

The Green Party's original stance on the Poll Tax was against 'breaking the law' (stated before and at their last conference), which is by definition against non-payment. It has now changed somewhat to 'support' for individual non-payers. "The Green Party supports all those who themselves choose such means [non-violent civil disobedience]" (my emphasis). This is echoed in your quote from the same document "...for those who choose them". This is allows non-payment as a moral stance for some individuals whose consciences may force them into breaking the law, and no more. Such 'support' is meaningless. It is like supporting strikers as individuals rather than their collective organisation and action.

This is not of course to decry the active non-payment organising by some Green Party grassroots activists or indeed some Labour supporters, but they should listen to what their Party is actually saying. The ACF recognises that all political parties must uphold the law as the basis of their power. We recognise no such right to rule.

The myth of Labour's "socialism"

Labourism, the ideology that holds the Labour Party together, is decaying. This pamphlet explains why, and examines what opportunities will be opened up by the collapse of the Labourist myth.

The role of the revolutionary organisation

Anarchists reject the Leninist model of a "vanguard party" as counter-revolutionary. What then is the role of a revolutionary organisation? This pamphlet sets out to explain.

Each pamphlet costs 60p (including postage), and both are available from:

Irish prisoners

NOEL MURRAY AND Marie Murray are anarchists imprisoned 15 years ago for the murder of an Irish policeman. How long is a life sentence? Marie is currently the longest serving female prisoner in the whole of Ireland.

"What is it like on the outside?". Marie Murray put that question to me when I visited her on a cold day last January. The visitors' portakabin, situated in the yard of Mountjoy Jail, has been Marie's only link with the world for 15 long years.

Despite a sense of outrage at having been locked up without hope, she was cheerful and chatty. Her husband, Noel, serving his life sentence in Limerick Jail 150 miles apart, has been able to get an odd lift in a prison van up to see her. Clearly the Murrays are not now seen as a threat to the affluent Irish society which is so evident on Dublin's fashionable streets.

A greeting at the far end of the cabin demanded instant attention. A bouncy, plumpish 23 year old, her rosy cheeks not yet affected by prison's pallor, was confident enough to ask her cousin for a kiss. He had come to see Majella Boland whose innocence is an example of the cruelty which a male dominated state can inflict on a mother and her child.

Majella, who began a life sentence last December, sought an Irish solution to a violent Irish problem. Her husband, Patrick Boland, beat and abused her and sometimes threatened to throw their daughter out of a bedroom window. Paying a friend £120 to give him a scare seemed cheap if it was to bring some respite. But a minder became a murderer and Patrick was shot dead.

Declan Malone (with whom Majella had no kind of relationship) pleaded guilty to murder and got life. But the god-fearing christians of Ireland wanted Majella's life too and she was charged and subsequently found guilty of murder by a jury of six men and six women.

Letters of support will indicate that the outside world has not forgotten them. Please send letters to: Noel Murray, Limerick Jail, Ireland, and Majella Boland/Marie Murray, Mountjoy Jail, North Circular Rd, Dublin, Ireland.

Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide, and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class.

We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism.

The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives wil always be different to ours.

The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9. As anarchist we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called 'socialists' or 'communists' we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.●

THESE AIMS AND principles contain another revised version of 'clause 3' on racism and sexism, following further discussion and debate at the ACF's Spring conference.

From the Battle of the Boyne, to the Battle against the Bosses

THE TWELFTH OF July saw the 300th anniversary of the (in)famous Battle of the Boyne, with the 6 counties of northern Ireland covered in cardboard King Billys and red, white and blue bunting. The triumphant parades of this 'special' Orangeman's Day were typical of the usual carnival of reaction which the non-Loyalist population has had to suffer for so long.

But the truth behind William of Oranges' victory over James II in 1690 is drowned beneath the noise of the fife bands and the menacing thump of the Lambeg drum, long the musical accompaniment of Loyalist terror. Presented as a victory for religious freedom and Protestant rights over attempts at 'Papist' domination, the reality reads something different.

William, ruler of the United Provinces of Holland, was invited by the leading members of the English Parliment to overthrow King James II, a catholic convert, who by representing the last vestiges of feudalism was holding back the development of the emerging mercantile bourgoise and the power of the politicians. William himself had eyes on the English throne and was well pleased on his landing in England in 1688 that James, with little or no support from even his own aristocracy, did a runner to France without a fight!

However, James was still nominally in power in Ireland, a situation held through his viceroy, the Earl of Tyrconnell. Seeing Ireland as a potential power base and a stepping stone back to England and Scotland, James landed in Ireland (his first visit... and last) with French arms and advisers. The native Irish catholics and 'dissenters' (non-Anglican protestants) saw this as an opportunity to break the domination of English Parliaments over Ireland, so they gave support, not always wholeheartedly, to James.

Religion

However, at the now legendary Battle of the Boyne (and at several subsequent and more decisive battles), William, having a vastly superior army, defeated James who had to flee once more into exile. In this struggle for power William was supported by the catholic King of Spain and the Pope himself! So much for a crusade against Popery!

These facts very much give the lie to the claim that that was basically a religious war, independent from a real struggle for political power and colonial control. It is yet another example of religion being used by the ruling class as a cover and justification for their power struggles, when questions of strategic and economic power were the real motive force.

Godless

But 1690, along with the 'Siege of Derry' and many other historical episodes, is still being used by the Orange Order to bring together 6 counties protestants of all classes in a celebration of their refusal to 'surrender' to papism, republicanism, and on occasion, 'Godless Communism'. The reality is that for working class protestants, Loyalism is in fact an all consuming ideology which requires their abject surrender to the hegemony - political, social and economic - of their Orange bosses.

It is this domination which must be smashed if the working class of northern Ireland are to win their own 'Battle against the Bosses' and have something more to celebrate than the the victory of one marauding monarch over another.●

THE WARFARE STATE

THE REASONS For the Western war drive against Saddam Hussein are as much veiled in hypocrisy as Kuwait and Iraq were by the smoke clouds from burning buildings and oilfields. Suddenly, the Iraqi state's massacre of the Kurds gets glaring publicity and support for Iraq- from the U.S., Britain, France, West Germany, the Saudis and the Kuwaitis- which allowed this to happen, is conveniently forgotten.

The carnage itself is veiled in a language that camouflages any notion of maiming and killing, of the slaughter of many human beings. This bloody war is reduced to hi-tech jargon where even the expression " body bags" must now be " human remains pouches". One mildly diverting video war game substitutes for the reality of thousands of dead.

Barrage

Behind the barrage of lies and disinformation and the talk of civilian-friendly precision bombing are the wrecked cities, towns and villages. The same B-52 bombers that twenty years ago reduced vast areas of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia to total devastation laid down miles of carpet bombing, smashing supplies for water, fuel and electricity, food distribution and emergency supplies and obliterating those who provided these services and supplies or who lived near them. As the Edinburgh based revolutionary newsheet COUNTER INFORMATION noted : " A B-52 dropping ten tons of bombs from three miles high on a city of 4 million people is carnage and terrorism incarnate. The only sanitary part of the war is the "news". The "low" Western aircraft losses turn out to be the same as those of Korea and Vietnam; 4 per 1,000 missions. The loss rate for Tornados is 10 losses per 1,000."

Indeed the media in the West presented squeaky-clean news coverage on the war in an unprecedented propaganda campaign of distortion. Despite hours of media time devoted to the war, few hard facts ever emerged. The military have a stranglehold on the media, enforced through Strict Media Ground Rules. Point 3 of the Rules states that " You MUST remain with your military escort at all times, until released, and follow their instructions regarding your activities." Point 6 states that " If you are not sure whether an action you will take will violate a ground rule, consult your escort officer prior to taking that action". As David Feingold of Cable News Network stated:" The rules are there and the military run the operation. We are used as conduits of information and disinformation."

Illusions

We do not have any illusions in the impartiality of the media. They are there to fool us, to lie to and about us, to whip up nationalism, racism and chauvinism, and to attack any act of working class resistance. What is distinctive about this war was that it was the most heavily censored in recent history. Any on-the-spot news was vetted by British,American and Saudi censors, as laid down at briefings given to the media by the Ministry of Defence on 3rd and 7th January. Beyond this were sanctions threatened by the military against media access. A Ministry of Defence mouthpiece warned:" We would have to think hard about allowing any reporters to accompany our troops if their editor was carrying reports which jeopardised security." These restrictions, and the complete blackout of news coverage of the ground war were not there to protect the military in the Gulf. They were there to maintain the cloud of ignorance at home, to maintain "morale" so that no serious anti-war movement grew back home. The U.S. have learnt their lesson from Vietnam.The heavily televised carnage helped give birth to a powerful anti-war movement both in the United States and in Europe. This time images of napalmed villages, amputated limbs, and piles of incinerated bodies were as much as possible excluded from the screen.

Money

The U.S. and its allies have tried to make out that the world is united with them against Iraq. They have dished out phenomenal amounts of money to sweeten and pay off any objectors. The U.S.S.R. received $4 billion dollars, the bill to be footed by the oil sheikhs. Egypt's foreign debt of $14 billion would be forgotten if it opted for the allied camp. Syria was given the go-ahead to move forward in the Lebanon and to begin exterminating any factions opposed to it, with the collusion of both Israel and the U.S., and a billion dollars worth of American arms was promised.

President Assad of Syria has many striking resemblances to Saddam. Like Saddam, he is a Ba'athist, like Saddam he rules his country in a brutal way, grinding down the working class and the peasantry. Up until this war, the Syrian state was pilloried by the West for its organising and financing of "international terrorism". Cast your mind back. Whilst the Syrian regime was receiving the treatment the Hussein clique is now getting, a U.S. hostage returned from Iran, held up a sign saying " Buy Iraqi War Bonds". The U.S. assisted Iraq in the war against Iran, its Navy blasting Iranian planes and ships, whilst satellite information on Iranian military movements was readily passed on to Iraq. Less than 4 years ago , the frigate USS Stark was hit by an Iraqi Exocet with the loss of 37 lives, during the Iran-Iraq war. This was conveniently overlooked by the U.S. administration, and benignly dismissed as a mistake.

Cold War

As we forecast in an article in ORGANISE! 18, the end of the Cold War meant that the Western capitalist states would be looking around for a new enemy and they have found it in the shape of the Saddam regime in particular, and Islamic fundamentalism in general. As we said:" The USA and her European allies have for years poured enormous quantities of capital into the arms industries under this pretext"(the Cold War-eds.)" It is difficult to imagine these multinationals taking kindly to a cut in this expenditure, and indeed most Western governments will be loath to cut back their armed forces, who after all are the guardians of the state".

The attack on the Saddam regime has a precedent in the overthrow of Noriega of Panama last year. He too was an accomplice of the U.S. As Director of the C.I.A., Bush had many meetings with Noriega, which involved not only military matters but drug trafficking.

Now it was the turn of Saddam, another unreliable ally of the U.S.. Last May, the top-level advisory body to Bush, the National Security Council, pinpointed the Hussein regime as the best heirs to the Warsaw Pact as the Enemy, so that military spending could continue.

Strength

A week before the invasion of Kuwait, Saddam was advised by the U.S. Ambassador to Iraq that the United States had "no opinion on your border

BOSSES CRISIS: Who foots the bill?

WE'VE HEARD IT all before: time to tighten the belts again. The economy is going into recession which means massive unemployment and lower living standards. But of course not everyone will be affected. The rich will as always maintain their privileges and demand that the working class makes the sacrifices.

Industrial production has fallen steadily over the past few months and is now over 3% below that of November 1989. Unemployment has been going in the opposite direction, reaching 1.84 million, over 6% of the workforce, in February. This figure would be even higher if the Tories hadn't changed the way of measuring unemployment eg. not counting 16-18 year olds who are on YTS or other training schemes. Inflation is the highest it's been for years: over 9%. The Confederation of British Industry has even gloomier predictions for the future with recession hitting all sectors of the economy, including the once buoyant service and building industries in the south-east. If the bosses' organisation predicts bad news then it must be bad!

Having joined the European Exchange Rate Mechanism, the government is going to have fewer options since it cannot lower the value of the pound to encourage exports. But in any case, all the solutions proposed by any of the political parties will hit the working class and not the rich. People will lose their jobs or those in jobs will have to work harder and accept lower wage increases in order to make their products more 'competitive'. The Gulf War, with its enormous waste of resources, is certain to lead to higher taxes and cuts in spending on the NHS (except

People accepted the recession of the early 80s as necessary. They believed Thatcher when she said there was 'no alternative' in order to get the economy going again. On the surface, events proved her correct with a lowering of the inflation rate and a drop in unemployment levels.

Now we can see the Thatcher 'boom' for the sham that it was. Much of the lowering of the unemployment rate was due to a massaging of the figures, hiding large groups of unemployed from public view. Unemployment never really improved much in Northern Ireland or the North of England. Jobs might have opened up in the south-east but workers couldn't afford the housing and were forced to commute great distances or stay in cramped accommodation. Consumer spending was financed largely by credit. People believed in the boom so they went on a spending spree with their credit cards and bank loans to help them obtain the material possessions that seemed so necessary in Thatcher's world.

The expansion of the economy, however, was built on shifting sand which has now shifted well away. Output in manufacturing has been declining since the late 1970s in any case. Expansion in the 80s was in the banking, retail and building industries which cannot last on their own if nothing is actually being produced. Consumer spending went on imported manufactured goods which caused a huge balance of payments deficit. Credit spending cannot go on forever. At some point the debts have to be paid and people find themselves in a tight situation with many losing their homes.

Sacrifice

Once again it's a fuck-up, with the working class left to pick up the pieces of a system that is continually having crises. The rich sit tight, hoping that workers will work hard, accept job losses, wage cuts and fewer social services. Then when their profits pick up they might give a few crumbs to the workers.

We mustn't fall for the same old shit. Workers made sacrifices in the 80s and believed the rubbish about it being necessary. This cannot happen again. Capitalism is never going to give us a decent life. It's time to get rid of a system that is continually demanding sacrifices while a few are sitting pretty.

THE WARFARE STATE

conflicts with Kuwait". Like Noriega, Saddam had to go. The Iraqi state's own regional interests were now clashing with those of the Western powers. Iraq had fulfilled its role in stopping the Iranian fundamentalist threat in its tracks. Now it was to be inveigled into a confrontation.

The same week that the U.S. Ambassador spoke to the Iraqis, General Schwarzkopf and his top brass planned an exercise that exactly simulated an Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

Moslems

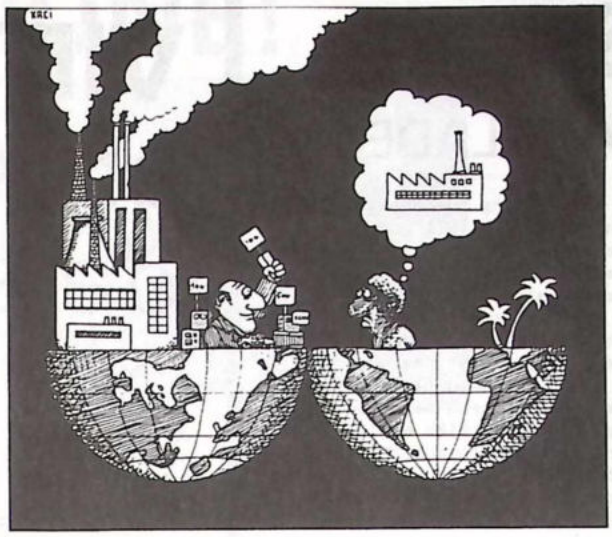
For its part, the U.S.S.R. is terrified of the unrest spreading to it own territories where Moslems are in a majority. It sees the spectre of unrest among the Arab, Iranian and Turkish masses materialising throughout the Near and Middle East. Its own influence in the Gulf area, carried on previously through its former client Iraq, is sorely jeopardised. The U.S. and its allies threaten a permanent military presence in the region. The money provided by the West have kept the Soviet bureaucrats quiet so far, but the danger of American supremacy and power struggles in the leadership may change all of this. For its part, the Iranian state for many of the same reasons colluded with the U.S.S.R. to limit the allied war offensive.

Revolutionaries

Mass movements against the war emerged throughout the world, from the Maghreb countries of North Africa to Malaysia, from Germany to Italy. But many anti-war movements were dominated by the Church(with its fundamentalist counterparts in Moslem countries), the social-democrats,including Labour, with their call for sanctions, and the Trotskyists, with their call for support for the Iraqi regime. As revolutionaries and anarchist communists we didn't take sides in this conflict. Taking sides means supporting the interests of capitalists against the working class. The only side we take is that of the working class in its fight to dump the bosses, of any nationality, off its back.

WORLD TRADE

a coming crisis



ALONGSIDE THE IMF and the World Bank there is another major world economic institution- GATT - the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs, set up by the major industrial nations 43 years ago to supervise part of the world economy. These nations saw a major cause of war in `economic disorder', an effect of trade wars whose basic weapons were tariff barriers.

In one very small sense GATT has helped world trade but being US dominated and served by other `big' nations it has served their interests primarily. Over seven rounds of talks the industrialised nations have freed what they wished and protected what they wanted. Textiles, steel, motor industries have been protected. Now agriculture and services are threatening to split world trade into three sectors.

Debts

Firstly, the US along with the rest of the Americas are moving closer together. The US now has free trade agreements with Mexico and Canada. Central and South America need to export to clear huge debts, much of it to the US and others. The US wants to end EEC farm subsidies and to obtain freedom for its own services sector. The US trade deficit would be eased by Latin America being able to trade again. Increased free trade and an end to EEC farm subsidies would help American farmers and increase the market for American manufactured goods. The US also hopes to add to its $90 billion services exports by recovering some of the $60 billion lost to piracy of its `intellectual property' - its ideas, inventions, innovations, information, science and technology.

Plans

The second sector is the EC, parts of Eastern Europe and the Mediterranean countries. Here the Common Agricultural Policy is the problem. The EEC has a huge farming lobby which will only put up with a 30% cut in subsidies. The US wants a 90% cut. Plans have been discussed to cut back on the huge industrial farms consuming ton after ton of chemical fertilizers and instead to support smaller farms and poorer rural communities. This would help cut back on the huge surpluses which are then dumped abroad destroying other farming communities. Agriculture, however, accounts for only 5% of EEC exports, services are another 25%. The UK earns 60% of its Gross National Product through services. The greater European sector would like easier access to other markets for services and manufactures.

Japan, the Pacific and Asia, forms the third sector with its own interests in manufacture and technological exports. This third sector has to battle against barriers against its own specialist exports.

Blackmail

Beneath these three economic sectors lies the South, the Third World, which by means of all forms of restrictions is being pushed further from survival. Non-Tariff Barriers like the Multi-Fibre Agreement, quotas, `imposed' voluntary restraints, blackmail and threats are endangering the industry and agriculture of the Poor World.

Beyond the debts we all know about there are other dangers - the sub-Saharan belt of Africa faces famine yet again. The GATT talks threaten to place further bills on their plate - for `intellectual property', and also the colonisation of financial sectors by big, well-supported Western Banks and Corporations. Thus, their economies will be further controlled and more precarious.

Free trade is only free for the rich and powerful who force others to buy their products, preventing poor countires from becoming less dependent on western imports. Any agreement which is reached by GATT will only succeed in furthering the domination of the west over the Third World. The ruling class in Third World countries will then impose more hardships on their working class. Poor farmers will be unable to survive when western grain is sold at low prices. Workers will be forced to take wage cuts and work harder in order to make their products `competitive' with those of the west. The Gulf War further endangers poor countries by raising oil prices and disrupting trade routes. Economic crisis will hurt only the weak, the economically vulnerable, the working class.

SUB-CONTINENT IN CRISIS

PAKISTAN

THE BHUTTO GOVERNMENT has not lasted long. The so-called People's Party has, as always, involved itself in too-open corruption and allowed the ultra-reactionaries to take power again. By throwing away the good will she could have found in those further impoverished by the right, and following the usual road of jobs, power and profit for the boys, she has shown how all of Pakistani party politics is nothing but exploitation. The `damn beards' (mosques) and `chocolate Caesars' (army) are back in power. Drug barons are now entering Parliament on the side of the right. Unable to impose their influence upon Afghanistan the military now have plans for Kashmir. They have taken a more hawkish line on Kashmiri `liberation', training fighters and arming them. A muslim Kashmir breaking away from Indian control could be easy to control and profit from.

INDIA

Great changes have been taking place in India. Rajiv Gandhi began the process of walking India into a regional sub-Imperialist power:-

- the Indian Peace Keeping Force in Sri Lanka, supposedly protecting Tamils and supporting the government, made the north a colony of the rupee and Indian goods;
- Nepal blockaded to ensure Indian goods getting preferential treatment;
- interference in Sikkim and the Maldives.

Privilege

The caste system is still fully in force even though the new government, attempted to redistribute educational privilege to lower castes. High-caste youths committed suicide in protest and `despair'

Communalism has returned with a vengeance. The BJP and VHP have orchestrated all Sikhs are seen as outsiders or foreign invaders. Many have been murdered for their politics, with police leading the way at times. Much of this has surrounded a mosque in Ayodhya which is said to be Rama's birthplace.

India's capitalist class marches on-the caste system and religious and cultural chauvinism keeps the poor classes and lower castes confused and controlled-capital makes its deals with transnationals, using their technology and the poor of the tribal and pre-capitalist areas as ultra-cheap labour to produce goods for export.

ASIA

BANGLADESH

Following the creation of Bangladesh in 1971 power was concentrated in the hands of the local bourgeoisie and the bureaucratic class. The `Father of the Nation` Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and his Awami League presided over the creation of this extended class. This was done by three major means: ripping off foreign aid, nationalising Pakistani holdings and alliances with foreign investors,like the British-owned tea plantations. Socialist rhetoric went hand in hand with repression, resulting in the creation of a one-party system in 1975 and the green light for foreign investment by multi-nationals to exploit the population.

Colonel Abu Tahir led a revolt by sections of the military in 1975 against the regime, talking about the creation of soviets amongst the soldiers. Zia Ur Rahman removed the left-progressives and took power. Tahir was hanged.

General Ershad came to power in 1982 and continued the same class rule. Huge quantities of aid have poured in- 60% of the budget was spent on the army, most aid was simply stolen by the rich. Finally Ershad's brutality and corruption forced the opposition to unite and Ershad has been abandoned by his military backers. The opposition comprises forces controlled by the bourgeoisie in the Bangladesh Nationalist Party and the Awami League, the right and left wings of Bangladeshi capital. There is a small revolutionary left, marxist, maoist, etc, but these forces are too small and authoritarian to make a real change for a poor, desperate and ravaged people.

Asia's problems are being overshadowed at present by the huge media event called the Gulf War. But soon those problems will have to be . noticed again. The forces of capital keep the continent in a vice-like grip - notwithstanding the region's leftists. But those Marxists, Leninists and Maoists of South Asia have not found any answer at all, except taking power and returning to the world economy. Going back to capital is no answer. South Asia's only solution is a world solution, the destruction of capital and its agents on a world scale.

VIETNAM — an American defeat

Deformed children of Vietnamese victims of 'Agent Orange'

Introduction

THE STORY OF Vietnam is similar to that of many other Third World countries. The difference is that the USA launched a full-scale war on the country, resulting in world-wide protests and eventual defeat for the US. Journalists and politicians are quick to deny any similarities between the Vietnam War and the Gulf War. For obvious reasons they did not want to see a large anti-war movement or a US defeat. But looking at the history of the war, we can see that though the details are different, the basic cause of the two wars is the same: the need for western capitalism to assert its economic and political domination over rival capitalisms.

History of the War

Vietnam became a French colony in 1870 and its early colonial history followed a typical pattern:exploitation of the land and its people for the benefit of the French. Opposition began very early with a working class developing around Hanoi and Saigon. There were many strikes and uprisings in the first part of the 20th century. As happened in many other Third World countries, the opposition movement became dominated by groups of intellectuals who had been influenced by western revolutionary ideas while studying or working in France.

Ho Chi Minh was the main founder of the Vietnamese Communist Party and was the leading figure from World War II through to the victory over the Americans. He established the Viet Minh (Vietnam Liberation Movement) during World War II in order to fight the Japanese occupation. The Viet Minh took control in Hanoi with only 1000 men. Elections were held in 1946 in the Chinese-controlled north in which the Viet Minh won a big victory. They assumed that their government would be recognized by the Allies.

The Viet Minh were very much a vanguard organisation. The mass of the people, mostly peasants were not directly involved in the formation of the post-war society. Ho Chi Minh bragged,

"When the August Revolution took place there were about 5,000 Party members, including those in jail. Less than 5,000 Party members have thus organised and led the uprisings of twenty-four million fellow-countrymen."

Meanwhile the British occupied the southern part of the country. The British, under the leadership of General Gracey wanted to see the return of French rule to the country. They invited the French back and gave them free rein to begin to reconquer the country. The French promised Ho Chi Minh that he could have a free state within the French union which he was willing to accept. But once the French felt strong enough, they went back on their promise. The war lasted from 1946 to 1954. The French lost.

US INVOLVEMENT

After World War II the US gradually replaced Britain as the main imperialist power in the Pacific and South-east Asia. The US had first supported the Viet Minh. But they soon came to realise that their interests were better served by the French puppet regime. When the French pulled out of the south, the Americans moved in. The motivation for this was clearly not a desire to defend "freedom" or "democracy". In 1954, before there was a need to assuage public opinion, a leading American magazine, US News and World Report, could write the callous truth,

"One of the world's richest areas is open to the winner in Indochina. That's behind the growing concern. Tin, rubber, rice, key strategic materials are what the war is all about. The US sees it as a place to hold at any cost."

The Geneva agreements, drawn up to arrange the end of war settlement temporarily divided Viet Nam in two. Elections were to be held in 1956 to reunify the country. The US and the government they had set up in South Vietnam refused to sign the agreement. Elections were never held and the country remained divided. President Eisenhower's memoirs explain why the US refused to accept the Geneva agreements. He writes,

"I have never talked or corresponded with a person knowledgeable in Indochinese affairs who did not agree that had elections been held as of the time of fighting, possibly 80% of the popula-

VIVE LA COMMUNE!

SEVENTY YEARS AGO the Communist government led by Lenin and Trotsky introduced their New Economic Policy, a measure which started a free market in agriculture and sections of industry. Today, Gorbachov and his supporters are once again trying to establish a latter day variant; the free market is celebrated after decades of the command economy. Always anxious to base new moves on the basis of Marxist-Leninist precedence, we can expect the Kremlin to highlight the anniversary of the NEP with banquets and other celebrations.

What will not be celebrated, we can be sure, is the single event that made Lenin's NEP so urgent: the uprising by soldiers, sailors and civilians at the Soviet naval base at Kronstadt. 1991 is also the anniversary of the Paris Commune which took place in 1871, fifty years before Kronstadt. This article will examine some of the issues involved in these two commune movements and consider the implications of the construction of anarchist communist societies.

Both the Kronstadt and Paris Communes share some interesting features and tell us a great deal about the states which drowned them both in blood after only a few weeks of existence.

Inspiration

The Paris Commune provided revolutionaries with an example of the possibilities inherent in spontaneous popular self-activity. Though defeated, it inspired anarchists, including Bakunin, who claimed it as their own. Even Marx, who had hitherto emphasised the necessity of "political" ie parliamentary struggle, temporarily adopted an almost libertarian position on the Commune. The Communards, he declared lyrically, "have stormed heaven" and, though careful not to abandon the concept of proletarian dictatorship, Marx and Engels identified that dictatorship with the self-activity of the masses that the Commune brought about.

Lenin, ironically, was for a brief period before the October revolution enthusiastic about the Paris Commune, advocating the creation in Russia of the :Commune State". However, Marx's, Lenin's and Engel's libertarianism were extremely temporary. Lenin in particular soon abandoned the superficial libertarianism of his "State and Revolution" and imposed an iron dictatorship of the Party and Cheka (secret police). Having praised the Paris Commune for its libertarian self-activity, he subsequently crushed Russia's home-grown variant: Kronstadt.

Example

What did the Paris Commune acnieve? Firstly it created a popular army from the ranks of disaffected government soldiers and the armed populace of Paris. Though ultimately defeated by the forces of the state, it fought valiantly from street to street until the final surrender. militarily, the Commune made the strategic blunder of awaiting the government attack on Paris. Had it met the invading army some way outside Paris the outcome might have been very different. But, as a model of military organisation, the Commune gave us the people's or workers' militia as an alternative to the standing army which acts as guardians of our oppressors.

On the social level the commune carried out a number of reforms. It was extremely egalitarian, fixing a modest upper limit on earnings for servants of the Commune. Those employers who had fled Paris were expropriated and the workshops were run by the workers. This latter development was of crucial importance since it demonstrated the feasibility of ordinary working people taking control of production themselves. Similarily, the question of distribution was placed in the hands of the Paris masses. In addition, whereas bourgeois "democracy" effectively removes any decision-making from the people, the Commune destroyed political hierarchy and initiated a system of delegate democracy. Delegate democracy gave the workers a direct say in the administration of their everyday lives by which elected delegates were mandated to carry out their wishes and were subject to dismissal should they fail to do so.

The Commune in its day to day activity carried out a number of changes which stemmed from their everyday oppression. For example, night work was abolished for the bakers of Paris. The Parisians would have to wait for their bread! Pawn shops, which were seen as exploitative, were closed down and the church which had played the role of ideological oppressor of the masses was disestablished, its property socialised and its involvement in education terminated.

These measures, though inadequate from an anarchist communist perspective, were all part of a thoroughly progressive and anticapitalist popular social experiment. Anarchists would today perhaps point out limitations of the Commune, for example the continuation of the wages system and the introduction of the cooperative as an alternative to private capitalism. However, had the Commune not fallen and had the model been adopted elsewhere in France (and abroad), a more thorough-going federation of communes might have arisen to replace the nation-state.

Last Gasp

The Paris Commune arose in response to a conservative bourgeois capitalist state, determined to maintain its power in a period of war. The Kronstadt Commune, in contrast, arose at the end of a period of civil war. But again, it was the libertarian expression of revolutionaries exasperated by the activities of a dictatorial state. The Bolshevik seizure of power in October 1917 had been carried out in the name of the soviets or workers councils which had sprung up spontaneously earlier in the year. The bolsheviks very quickly created a highly authoritarian police state which by early 1921 had abolished virtually all political activity except that of themselves.

The period from October 1917 to 1921 had been one of continual civil war which had sapped the morale of even the state's most enthusiastic supporters. However, rather than harness popular anti-capitalist feeling, the government strove to harness it within its own ideological and organisational straightjacket. It was against this system that the Kronstadt sailors ("the flower of the revolution", according to Trotsky) rose up. The Bolsheviks brought into being a dictatorship which extorted produce from the peasants at gunpoint. which enslaved workers under a hierarchy of political commisars and which granted privileges of extra food rations and accommodation to Communist Party members. The whole perverted system of restrictions and state corruption (there were over 50 different levels of food allocation, depending on rank) was documented by Emma Goldman in volume two of her autobiography. Incidently, this is now cheaply available from Freedom books and should be read by anyone interested in the "communism" of the period.

It was in the Baltic fleet that the original ideals of the closing months of 1917 were retained in their strongest form. Despite attempts to condemn the Kronstadters as Whites or backward peasants or worse, all of which have since been shown to be false, there is no doubt that they wanted a libertarian society controlled by the working class through their own assemblies. At the naval base and on the ships the sailors held mass meetings to formulate their demands. These were summed up most clearly in the :Petropavlovsk revolution".

Soviets

Far from being counterrevolutionary, the demands of the Kronstadt Commune continued a tradition that went back at least to 1905 when Russian workers first brought about the reality of the soviet. In fact, the first demand called for "immediate new elections to the soviets" which had by then become mere rubber stamps of the government bureaucracy, being totally devoid of any independent life whatsoever.

FIGHTING THE POLL TAX:
NEWS FROM LEEDS

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLE describes the struggle against the poll tax at a local level,but the lessons to be learnt from it can be applied nationally.ORGANISE! eds.

THE COUNCIL FIGURES for non-payment of the poll tax in Leeds at the end of 1990 show 10% of the adult population have paid nothing at all; and a further 10% are 5 or more months in arrears. Of course the real figure is higher because this does not take into account those people not registered at all. Clearly there's still more than 100,000 people in Leeds still not paying.

During the last three months of 1990 the council began taking to court the non-payers to obtain liability orders against them. In all over 28,500 people (5% of the total adult population) were summonsed to court. Of these 1415 people actually turned up and had their cases heard in court. All but a handful lost. Of the rest 3435 paid before the court hearing and hence the summons was dropped. At court the massive number of non-attenders was dealt with at the end of the day, with the magistrate granting thousands of liabilities in a few seconds. Thus the council got over 25,000 liability orders. But this is only the first stage in enforcing the poll tax and the figures show the majority of non-payers are not intimidated by the council threats.

Given that there were 18 court days set aside for poll tax cases, lasting for a total of 164 hours, then the average case of those attending lasted about 7 minutes. Interestingly this also shows the potential profit for the court itself. Each liability order granted was charged thirty pounds court costs. That's 750,000 pounds for 164 hours work. But is anyone going to pay it?

This court system looks set to continue in the same fashion throughout the next three months as well. Another 20 days in court have already been set aside by the council. A bonus for them is that the numbers turning up is expected to reduce dramatically. On the first few days the turn out of those summonsed was over 20%, this then fell steadily. It meant the council was able to increase the number summonsed from a few hundred to a few thousand at a time. By now most people probably know someone in the city who has been to court, and have been told it's a waste of time turning up.

The council's next step was to send a series of threatening letters saying "Pay now or else". The threat of using bailiffs was Leed's Labour council's chosen method of enforcing the tax. Only a few forms were sent out asking for details of where you work. Hence arrestment of wages or income support is less likely. But the council has only ten bailiffs of its own and two professional firms working for it. They cannot possibly visit all 100,000 non-payers even without us physically preventing them.

FIGHTING THE COURT CASES

For the last three months of last year the major focus for the organised anti-poll tax movement was around the court cases. There are about forty local groups linked together within the Leeds Federation of anti-poll tax groups. Also in it are about ten workplace groups but up till now these have been less active. A campaign of canvassing, leafletting and flypostering across the city was done where emphasis was put on practical information: telling people not to panic, that the court case was a civil procedure enabling the council to go on to enforcement, explaining what the council's enforcement options were and saying that if possible non-payers should attend their own court hearing.

The majority political view inside the Leeds Federation was that large numbers of non-payers turning up to court willing to argue their cases would make the system unworkable. This view was strongly propounded by both the 'Militant tendency' and the liberal-minded independants. This meant trying to argue cases on legal technicalities one by one. It required a team of volunteers acting as unofficial legal advisers (McKenzies Friends) at every court date. A legal group was set up to coordinate this. This strategy is dull, defensive and creates an unnecessary hierarchy between activists and ordinary people. After all who really cares about the legal niceties of transitional relief! The idea that we could clog up the courts is also naive, because given a mass turn out all the council has to do is either adjourn cases, or keep going till people are forced to go home for reasons such as childcare.

Realism

A second political viewpoint was that of encouraging people to express their anger. This may have led to more noisy mass disruptions of the court. This viewpoint was propounded by the 'Socialist Workers' and the anarchists. One argument against this at the time was that after the court was cleared of protesters, many hundreds of liability orders would go through unopposed. In reality this is what happened every time anyway, because as soon as the cases where people had actually turned up were finished, hundreds more went through on a nod. A second argument was that disruptions would only work once or twice and could not be repeated every single day. This is true, but there was no reason why the two strategies could not be mixed.

What actually happened was that the council managed to steamroller the cases through court. But only just! On each court date activists turned up to give advice, to take names and addresses in order to put people in touch with their local group, to act as McKenzies Friends, and to provide tea and coffee during the long wait. Often people who arrived at ten in the morning would have to wait till late afternoon before their case was heard. For us the most useful part of this whole process was that the time most non-payers spent outside waiting to go into court was a great opportunity to have direct in-depth conversations with a broad cross-section of non-payers. Almost all were working class.

BEATING THE BAILIFFS

In the new year the focus has changed. The emphasis of local groups is now to defend those threatened by the bailiffs. Firstly this has meant an information campaign on the legal rights of the bailiff. This clearly shows that bailiffs are not allowed to break into your house on their first visit. (Or second visit if they didn't get in first time). So the first and most important line of defence is to keep them out. Don't let them into your house. The next thing to do is call for support.

The main aspect of current organising work is to build a network of street reps. These people have the task of mobilising other people in the area when someone in their street is faced with the bailiffs at the door. At the moment in many local areas telephone trees of activists are being publicised, but as yet there has been very little discussion of what to do in an actual situation where we are face to face with the bailiffs. `Militant Tendency' members seem to almost fetishise long lists of contacts, but to discourage discussion on what we're actually going to do.

Also set up have been four anti-bailiff coordination groups, one for each quarter of the city (N,E,S,W). Their major task at the moment seems to be finding activists who are available during the day and have a car. Finally there is a bailiff monitoring group whose task is to find out who and where the bailiffs are. And to research the legality of their operations and whether we can stop some of the dirty tricks by taking them to court.

So far the response to the bailiffs has been patchy. In the first few cases of them visiting we did not find out till after they had gone. But everyone has refused to let them in and kept them out on the doorstep. Already they have been exceeding their powers. For example, refusing to identify themselves at the door, threatening to come back later and smash the door in and making a list of items by looking through the window or in one case by guesswork and then claiming `walking possession'.

IN THE WORKPLACE

For the workplace anti-poll tax groups now is the time the first wage arrestments are being made and it is important that these are fought collectively and with the full support of local area groups. The second major task will be to counter the coming propaganda offensive by the council. Come March the council will have to set a new rate. Poll tax non-payers will be blamed for any rise. But more importantly the council will probably announce cuts in jobs and services, again blaming the non-payers. We need to win the argument in council workplaces and unions that it is the poll tax to blame for the cuts not those fighting it.

POLITICAL HACKS AND ANARCHIST REVOLUTIONARIES!

While the workplace and local groups spend most of their time and resources on campaigning, the Leeds Federation has often been riven with sectarian political squabbles. By now it tends to be only the most politically motivated activists that turn up to these meetings. The structure though is still fairly open. The Fed. meets twice a month, one meeting is open to anyone and the other is open to one delegate per group.

There are three main political factions at this level. First, the `Militant Tendency', who are very dull serious politicos but they do a lot of the committed local work. The biggest problem with them is their sectarian arrogance. They believe they are the backbone of the anti-poll tax movement. Secondly is the Socialist Workers Party who are more lively but less committed. At the moment they seem to be more active doing anti-Gulf war work. Thirdly there are the independents who are a loose collection of committed activists, not sharing a common political ideology. In Leeds a collective has formed to produce a regional 3D bulletin. The mix of politics inside 3D includes a range from `Trotskyism' (`Socialist Organiser') to anarchist communism.

Grassroots

The small class struggle anarchist scene in Leeds has not really been involved in the bureaucratic wranglings at the Leeds Fed. Rather, many individuals have been involved in their own local groups and just done the active grassroots work. Leeds Class War and Direct Action Movement groups jointly produced a leaflet which was handed out outside the courts. In it,it was stressed that the main struggle for the campaign would be defeating the common fear of the bailiffs. It is this fear that the council rely on to scare people into paying. We criticised the idea that the movement could `win' in court.

The much larger `lifestylist' anarchist scene is not involved in organised activity at all. But large numbers do turn out for demos and it goes without saying that it is these people who tend to cause the most trouble for the council, the police and the bureaucrats running the Leeds Fed.

One specific area of activity is exclusive to the anarchist scene, that is the support of those arrested and imprisoned on the anti-poll tax demos. All of the dozen or so arrested have been from within the scene. The scene

COMMUNE Continued

The Kronstadters also wanted to see a restitution of proletarian freedom which had been systematically eliminated by the Bolsheviks since 1918. The communards had absolutely no desire for any restoration of power to the exploiters, but freedom of speech and assembly for the peasants, workers and their political allies was an important demand. This attempt to restore the freedom of the pre-October days was of some urgency since it was not only the bourgeoisie who were to be found in the prisons; virtually the whole of the non-Bolshevik left had been incarcerated.

In reality, a whole dictatorial, oppressive state system had been brought into being by Lenin and his party. Their knee-jerk response to any difficulty which arose after their seizure of power was to tighten the screw further; repression, bureaucracy and control were the methods used. A pleasant irony in all of this is that Lenin died a deeply unhappy man once he very belatedly realised the nature of his Frankenstein society. Not only was Lenin's Russia a dictatorship but it also was an extremely hierarchical one. Bourgeois privilege had given way to the privileges of the "commisarocracy". Not surprisingly, the sailors of Kronstadt demanded the "equalisation of rations" for all workers except those engaged in dangerous or unhealthy jobs.

There is no doubt that the insurrectionaries had had a gutful of the Bolsheviks and their methods. Only the overthrow of the Bolsheviks and their replacement by organs of self-organised production together with the granting of freedom to artisans and peasants (as long as they didn't hire labour) could retrieve the situation, argued the Kronstadters. But the Kronstadt demands, even though they had once been mouthed by the Bolsheviks themselves, were met unsurprisingly with repression and slander. Like the communards of Paris, those of Kronstadt put up bitter resistance to the state's bullying and military assault. With the destruction of this last breath of 1917 died the last hope of Russia's oppressed. Only now is there any sign of a rebirth of libertarian ideals.

Louise Michel - anarchist Communard

Self-Organisation

The Paris and Kronstadt Communes were expressions of working class self-activity which continue to provide inspiration. Marxist-Leninist-Trotskyist groups will cynically invoke the former when it suits them whilst, inconsistently, condemning Kronstadt as counterrevolutionary. If they are particularily hypocritical they will cry crocodile tears over the destruction of Kronstadt, pointing to the "tragic necessity" of it all.

But we anarchist communists see in the commune a sketch of how society could be organised. The commune model provides an organisational basis for creating self-directing, integrated units which when federated with similar bodies could have a national and even international character. The Paris and Kronstadt Communes were both brought about under extremely difficult circumstances and lasted only for a matter of weeks. Despite their preoccupation with survival, they demonstrated the practicability of the commune as an organisational form which generated the maximum level of freedom, solidarity and equality. The commune as a geographical entity can accommodate both community and workplace anarchy. It is a model for the future.

has thus tended to support its own and hence has not fought for support in the wider anti-poll tax movement. Similarly, support for the Trafalgar Square Defendants' Campaign has tended to be limited to the scene. The only time a prisoner has gained wider support was for Bryan Wright, the first person to be jailed for not paying.

IS THE POLL TAX BEATEN?

After the Tory debacle at the end of last year it seemed that the poll tax was in tatters. Thatcher was gone. It seemed the tax had to go as well. Heseltine, chosen by Major as the minister now in charge of the Department of Environment, had stated his `opposition` to it. Millions more people joined the ten million or so non-payers in December and kept some extra spending money for Christmas.

Even if the poll tax is reformed or abolished (as appears likely), the government, or a possible Labour successor, will do their utmost to reclaim poll tax debts. With the deepening recession and the enormous cost of the Gulf War the government cannot afford to buy off protest. Without the option of the carrot the government will use the big stick.

We are seeing this already. The use of McKenzies Friends in court has been taken away as a right. It is now at the magistrates' discretion. The first person to be imprisoned for non-payment was Bryan Wright from Grantham. He spent two weeks in Lincoln prison. Central government has threatened to cap any local authority that does not fall into line by setting a low budget and chasing up the non-payers. The first seizures of property in Scotland by the sherriffs after 21 months. The present media silence on the poll tax as an issue. We can be sure that come March the media will be on the offensive against us. The poll tax non-payers will be blamed for the rise in bills. The campaign in Scotland still has a lot to teach us.

Solidarity

The repression can also be clearly seen in the determination of the courts to follow through with the poll tax riot trials. They are already handing out severe sentences with most of the heaviest cases still to come. Examples are two years for `kicking a police van`, four months in remand for obstruction and one month for custard pieing a councillor. Another facet of this repression is the desire of the police to ban future marches.

Clearly then there is an even stronger need to continue and build further an organised mass campaign of defiance. The strength of this campaign is at present at the grassroots community-based level. We need to go further. Firstly, the campaign needs to be taken much more aggressively into the workplace. The two facets of the campaign should be seen as equally important and mutually supportive. Secondly, is the need for national communication and coordination outside the stranglehold of the `Militant Tendency`. At present the grouping pushing hardest for this is the 3D network. Thirdly is the need to continue the support for those arrested and imprisoned currently done by the Trafalgar Square Defendants' Campaign. We need to build support for the prisoners in the wider movement as a whole not just the anarchist and ultra-left parts of it. Fourth is to build the next massive demo in London on March 23rd, so that it is just as big and just as angry as the last.

VIETNAM

The American military build-up

Once established in South Vietnam, the Americans immediately began to destabilize North Vietnam. Eisenhower despatched 300 CIA agents to Hanoi in 1954, gradually increasing their number and scale of operation. In 1961 President Kennedy sent 500 more men to the Saigon military mission and financed secret raids into North Vietnam. The nature of the Diem government in South Vietnam came to the attention of the world in 1963 when a picture of a burning Buddhist monk hit the front pages. He was protesting at the vicious attacks that Diem had launched on Buddhists. Despite the obvious dictatorship that they were supporting, the Johnson administration stepped up operations in 1964 with Operation Plan 34A, `an elaborate programme of covert military operations against the state of North Vietnam`.

Up until now, the war had been conducted without the general public really knowing what was going on. It was just another of the many CIA-organised operations that were going on around the world. But all this changed with the Gulf of Tonkin incident.

As part of Operation Plan 34A, raids were being launched into North Vietnam by American naval forces. When Vietnamese torpedo boats chased the raiders they came across two American destroyers which had been covering the raid. Shots were exchanged. Johnson claimed to Congress and the American public that American ships had been the object of "an unprovoked attack". No mention was made of the 34A raids. In less than 12 hours bombers were on their way to Hanoi. The war had began in earnest.

In February 1965, Johnson launched Operation Rolling Thunder: a massive bombing campaign. He did this despite having promised during the election campaign the previous November not to escalate the war. Although many tons of bombs were dropped, the bombing campaign proved to be a total failure. Therefore, troops were sent to start the ground war in April 1965. By 1967 there were 525,000 US troops in Vietnam.

The land war was no more successful than the air war. The Southern Vietnamese Communists (the Viet Cong) were undistinquishable from ordinary villagers. They had the support of much of the population, especially the peasants who hated the large landowners that backed the Diem regime. The Americans did not know how to deal with such a guerilla war and became more and more desperate. Typical of the actions that American soldiers were involved in was the My Lai incident. They went into the village of My lai looking for Viet Cong. When they couldn't figure out who the Viet Cong were, they proceeded to systematically massacre the whole village. When they had finished 504 villagers had been killed, including 173 children, 56 of whom were babies.

Back in American, with incidents like My Lai making headlines and the number of American casualties growing, the public became increasingly disillusioned with the war. When the Viet Cong launched the Tet Offensive in January 1968, simultaneously attacking 80 stategic centres, disillusionment became rampant with protests escalating by the day.

Richard Nixon campaigned for President in November 1968 on a `peace` platform. He promised to withdraw American land troops and `Vietnamise` the war. He planned to rely primarily on air and naval attacks which would hide the effects of the war and reduce American casualities. His `peace plan~ was no more effective than previous plans. Bombing hadn't produced the results before and it didn't succeed this time. Noam Chomsky writes,

"While travelling in North Vietnam I was shown a bridge, still standing uneasily, that was attacked daily from 1965 until the termination og regular bombing, with 99 American jet planes lost- the cost in planes alone must be $500 million, to destroy one bridge."

Protests continued and the war continued with the bombing of Cambodia. In 1972 Americans sent B-52s to drop 40,000 tons of bombs on heavily populated Hanoi. The bombing lasted 12 days and led to even other western governments voicing their protests. By the time the Americans finally accepted defeat and went to the negotiating table at the end of 1972, 56,000 American soldiers had been killed, 303,000 had been wounded and countless numbers of Vietnamese had lost their lives. Between 1964 and 1972 $108 billion dollars had been spent. Every enemy soldier had cost $500,000 to kill.

The US and its allies hoped that the Gulf War would develop in a totally different direction from that of the Vietnam war. The latest hi-tech weapons were supposed to be more effective than the B-52s of the Vietnam era. The blatant anti-people nature of the bombing in Vietnam where success was measured in terms of people killed or maimed was replaced by sanitised precision bombing of military targets. The land war was delayed again and again in order to avoid casualties of Americans and their allies. The media was more controlled and was fed endless rubbish in hopes of distracting the public from the realities of war. The emphasis has been on a quick victory, never admitting that the Vietnam War was supposed to have ended after a few months. Saddam Hussein is an obvious tyrant whereas Ho Chi Minh appeared to have more support amongst the people so that the US could be more credible in its claim to be opposing tyranny. The Iraqis invaded Kuwait and in Vietnam it was the US who was the invader.

Precision bombing of military targets has turned out to mean many civilian casualties. The war protests were there from day one, deliberately played down by the media, but there nevertheless. Many Arab governments were very worried about a prolonged war as their people cried out against their support of the western imperialists and infidels.

The Vietnam War came to an end for a variety of reasons. The US was defeated militarily, the cost of the war both politically and economically was becoming too much for the ruling class itself and the anti-war movement put pressure on the US government. It's difficult to say which factor was decisive in bringing about the end of the war. This time the US and its allies won the war.It's important to look at the lessons from both the Vietnam and the Gulf War and apply them in any future wars that will take place. The New World Order has been established, and the US and European blocs, in collaboration with the Soviet bloc, will continue to act as the world's police. As revolutionary anarchist communists we see that the only long term solution to war is the overthrow of the system that produces it. We have to build an international revolutionary movement, a movement that rejects all the power blocs, and does not fall into the trap of supporting one set of rulers because they are perceived as being one's enemy's enemy, are " unwittingly anti-imperialist" and are leading the fight against the great imperialist powers. For us the ruling class is international, and everywhere it is our oppressor. The building of this revolutionary movement will be a difficult task, but it is the only real answer to the wars and famines that will prevail until this evil set-up has its foundations demolished.

THE AMERICAN ANTI-WAR MOVEMENT

For the first part of the war, up until 1964, Americans had little idea of what was going on in Vietnam. It was only another American covert operation. The Gulf of Tonkin incident brought the war to the forefront, but it wasn't until the numbers drafted increased along with the casualties that the media took an interest in what was going on.

As the casualties mounted and when it became obvious that the US wasn't winning, the anti-war movement began to grow. In addition, incidents like My Lai brought home to people what the soldiers were actually doing to people in Vietnam. The massive bombing campaign had only been an abstraction; the objects of the B-52s and the napalm bombs were not real to most Americans. But the dead soldiers and the pictures of My Lai could not be ignored and led to a massive anti-war movement.

The movement was dominated by student groups. This did not mean that the movement was only a middle class movement. A much larger section of the population stay on in further education in America. But the organised working class were not only not involved in the movement, but were often openly hostile. This was not the case for the black working class who saw the anti-war movement as having similar objectives and enemies. It was often black people who couldn't avoid the draft as they were not rich or well-connected like current Vice-President Dan Quail.

The anti-war movement was divided into primarily two tendencies. There were those that were against the war because the US was not winning and it wasn't worth it in terms of loss of American lives or the cost of military spending. Many of these still saw the Vietnamese as the aggressor and the US as defenders of freedom; it just didn't seem worth the effort. The second tendency,with wide variations within it, were aware of the true nature of US involvement:imperialist,self-interested aggression. For a whole generation of young people, the growing awareness that the rubbish they had been fed at school about America being the champion of freedom and democracy was a pack of lies, gave way to anger and rage at the entire system. As many looked deeper into the reasons why the US was in Vietnam, they began to see what the real problem was: an economic and political system that adopted policies that were wanted by a few while the ordinary people, the working class suffered both on the battlefield and in the lack of facilities at home due to the money spent on war. In other words, the real enemy was capitalism. This awareness led people to look for alternatives. Unfortunately, the alternatives were very limited and took on strange directions.

Some advocated `turning on, tuning in and dropping out`. People experimented with drugs and alternative lifestyles, setting up communes or living rough on the streets of the city. Others, in their rejection of American capitalism, supported unquestioningly the countries that claimed to be socialist. Ho Chi Minh was idolised and activity against the war became activity in support of the Vietnamese ~communist~ regime. People chanted pro-Vietnamese slogans and did the `Ho Chi Minh hop` on demos. Various factions emerged based primarily on the support of a particular regime or ideologue. Pro-Albanians debated with pro-Soviets as Trotskyists clashed with Maoists. They also romanticised all Third World national liberation struggles, putting them forward as the vanguard in the fight against world capitalism. These attitudes both reinforced and were reinforced by the organised white working class's support for the war.

RESISTANCE AMONG THE AMERICAN military was a major but little publicised factor in ending the war. In June 1971 Colonel Robert D. Heinl wrote, "By every conceivable factor our army that now remains in Vietnam is in a state approaching collapse, with individual units avoiding or having refused combat, murdering their officers and non-commissioned officers, drug-ridden and dispirited when not near mutinous". (Armed Forces Journal, June 1971)

Attacks on officers ("fraggings") rose from 126 in 1969 to 271 in 1970. In 1968 there were 68 recorded incidents of combat refusal. By 1969 entire units were refusing orders and by 1970 there were 35 seperate refusals in the Air Cavalry alone. Desertion and AWOL (Absent Without Leave) became epidemic with one GI leaving every three minutes at the height og the war.

Though we would disagree with many of the ideas of the anti-system activists, they were some of the first in our recent history to argue that capitalism could not be reformed and needed to be overthrown. Whatever their faults they left a legacy of ideas that are still influencing us today, for better or worse.

As anarchist-communists we have a particular perspective on wars. War brings into sharp relief the class nature of society, the oppressive nature of all states and the need for working class internationalism. We have no illusions that any of the warring sides are any better even if the country is fighting US imperialism. Ho Chi Minh used an authoritarian army and bureaucracy to control and dominate the workers and peasants. The war was not waged to deter aggression or defend freedom but to preserve the economic and political interests of the ruling class. In addition, we are not against a war because 'our boys' are getting killed or because 'we' are not winning. We are against war because of what is doing to working class people on both sides. Thousands of Vietnamese had been killed but the shooting of 4 students by the National Guard at Kent State University in 1970 sparked off a disproportionate amount of activity. This is not the basis on which to build an anti-war movement.

THE VIETNAM WAR AND THE GULF WAR

Having looked at what happened in the Vietnam War we can now see many similarities with the Gulf War. Freedom was not an objective of the Gulf War any more than it was in the Vietnam War. Bombing was seen at a distance, the media uninterested in the real effects of that bombing. There was tacit or even enthusiastic support for war as long as it was not "our boys" that were getting killed.

Within the anti-war movement there are also comparisons to be made. Some argue that the war was justified but not worth it and others have made a hero out of Saddam Hussein, an even more brutal dictator than Ho Chi Minh. Anarchist-communists will continue to oppose all wars between states, not because killing is wrong in itself, because one side is better than the other or because the British working class is suffering. We oppose wars because they have horrific consequences for ordinary people and go against the interests of all working class people regardless of nationality. Our opposition to the war comes from our opposition to capitalism. It is vital that we build any future anti-war movement on this basis.

The imperialist mentality

Imperialism thrives on fear. It is relatively easy to convince people that there is a threat from a different nation, class, tribe, or racial group and that everything must be done to combat this. Today as we see in the Gulf, this includes the possible use of atomic, biological and chemical weapons. Eliminate, suppress, enslave are the mottoes of imperialism from Ghengis Khan to Adolf Hitler. Force is the way to ensure the domination of one side or the other. In the attempt to create socialism similar results have arisen because power has been seized and wielded by the party apparatus involving corruption, militarism and new class models, ie. industrial management and its abuses typically revealed in Russia.

The anarchist alternative has rarely been applied on a large scale and is axiomatically abhorrent to international and social imperialism. It also contradicts the competitive element fostered by capitalism. Our main appeal is therefore to the oppressed working class and rootless and alienated youth, for the simple reason that they have nothing to lose and much to gain from collective labour, distribution of produce and democratic decision making where even the ideas of the minority can theoretically be applied, for example in agricultural and industrial experiments. Our main task is therefore to convince those who believe they benefit from the fruits of power, that those fruits are rotten to the core. Capitalism corrupts, pollutes, and enslaves. It can not even distribute its surplus food to famine regions, famines partly created by its own imbalanced methods.

War in the Gulf

RECENTLY I've been ploughing through the INDEPENDENT in order to keep up with developments in the Gulf and I came across a paragraph which caught my attention. It was printed on 15 Jan 1991, the date on which the United Nations instructed Iraq to leave Kuwait before military force was to be used: "In a ground war the most difficult objective will be Kuwait City itself. Fighting in a built up area is a dirty, dangerous and tricky business....the cost of taking Kuwait City, held by a division of at least 12,000 men, will be horrific. The city includes many blocks of flats which are very difficult to clear. The,standard way is to go in from the top by helicopter. Having worked your way down to the bottom,enemy engineers can set off prepared demolition charges, destroying the building and wiping out a full company sent to clear it. This has an adverse effect on the company sent to clear the next block."

The last line, especially, of the above quote will be ringing in the ears of the ruling class. It would not be a far step from mutiny, one of the most feared words in the vocabulary of the military establishment. It underlines the futility of predatory wars. The nightmare scenario of chemical and biological warfare is an untested factor in this particular equation. In March 1988 5,000 Kurds in the town of Halabja were killed in a matter of minutes by chemical weapons unleashed by the Iraqis. This kind of atrocity could well be repeated on a much larger scale. Revolutionary movements are often born of the death and destruction brought about by the greed and avarice of capitalism, when even its most loyal servants turn against it, when society is paralysed by dissension and opposition.

A heavy military defeat for Iraq could provoke unprecedented hostility towards the USA and sharpen the conflict with the Israeli state. However this would no longer take the form of acts of terrorism but resolute mass action on the part of Arab workers throughout the Middle East. They would throw off the shackles of nationalism and fundamentalism and topple the motley collection of dictatorial regimes which have prevented the entry of workers into the 20th century.

We have to be clear in our minds that conflagrations of this kind are a natural by-product of the periodic crises of capitalism.No matter how tenaciously their apologists defend this small-minded parochialism we anarchists will continue to propagate the ideals of proletarian internationalism as a superior system to theirs. The Praetorian Guard will become the revolutionary guard and they will steadfastly refuse to go back to the Stone Age. In the distant future people will visit their local museum and marvel at the curious relics on display: a police truncheon,a UB40 card and a photograph of carpet bombing raids on Iraq.

Eastern Europe

On the whole I think the paper is very good. If I have a criticism it is that, in the issues I have seen so far (16-20), you are not critical enough of some of the anarchist groups in other countries, particularly the ones emerging in Eastern Europe. Just because these groups call themselves anarchists doesn't mean that they are sound revolutionaries - in many cases the ideas which they are putting forward appear to be a jumble of liberalism/leftism. If these ideas were being put forward by anarchist groups in this country I think you would be far more severe in your assessment. In your article on the Trieste conference in issue 20 you tend to be more critical and I hope you keep this up, otherwise you are doing a grave disservice to the growing struggles of the East European working class.

YOU ARE RIGHT in saying that in many cases the ideas which the anarchist groups in Eastern Europe are putting forward are confused, and contain large elements of liberalism and leftism. However, there is a big difference between the situation in Eastern Europe and the West. There has been a complete break with the past due to the Stalinist ice age and many fruitful experiences have been forgotten. Anarchists in Eastern Europe are faced with little practical and theoretical experience, and little anarchist literature. The movement emerged, in most cases, from a counter-culture-the only place it could emerge from, given the conditions in Eastern Europe. Obviously it is still influenced by that counter-culture, with the preoccupations with punk and alternative communities. Illusions in the market will, we hope, disappear as the effects of the market are felt. We feel that this is already the case in Poland, where the movement does seem to be making theoretical advances. We do refuse to make apologies for these groups,but at the same time we feel that a constructive dialogue needs to be opened up, so that they can advance. One recent example of developments is that of the Hungarian group AUTONOMIA which realised the differences within its own ranks and split into 4 groups- one involved with the setting up of an alternative community, one trying to link theoretical development with action, anarcho-syndicalists and anarcho-punks.

Direct democracy

DIRECT DEMOCRACY NETWORK: This will be an international project which aims to produce some practical analysis of direct democracy(its strengths and weaknesses)with a special interest in mass organisations which use rotation of delegates(e.g.the Spanish dockers Coordinadora or the CGT-CNT branch at Michelin in the Basque country).

We would like to hear from anyone with practical experience, or who is interested in giving their criticisms of draft texts,doing translations(where possible we will work in Spanish as well as English),or in any way getting involved.

Various already existing texts on this subject will be sent to anyone interested.

Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide, and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class.

We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism.

The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives wil always be different to ours.

The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9. As anarchist we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called 'socialists' or 'communists' we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement. •

Racism in football

WITH ENGLISH FOOTBALL teams now being accepted back into Europe, and League football as popular as ever, the United European Football Association and the Football Association are supposedly trying to stamp out hooliganism. But one thing they conveniently ignore is racism. One popular myth about racism is that it is confined to the terraces - this is rubbish, racism is everywhere. It runs through the changing rooms, boardrooms and the sports administrations at the highest levels. It's not confined to the big clubs either- it can be seen on a smaller scale at non-League clubs too.

One of the most disturbing aspects is the two-faced attitude of some of the so-called fans- one minute they are racially abusing a black player from the other team, the next they're singing the praises of a black player from their own side.

Causes

Even though racism effects the national and international game, not much thought has been given as to its causes. Banks of England fans giving Nazi salutes and screaming abuse at John Barnes at the 1990 World Cup game in Sweden give a clear picture of what goes on. International games often promote and reinforce nationalism-always racist and putting the "Nation" above the classes. The State, politicians and the media, and racist-fascist groups promote this.

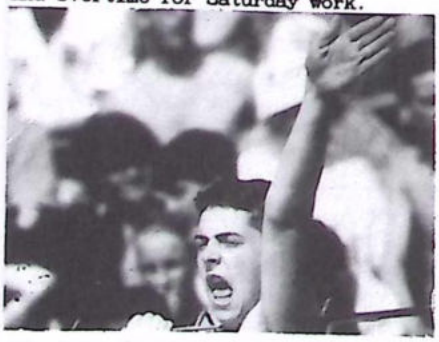
It is important to draw a distinction between hardcore racists and fascists and those who allow themselves to be drawn so easily into blind, ignorant prejudice by racist groups such as the British National Party. who are looking to spread their foul ideas and recruit new members.

It's up to football fans to do something about racism - we are the ones who have to stand in an unpleasant, hostile environment. Racism divides and weakens us, the working class.

Liberal

It's no use lobbying or pressurising directors, the League or the F.A. to start a preachy white liberal anti-racist campaign. It's a waste of our energy because these people and bodies are racist themselves, and because racism in the working class can only be tackled by the working class itself.

The police, apart from being racist themselves, frequently help and defend fascist and racist activists, when they're not thinking about their bonuses and overtime for Saturday work.



Hardcore

Hardcore racists and fascists need to be physically confronted in and outside grounds and their paper sales, leafletting, abuse and intimidation stopped. This type of work has been effectively done by groups such as Anti-Fascist Action.Fanzines produced by football supporters such as Fortune's Always Hiding(West Ham)Marching Together(Leeds United)Our Day Will Come(Manchester United and Celtic) have a role to play. Many already carry a clear, working class anti-racist message. Club rivalry between fans should be friendly and generous. All too often it's nearer war and rival fans are abused and beaten up. The magnanimous cheering of the Woking side by West Bromwich fans when their side had just lost 4-2 to the non-League club shows how things could be, though there is the wider question of whether competition naturally leads to aggression and violence. The " easily swayed " racially prejudiced fans need to be talked to, argued with and confronted in a clear class-conscious manner which demolishes racist myths(they're taking our housing and jobs, Africa as the source of AIDS,etc) and shown that racism must be tackled both because it is oppressive and because it divides and weakens the working class. This should all be done in a direct, honest way which acknowledges that all white people have some racism in themselves to tackle and that much can be learnt from the struggles of black working class people. It should not be done in a preaching "I'm right-on, you're a racist" way which is dishonest, counterproductive and reformist.

Housing in the nineties

AMIDST ALL THE bluster and rhetoric about a `just' war to defend democracy, freedom and human dignity, the Arctic snows of February managed to draw some media attention to the plight of people sleeping rough. Indeed, one M.P. was apparently `shocked' at the sight of homeless people `caked in snow'.

It has been estimated that there are about 3,000 people in London alone who sleep in the streets. Yet homelessness goes much further than the visible signs of people in shop doorways or `cardboard city'. When you start to include those in bed and breakfasts, hostels, squats and other temporary accommodation, homeless figures in Britain reach about one million.

Deliberate

Homelessness in this country has been steadily worsening over the last twenty-odd years. Admittedly, it is a permanent feature of capitalist society but the current state of housing has more or less been deliberately created by the Government.

Since 1979, government spending on council homes has fallen by 75%. Coupled with this, over a million council homes have been sold since 1981. It`s safe to say that today, the building of council accommodation is at a virtual standstill.

Having said this, plenty of housing is still being built. Yet the millions spent and invested has been on homes for the rich. Working class people don`t even get a look in.

Interest

With the complete lack of affordable and decent rented accommodation alongside constant plugging of `right to buy' and `everyone an owner occupier' propaganda, many from the better off end of the working class saw home ownership as an option. But with high interest rates, 1989 saw over 40,000 families lose their homes because they were unable to keep up with mortgage repayments. This has more than doubled over the last year.

ORGANISE!

ORGANISE! IS THE national magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF). Organise! is a quarterly theoretical journal published in order to develop anarchist communist ideas. It aims to give a clear anarchist viewpoint on contemporary issues, and initiate debates on areas not normally covered by agitational journals.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and others open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us to develop our ideas further.

Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! – as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree with our A&Ps at all.)

Due to summer break, the next issue will be out in early October. The deadlines are August 13th for features and reviews, and September 4th for letters and news.

A Fairer Tax?

The defeat of the poll tax was quite rightly seen as a victory for the anti-poll tax movement and for the working class. However, the victory will be short-lived. We may have got rid of the poll tax but we haven't got rid of taxes in general, or the system that makes ordinary working class people pay for whatever "benefits" they may get from the welfare state.

This year's poll tax has been cut by 140 pounds to defuse the issue before getting rid of the poll tax altogether. However, the 140 pounds had to be made up from somewhere else and it certainly wasn't the rich who would pay. Instead, VAT was put up by 2.5%. Taxes on spending are well-known for being "regressive" meaning that they hit the people on the lowest incomes the hardest since it is this group that spends a greater proportion of its income. The rich put more of their money into investments or can go abroad to shop if it suits them. So, although we are supposedly 140 pounds better off, the increase in prices resulting from VAT increases and the increase on cigarettes, alcohol and petrol will soon do away with any gains. In addition, many didn't actually pay the poll tax, but it's difficult to create a mass movement that would stop paying VAT.

The proposals for changes in local taxation are in the planning stages but it's not obvious that ordinary working class people will be much better off. The tax will combine the previous rates system with the idea that everyone should pay something. People with higher valued property will pay more than those in low valued property or council property. The poll tax element has been maintained in that the tax will also be based on the number of adults living in the property so that people living alone will pay less.

On the surface this seems "fairer" but then as with the reduction in the poll tax this year, the money has to be got from somewhere.

RICH

Since it won't come from the rich, it's more of a battle between who in the working class and the lower middle class will bear the burden of taxation. As anarchist-communists we must therefore be very wary about getting involved in debates about which tax is "fairer". Anything that puts more money in the hands of working class people at the expense of the rich is to be welcomed, but this is rarely the case. The anti-poll tax movement may have put a stop to a direct assault on the working class but it has not led to any redistribution of income from rich to poor.

If income tax is raised on the rich, they have their tax havens and creative accountants. If companies are taxed, they just raise the prices we have to pay. If landlords are taxed, they raise rents. And if taxes aren't increased they cut services that working class people rely on.

SOCIETY

As long as society is controlled by a ruling class which has power to twist anything to their advantage, we will be paying taxes to support their system. If the State does provide anything remotely useful like the health service,they make sure we pay out a large part of our miserable wages for it.

Taxes have been around as long as class society. Their main purpose has always been to extract the fruits of labour from working people. for the benefit of the privileged. In Egypt, it was the common people that were forced to build the pyramids,. In the Middle Ages it was the peasants who had to give some of their labour and produce to the lord in return for "protection".

Today we pay a whole range of taxes that supports the royal family, war and the military, the police and courts and a lot of bureaucrats who sit around thinking of new ways to get money out of us.

Yes, we have got rid of the poll tax, but we are still being ripped off. There is no such thing as a fair tax.

THE LONG ARM OF THE STATE

The Guildford 4 and the Birmingham 6 have been released. The police involved in these cases are being disciplined – or not, as the case maybe – and there have been calls for the disciplining of the Chief justice, Lane. We all know, or should do, that the 4, the 6, the Maguires, the Winchester 3, the Tottenham 3 and a host of others were imprisoned to satisfy the vampirish needs of the governmental system.

It needs external and internal threats to keep themselves in power. The carefully sustained and continually updated threat of the Criminal, the Terrorist, the Red, the Anarchist achieves a specific set of aims:

- 'National Unity' can be achieved against the uncivilised barbarians, the Argy, the Muslim, the Irish
- new repressive laws and codes of practice can be brought in and continually justified as with the Prevention of Terrorism Act
- the forces of law and order can be justified
- people are force fed reasons to feel attacked, crime is laid at the door of "outsiders" people "higher in the social hierarchy have those "lower" down to take any blame.

Our beloved boys and girls in blue can run around shooting young children, shooting women in their own home, literally frightening others to death, drowning people in Huddersfield, strangling them in Wolverhampton, shooting them in Hackney police station, framing them left right and cente.

The West Midlands Police Serious Crimes Squad has been under investigation – what shock, what horror that people could think ill of our lovely coppers! The allegations have been for example:

- Inspector Paul Matthews. Forced to resign for disobeying orders (there's an oddity) Involved in framing Martin Foran, an anarchist activist, on robbery charges in 1985. The person robbed has always stated that it could not have been him.
- Detective Superintendent John Brown. Negligent. He loses notes, tortures defendants to extract confessions – by holding plastic bags over their heads – fabricates evidence, we are informed.
- Detective Sergeant Michael Hornby. Subject of complaints. We are told he planted a shotgun on one defendant. Three trials collapsed in which he was involved.
- Detective Superintendent James Kelly. Reprimanded on 4 counts of discreditable conduct. Involved in the Birmingham 6 case, where he used assault to gain a confession.

Shaky evidence

We have witnessed so many of these cases for years. Hundreds of cases during the Miners Strike, like the Orgreave rioters were

LESSONS OF POLL TAX VICTORY

Steve Nally and Tommy Sheridan in their working clothes, review the latest edition of Militant.

The poll tax has been beaten but limps along for the time being certain of its expiry. Now seems a reasonable time to analyse the impact of the poll tax and evaluate the lessons which flow from it.

First of all, whatever the alternatives that will come into operation, it must be accepted that the defeat of the tax marks a major victory for the working class. It was introduced as yet one more attack on the working class of Britain, shifting, as it did, the main burden of locally raised taxation from the rich and the middle class to the less well off. Some sections within the working class were particularly badly hit, low paid workers, housewives, and many black people.

It was these people who most solidly resisted payment. They did so partly from an understanding of the nature of the poll tax, but mainly on the principle of "Can't Pay, Won't Pay". They simply refused to be impoverished further. What is more, by non-payment of any local tax, millions of working class people were actually better off in terms of their disposable income. With the exception of committed leftists most of those in the professional strata, despite any professed radical

CONTINUING THE STRUGGLE

The poll tax has been beaten. Thatcher has gone down with the sinking ship. This is a victory for the millions of working class people who stood up and defied the tax. The first major victory after a decade of defeats. This is an excellent morale boost and a confidence builder for us all – a small taste of the changes we can achieve through mass political action. However we have only won a battle – not the war. We still have two more years of poll tax bills landing on our doormats, we will still be summonsed to court, still have to battle with bailiffs.

The ruling class strategy to split the movement was simple. Attack it. Political witch-hunting and criminalisation of those who fought back against the police at Trafalgar Square was to be used. Raids and jail sentences to intimidate and isolate the activists. The wedge of "law and order" to split the movement: ordinary citizens against violent extremists. Despite disgusting statements from Steve Nally and Tommy Sheridan, the anti-poll tax movement did not split. Millions of people in England and Wales followed the example of one million non-payers in Scotland and refused to pay.

With the tax beaten the mass involvement in the campaign has reduced. What is left is a small organised core of activists and millions of people who have lost all interest in the poll tax altogether.

They won't pay, return forms or even turn up to court but neither will they return to the streets and fight on this issue as they did a year ago. What we need now is an honest political debate within the shrinking number of committed activists, otherwise we'll just become an unpaid, overworked, overstretched welfare service for the thousands facing bailiffs and ultimately jail. That we need to continue the fight until there is a complete amnesty for all non-payers and amnesty and release for those criminalised and imprisoned on anti-poll tax demonstrations is obvious. But we must see this as part of a much wider class struggle. What the anti-poll tax struggle has taught us is the power of autonomous grass roots organisation in the community and the workplace. It's 1:0 to us with the poll tax but we have to go much, much further yet.

LONG ARM OF THE STATE

thrown out of court because of shaky evidence. The government response was to bring in the Public Order Act to make it easier to convict.

The Hillsborough disaster was a huge own goal. The attempt to blame drunken hooligans by the police and the Sun for deaths caused by police incompetence was typical. The verdicts of accidental death were a further cover-up.

With monotonous and nauseating regularity police and courts conspire to punish victims of racist violence. To defend yourself against attack successfully it seems you have to be white, male and middle class – or a copper. The shoot-to-kill policy in Northern Ireland is still shrouded in mystery. The fiasco of the Wapping cops, with their union bleating about the time taken to prosecute them, the now permanent Prevention of Terrorism Act, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, the Criminal Justice Bill are all further attempts by the rulers to permanently criminalise anyone it wishes.

Why do we let this go on? we suffer under harsher and harsher laws. We are fed a continuous stream of hysterical fairy stories by the media. We allow the police to kick us, shoot us, drown us, maim us, strangle us, frame us. We allow the courts to apply any prejudice they feel, the reactionary, racist, public school judge is all there is. Governments sit happily talking of rotten apples and find more justifications for harsher policing.

views, overwhelmingly paid up.

Another important feature of the movement was its mass and generalised character. As the huge demonstrations showed, virtually every town and village in Britain had its anti-poll tax group. People who had never been to a political meeting in their lives turned up at hastily organised public meetings. Although, by and large, active support for local campaigns was not deep or consistent, people were willing to part with cash in order to maintain local activity. Despite the demonstrations, pickets,etc, the opposition retained a strongly individualised character. Each household decided independently whether or not to pay with little reference to outside developments. Even so, literally millions decided to risk the courts and not pay. It was this mass non-payment which finally scuppered the tax.

The role of local anti-poll tax groups was important. By simply having a public presence outside town halls or in the shopping areas, the local groups provided a focus for continued non-payment, encouragement, information, propaganda and advice. Unfortunately, in some areas the local groups became battlegrounds between competing Marxist-Leninist groups. Militant, the SWP and other Trotskyist groups used the movement to gain recruits, increase influence and sell papers. They manipulated, as far as they could, the movement for their own sectarian ends. Fortunately the movement was, when the occasion demanded it, big and independent enough to ignore them. The riot of March 31,1990 was an example of this.

Street Politics

The riot has been discussed in Organise no.19 (back copies available) so I will not dwell on it here. However, a few comments are in order. Despite all the manouevring and denunciations by Militant robots like Steve Nally, the riot proved to be a turning point in the campaign. The demonstration was enormous but more importantly it was angry. And this anger erupted in the near insurrectionary events of March 31. The pound wobbled on the international money markets, the country was stunned and Thatcher for the first time looked vulnerable. For her, the riot marked the beginning of the end.

It is fitting that it should have been a riot and a poll tax riot at that that contributed to Thatcher's downfall. It was to contain spontaneous working class anger that the government had introduced its heavily repressive Public Order Act in 1986. As such it proved to be a failure, but as a means of exacting revenge it has worked well. On the basis of the flimsiest police evidence many people have been imprisoned, especially through the magistrates courts.

Labouring under Tories

Since Thatcher's removal by an increasingly nervous and unsure Tory parliamentary party, the poll tax continued to haunt them. Given that millions of people have got out of the habit of tamely paying local taxes, any new tax is unacceptable. The continued attachment to the poll tax of many Tory M.P.s also caused many problems in the new leadership.

The Labour Party has played its usual role throughout. Wedded to the constitution and legality, the party at all levels urged payment of the tax. It out-Toried the Tories in its condemnation of the anti-poll tax movement. Roy Hattersley played a particularly despicable role in his calls for imprisonment of poll tax rioters. Meanwhile Kinnock in his "Toy Town revolutionaries" speech tried to show just what a good little boy he is. Ironically, Labour may lose far more than the Tories over the poll tax. Not only have millions of Labour voters disregarded the Party's advice and not paid but also many have disappeared from the electoral rolls. Finally, Labour's alternative to the tax is likely to be as unpopular as any.

Political Shift

There was a significant political shift as a result of the poll tax. The working class, dismissed by many as conservative and passive, has shown that it has the will to fight. Millions of "law-abiding" working class people are now resisting the law. Direct action outside of town halls and in Trafalgar Square has brought results and the parties of the ruling class, Tory, Labour and Liberal Democrat, are in disarray.

Just the Pits

SINCE THE 1984-85 miners strike British Coal has shut literally dozens of pits. At the time it was feared that "rationalisation" would mean the closure of seventy pits, this figure has long since been passed. Huge coal fields such as South Wales are now more or less extinct, only the scars on the landscape remain.

Interestingly, although supply has decreased, demand has not. This has meant increasing imports which come from places as diverse as Columbia and South Africa. Increasingly, coal is coming in from Eastern Europe, particularly Poland. What all these countries have in common are much abused workers. British miners have always been one of the most militant sections of industry and have achieved relatively good wage rates and safety conditions through their struggles. Although still a dangerous job their comrades in other nations receive very little money and are lucky if there are any safety measures. This allows their bosses to sell it at very low prices, making it economical to ship halfway round the world. It has also been a useful means for the British Government to prop up the economies of friendly regimes such as South Africa.

Community

The closure of a pit can have substantial repercussions. When they were first opened towns developed around them. Slum conditions usually resulted from the pit owners slapping up housing at the lowest possible costs and then charging extortionate rent. Over the years community struggle improved their living conditions and other businesses moved into the area to supply the needs of the miners' families and also the colliery. When a pit is shut the whole town goes very quickly into recession, many businesses will either close or move taking any hope of alternative work with them. Once the dole queue is long enough the Government opens a business park allowing new industries to open up at very little cost. Most are hi-tech and labour intensive, they are in a position of total economic power and can force down the wages of their employees to a bare minimum. This is even assuming miners can retrain into totally different jobs. As often as not the new industries also bring in the workforce, still paying them a bare minimum on the basis that there are plenty of unemployed people in the area prepared to do the job.

Votes

As ecological crisis looms it is generally accepted the future of power generation is in renewables and coal's days are numbered. However, don't be fooled by the Government, their motives had nothing to do with environmental protection. In 1984 environmentalists were still seen as "annoying hippies" by the Government, there was certainly no votes in it. Their current excuse is that imported coal has less sulphur in it which they are obliged to reduce to help prevent acid rain caused partly by sulphur dioxide. This is a lie. When the agreement was reached the Government only agreed to fit Flue Gas Desulphurisation (FGD) systems to six power stations by 2003. If fitted to all power stations they would have reduced sulphur emissions by 90% which experts consider would be the required amount, and would have allowed the use of British coal. However, the programme has now been scrapped altogether as costs were too great to be borne by the newly privatised generating companies. Their figures only agreed to hold emissions at 1988 levels by 2003 – fifteen years to achieve nothing. They believed they could con the public by using low sulphur coal and increasing nuclear power which unfortunately for them and fortunately for us now lies in tatters. And is it really ecologically sound to ship a commodity halfway round the world that you have in abundance under your feet.

Offensive

The miners strike was purely about smashing a militant section of the working class. As early as 1980 a leaked Government document was proposing massive increases in nuclear power to stave off strike action by miners or transport workers, and of course when the strike came, power stations were readily stocked with coal for months. The ruling class were allowed to go on the offensive and have been running rampage on the mining industry ever since. When closure comes now, many miners welcome it, fed up of a shit job and being treated like shit by bosses.

The industry has virtually been stripped to its most profitable bare minimum and will inevitably be privatised soon. Miners need to regroup quickly and organise for this new onslaught. Also other workers must learn the lessons. Transport workers still haven't felt the full force of the state ranged against them, but there is evidence that the Tories are manoeuvring for them and workers are increasingly angry at years of abuse. If this develops into confrontation let's make sure this is not another isolated struggle, but that the State feels the full force of Class War!

MOHAWKS CONFRONT THE STATE

Last August in Canada, some four thousand troops and fourteen hundred armoured vehicles of the Canadian Army confronted native Mohawk people of the Kanesatake reservation in Oka, Quebec.

The events leading up to the crisis in Oka started on 9th March, 1990 when the municipality of Oka village declared an official lifting of a moratorium on golf course expansion. The golf course in question, along with threatened condominium construction was to extend across areas of forest known to the Mohawks as "The Pines" – land that has always been occupied by the Mohawk people. When the Canadian government realised that the Mohawks were prepared to stand determinedly for their right to their home, the Army was hurriedly called in and the tear gas, concussion grenades and automatic weapons of the provincial police were replaced with the razor wire, trenches and heavily armed troops and tanks of the Army, which invaded Oka on 20th August.

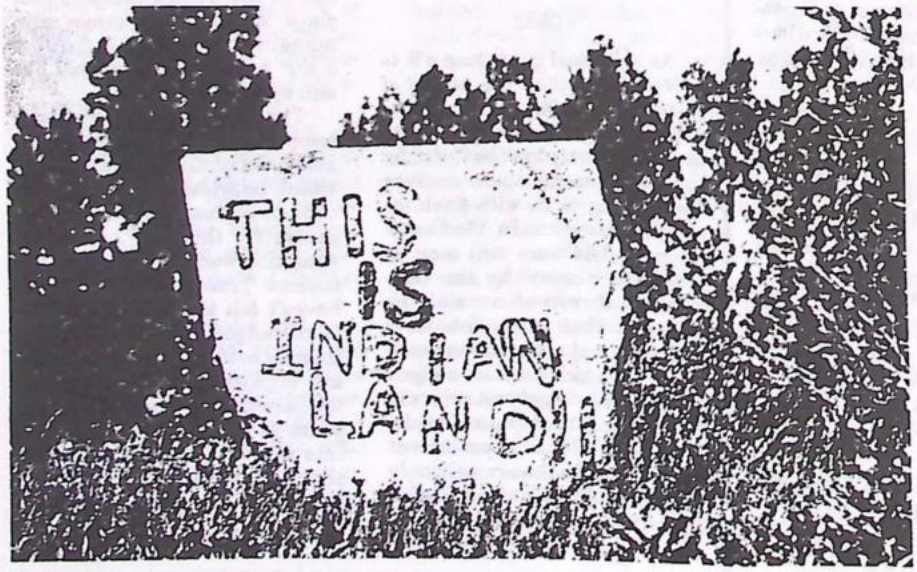
SOLIDARITY

Such a stand against the system was naturally condemned by the Canadian government officials, namely Robert Bourassa (Premier of Quebec) and Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister). However the Mohawks of Kanesatake did not fight alone – on the contrary, North America's native populations shook with indignation at the government's military stance against the Mohawks. Those Mohawks living on the nearby reservations of Kahnawake and Akwesane (Akwesane is in New York State, United States, and is spread across the US/Canada border) joined the struggle at Kanesatake in large numbers. Ojibwas blocked Canadian National Railway tracks (running through their reserves) stopping traffic for 5 days at Longlac and White River, Ontario – and on an Oneida reserve, a hydro-electric cable tower collapsed after an explosion. All of this was held in identification with the Mohawks cause and demonstrations and petitions continued throughout the year until finally after an incredible standoff of 78 days, Mohawks left their strongholds and walked into Oka Village as a defiant act of protest. They were then "contained" by Canadian soldiers with bayonets and eventually taken in busloads to a Farnham military base south of Montreal – men, women and children – all to face the hospitality of a hardly compassionate system.

RESISTANCE

Protests like these often ending in bloodshed, have been carried out all over America on countless occasions and they continue just as frequently today, well after the "end to Indian resistance" with the last tribes penned up in reservations. In 1969, Native Americans occupied the island of Alcatraz for two years to draw international attention to their plight. In 1971, members of the American Indian Movement (AIM) organised a march on Washington where they occupied and destroyed offices at the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and in 1973 the famous occupation of Wounded Knee Village (where a massacre of 350 Sioux was carried out by U.S. soldiers and were consequently surrounded for 72 days by the police and military.

Whether it be against nuclear plants, hydro-electric dams, uranium mining, casinos and drug/alcohol dealing – all of which have been established on Indian reservations throughout North America against both the will of the Indians and most of the neighbouring white community – American Indians and their white supporters have fought strong and hard, and will continue to do so as long as the international system of vicious capitalism operates which shrouds all our lives. This system is in contradiction to what Indian societies have to offer. Although the North American tribes all possess widely differing cultures, rich in all aspects but peculiar to each individual community – they share a common philosophy regarding existence that helps and encourages those of us who fight against a terrible system. We can learn from these philosophies whose starting point is the perspective that reveres the land and all fellow beings (human and animal alike) the mountains, rivers, trees and sky. The mass destruction of people when greed and profit have become priorities must be inevitable unless there is a continual fight against capitalism. The principles behind traditional Native American living can only spur on that fight – principles that were known before corrupt and ugly class systems took hold.



"The Great Chief in Washington sends word that he wishes to buy our land.

How can you buy or sell the sky, the warmth of the land? The idea is strange to us.

contd. p. 7

Ecology and Survivalism

THE TERM "SURVIVALISM" usually refers to people going out into the wilds and living through a nuclear war or similar catastrophe by using their survival skills. However, in recent years the term has taken on a new meaning.

Survivalism is capitalism's response to the growth in concern and awareness of environmental issues. Ecology, once seen as a marginal concern, has, at the level of appearances, been taken to the heart of capitalism. Why is this?

The present ecological crisis is the inheritance of centuries of tyranny and exploitation in which the mass of humanity, as workers, peasants, slaves and soldiers, have been used by a small elite as mere tools in the accumulation of wealth. In the process the eco-systems of the planet have been torn apart to meet the demands of a system based on the endless pursuit of profit and power in which natural resources are simply there to be exploited. Used as commodities they are bought, sold and used up.

Undermine

A growing awareness of ecology seen from this perspective could have the potential to undermine the acceptance of a society founded upon hierarchy and exploitation. This is why capitalism needs to be seen to be embracing ecological ideas. In doing so it is able to redefine the ecological problem in terms which pose no threat to its existence and actually increase its strength.

Through the media, consumerism and politics, the ecological problem is phrased as one of survival within the capitalist system rather than a transcendence of that system. In the rhetoric of survivalism we are all responsible, regardless of class, race or gender, for environmental problems and must all "do our bit for the environment".

Operating in a similar way to nationalism, survivalism masks social differences in an attempt to create a false social unity in the pursuit of shared interests. Through the media we are constantly sent the message that it is our unquestionable duty to be Green. We all have a role to play to ensure the survival of the planet. And what is that role for the working class? The same old shit – work, consume and vote.

Commodity

For the consumer, ecology itself has been turned into a commodity to be bought from the supermarket shelf. As a marketing tool it makes offers of "10% More!" or "Buy 2 get 1 free!" pale in comparison to the prospect of saving the planet by buying "Ozone Friendly" hairspray.

At the next general election we can look forward to the spectacle of the major parties trying to prove how Green they are, how the environment is safe only in their hands. It is a sick joke that the same parties will also be arguing that they will be best at competing with other industrialised nations and increasing productivity. There are even those within the Green Party who welcome this Green window-dressing since, they argue, they force the other parties to adopt environmental policies to avoid losing voters to the Green Party.

Apart from the fact that leaving the environment to governments and multinational corporations is "like leaving a child batterer to look after the nursery", voting for Green policies to be carried out by the state is a thoroughly disempowering act which does a lot to bolster the strength of the state and little, if anything, to protect the environment.

The basic purpose of survivalism is to hide the social, political and historical causes of the ecological problem and to incorporate environmental awareness into its own economic logic.

Explicit

As anarchists, in our propaganda, we should make explicit the real causes of the environmental problems we face. However, we should not argue solely on the basis that revolutionary change is the only alternative to ecological disaster but also talk of what action people can take here and now.

We should also make it clear that for us survival in itself is not enough. We aim for the complete transcendence of capitalist society and all forms of domination and exploitation and for a society in which production is geared toward genuine need and produce freely distributed. In such a society we would be free of the alienating boredom and drudgery of work, competition and consumerism.

MOHAWKS contd.

If we do not own the freshness of the air and the sparkle of the water, how can you buy them?

Every part of this earth is sacred to my people. Every shining pine needle, every sandy shore, every mist in the dark woods, every clearing and humming insect is holy in the memory and experience of my people. The sap which courses through the trees carries the memories of the red man.

We are part of the earth and it is part of us. The perfumed flowers are our sisters: the deer, the horse, the great eagle, these are our brothers. The rocky crests, the juices in the meadows, the body heat of the pony – all belong to the same family.

All things are connected.

You must teach your children that the ground beneath their feet is the ashes of our grandfathers. So that they will respect the land, tell your children that the earth is rich with the lives of our kin. Teach your children what we have taught our children, that the earth is our mother. Whatever befalls the earth, befalls the sons of the earth. If men spit upon the ground they spit upon themselves. Continue to contaminate your bed and you will one night suffocate in your own waste".

ANC-New Bosses

The level of corruption, brutality and bureaucracy within the ranks of the African National Congress and its armed wing the Umkhonto we Sizwe (Spear of the Nation) point to what the black working class of South Africa have in store for them once the ANC assumes power.

The ANC has constantly attempted to monopolise the struggle against the apartheid regime since the fifties, seeking to marginalise and belittle its rivals, the Pan African Congress (PAC) and the Azanian Peoples Organisation (AZAPO). Its mixture of old-style African nationalist politics with a good dose of Stalinism from the ranks of the South African Communist Party make a most unappetising cocktail for the poor and dispossessed.

Young

Many young working class blacks identified with the armed struggle of the ANC against the Boer regime. This was particularly so after the Soweto uprising of 1976, when many high school students and apprentices fled into exile to join Umkhonto.

But instead of armed struggle against the Afrikaaner state, units of these young people were employed as auxiliaries by nationalist groups in other countries, in particular in ZAPU's struggle against the white Rhodesian regime, where heavy casualties were inflicted on them. It is also alleged that they were used against the rival nationalist organisation ZANU, which was not a Soviet client.

Those who survived the campaign complained that their equipment was inadequate, their AK47 rifles having no firing pins and their grenades no detonator fuses. And they could not help comparing their conditions and their equipment with the lifestyles of ANC leaders who were making money smuggling mandrax to South Africa and selling prestige cars in Zambia delivered by car thieves from Johannesburg. This indignation against the leadership reached its climax when Oliver Tambo, President of the ANC, ordered all the "1976" militants to be trained in East Germany before being sent to help the MPLA regime in Angola against its UNITA rival.

Bleeding

These units, the 16 June Brigade, named after the first day of the Soweto uprising, were told by Tambo that "we have to bleed a little for the Angolans" – "we" that is "you". Eventually dissatisfaction came to a head with the mutiny in the Umkhonto camps in early 1984 in Angola. Fighting broke out, the Umkhonto militants demanded an end to fighting UNITA, and transfer of all their forces to fighting the South African regime. They also demanded the immediate suspension of the ANC security apparatus, as well as an investigation of its activities and of the prison camp Quatro, known as "Buchenwald". At the advice of Chris Hani, the commissar of Umkhonto, and also a Politburo member of the South African Communist Party, they formed a committee of 10 to present their grievances to the ANC leadership. This committee negotiated the surrender of arms of both the mutineers and of Mbokodo, the security apparatus that had been trained by the KGB.

Surrender

After the surrender a detachment led by Hani and Joe Modise, an Umkhonto commander and seen as one of those involved in corrupt financial ventures, swept into the camp at Viana and began arresting those involved in the mutiny. One of those arrested, an Umkhonto veteran, Mwezi Twala, was shot in the back. He recovered and was sent to a labour camp in Angola, where during the course of detention he witnessed the torture and murder of hundreds of Umkhonto militants. He is now among those in hiding in South Africa who have borne witness against these atrocities, and have put their stories on videos which are being distributed in the townships.

Mandela United

What went on in the military camps and prisons of the ANC is directly related to the necklace killings used by the ANC in South Africa, first of all in the 1984-6 uprising, against informers and police agents, but now increasingly against opposition groups like AZAPO. And it is directly related to the recent trial of Winnie Mandela and her Mandela United Football Team. This group of thugs acted in exactly the same way as the Mbokodo. They used Winnie Mandela's house in Soweto as a base to police the township, and among their activities was the torture and murder of 14 year old Stompie Moeketsei Seipei, a township activist. Among the things that Stompie was accused of were homosexual relations with a white clergyman. South African homosexuals have taken note of these attitudes within the ANC. The Gay and Lesbian Organisation of the Witwatersrand (GLOW) noted that Winnie Mandela's defence said that youths had not been kidnapped by her thugs but had been taken to her house to be protected from sexual abuse by the clergyman. In a letter to the National Executive Committee of the ANC they drew attention to the disturbing level of homophobia raised by the defence and stated that the ANC had failed to respond to it, even though it was supposedly committed to gay and lesbian rights in a draft bill of rights.

Derided

Leaders of the Mass Democratic Movement publicly expressed their disquiet at Winnie Mandela's "obvious complicity" in the kidnaps and murder. Her house in Soweto is a palatial residence. Her daughter Zinzi is derided in Soweto as a "kugel" an insulting term applied to the wealthy, well-dressed young white women of the Johannesburg suburbs. Township dwellers have burnt down her previous luxurious home in disgust. Many in the townships have no illusions in Winnie Mandela,similarly many of those grassroots activists in the workplaces and townships are aware of the sell- outs engineered by Nelson Mandela and by Joe Slovo, General Secretary of the SACP.

The Afrikaaner regime shows blatant hypocrisy in putting Winnie Mandela on trial when it has so much blood on its own hands. This should not distract us from the fact that what is taking place in the ANC bodes ill for the South African working class. Already we have had the exposure of the purges carried out in Namibia by SWAPO against dissidents in its own ranks, some of whom were imprisoned in pits. The new SWAPO government has now appointed several leading South African policemen, including the ex-chief of poice in the Ovambo region, to head its own secret police. Similarly Dirk Coetzee, head of the South African government's assasination team has been welcomed into the ANC. Modise and Hani are seeking the integration of certain Umkhonto members into the South African army and police.

Fix

The ANC and SACP apparatuses are preparing to "fix" the set-up in South Africa with sections of the white ruling class, in particular the industrialists like AngloAmerican which dominates the private sector and owns 70% of the country's mining capital. In the past the ANC denounced AngloAmerican as the enemy. Now they are sitting down, all smiles, at the same table, to discuss the future.

The ANC is a government in waiting. Those in its political and military command structures are preparing to take up positions of privilege in a "new" South Africa, in alliance with the developing black capitalists, small businessmen and professionals. The SACP has already coopted the leaderships of the black unions, previously independent. One of these, Moses Mayekiso, darling of British Trotskyists like the SWP, is now a SACP member. These union leaderships will engineer the "new deal" for the sake of capitalist profitability. This future profitability will mean the crushing of workplace and township self-organisation and militancy. As a pamphlet on the ANC mutiny noted: "The ANC prison system combined the worst of South African and of Russian conditions fused together, and it is this new social type-as a refinement and augmentation of each-that is now offered to the people of South Africa as the symbol of freedom".

Denounce

We anarchist communists will always grasp the hand of the oppressed, will always denounce all those who exploit and butcher the working masses, whether they govern now or are governments and ruling classes in waiting. We do not have any starry-eyed illusions in thinking that any nationalist or national liberation organisation can bring a juster society, even if they cloak it in so-called socialist rhetoric. Remember the Khmer Rouge, feted by many in the European extreme left. Remember the blind eyes turned on the barbarism of Stalinism, by those in the West, both intellectuals and workers, who somehow thought that communism had been achieved in Eastern Europe and China. We are deeply saddened by the way noble young working class people, the class of 76, have been used and abused by the ANC apparatus. We will continue to argue for a just, genuine communist system, that is, anarchist communism.

Imperialism and the Kurds

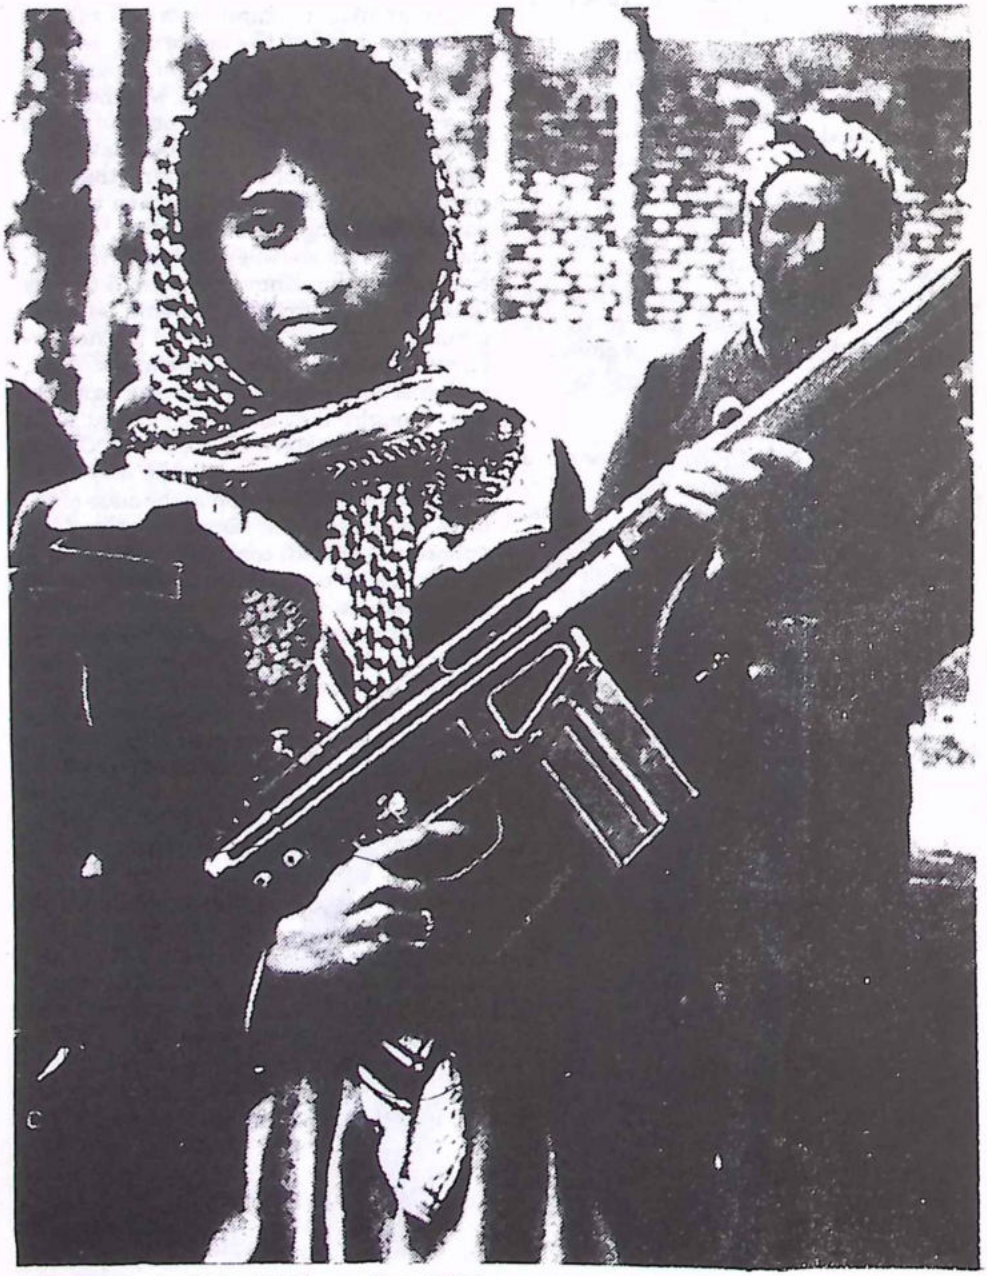
WHEN THE RULING class starts showing "solidarity with oppressed people" to the extent that their plight reaches the front page of the Daily Mail, we as anarchist-communists should smell a rat. Humanitarianism is not part of the ruling class' ideology – remember their humanitarian concern for the "people of Kuwait" and what that led to?

The concern of the ruling class for the Kurdish people proves a number of things. Firstly, that the propaganda war against Iraq is not yet over. The ruling class selectively choose to care about the Kurds because they can be identified as separate from other Iraqis, meanwhile the whole of Iraq is under martial law, the whole Iraqi population lives in fear for their lives.

Imperialism has often used a cover of "concern for oppressed people" to hide their real goals. Care for Jews after World War Two led to the establishment of a permanent imperialist base in the Middle East (Zionist Israel) at the expense of the Palestinians. Imperialists again and again use "oppressed people" as an excuse to wage wars. Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait for the Palestinians. The Allies invaded Kuwait and Iraq for the Kuwaitis – but the expansionist aims of imperialism are always laid bare.

"Oppressed people" have also been regularly used to fight wars; armed, supported and then dropped by ruling classes when their own imperialist aims are satisfied. For example, in 1972 the Kurds were armed by the USA to fight Iraq for the Shah of Iran, in 1975 their cause was dropped, supplies cut off and 35,000 died in Iraq.

At the start of the Kurdish and Shi'a uprisings in Iraq it was obvious the world's ruling class did not want them to succeed, the Iranian and Turkish borders remained closed stopping supplies vital to the insurrectionaries. At present it is obvious that the Allies, Turkey and Iran would rather see a weak Ba'athist Iraq than a Kurdish state. However, that is not to say that an independent "Kurdistan" could not arise out of the present crisis, the amount of coverage their "plight" is being allowed to have suggests this.



Learning Lessons

But Kurdish working people should know better than to ask the Allies and the world ruling class for assistance, their own history, and the history of imperialism in the region should convince them of that. If a Kurdish state is allowed to grow in the Middle East it will be on imperialism's terms, as an imperialist base between Syria, Iran and Iraq three of the most powerful and potentially unruly Middle Eastern states, and of course, next to the ever loyal servant of the West; Turkey. This "success" for Kurdish national liberation will not be celebrated by anarchist communists.

As anarchist-communists we should not ignore the plight of the Kurds, but we should not succumb to the pathetic Kurdish fetishism of the left. We recognise that all the working peoples of the Middle East are oppressed, in Iraq, in Lebanon, in Egypt...the creation of a new state, further dividing the Middle Eastern masses will not solve a thing.

National Liberation

The failure of the Kurdish revolt against Saddam Hussein illustrates the inevitable political and military flaws in national liberation struggles. Despite the rhetoric, the revolt remained purely national, no attempt was made to push into non- Kurdish areas of Iraq to challenge Saddam Hussein's power there. The struggle was not generalized, Arabs living in the new "Free Kurdistan" were kicked out by the Peshmergas and sent south – anyone speaking Arabic rather than Kurdish was under immediate suspicion of being a Ba'athist spy.

The Kurdish leaders seemed happy to simply wait for the United Nations to recognise their state and despite their military and strategic strength they left Saddam Hussein time to reorganise, re-group and crush them.

Now they seem to be coming to an agreement with Saddam where they will share power with him and where the Peshmerga guerillas will disarm and be merged with the Iraqi army.

Class Country

The Kurdish leaders are not interested in the well-being of the mass of the Kurdish people, the workers and peasants. They wish to construct a Kurdish state and to improve the power and bargaining strength of their own class, the bourgeoisie. They will use the Peshmergas as their police, to crush any sign of discontent amongst the Kurdish masses. In talking about a deal with Saddam, they show they are prepared to aid and indeed to be incorporated into the Iraqi state set-up of the military and national bourgeoisie and that they are part of the same class, the class of rulers and oppressors.

INTERVIEW WITH IRAQI EXILE

ORGANISE!* What are the main political groups in Iraq?

The Kurdish Democratic Party were set up as a feudal party in 1946. The Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) are a nationalistic party who have support among Kurds, especially in Sulaymanyah and Arbil; they claim to be building a party based on Marxist-Leninist ideology. They started a guerilla armed struggle in 1961 to crush the unity of the Arab-Kurdish working class struggle in Iraq officially "represented" by the Communist Party.

The Communist Party is traditionally the strongest party. Stalinist from the beginning, it is "anti-imperialist", for social reforms such as land for peasants, better wages for workers and more participation for women. It has large support especially in Baghdad, Arbil, Kirkuk, and the south of Iraq. In the 1958 uprising they successfully channelled the people's demands for a purge of the police and armed forces and weapons for popular armed struggle. The CP told them to tone down their demands and support the "progressive" provisional government of Abdul Karim Kasim. There was a revolution in the streets but the government was left untouched: the military and bureaucratic machine was left untouched. In the 1963 coup many active CP members and leftwingers were slaughtered. As in Allende's Chile the CP fostered illusions in a "radical" government rather than working class self-organisation, with the same bloody consequences. This is the price people always have to pay for following Marxist-Leninist parties.

ORGANISE!* What about the Kurds and the present revolt.

It is a mistake to talk of the "Kurds", as nationalist mystification – there is a Kurdish working class and a Kurdish ruling class – another flag, another seat in the United Nations is not progress. The ruling class want the working class to be divided nationalistically as Kurds, Arabs etc. People should have their own evolving culture – language, music, literature, etc. – but not use it to suppress other cultures and races through building nationalism and the State around it. During the Iran-Iraq and Gulf Wars, Iraqi soldiers fought other Arabs, this is contrary to the Arab nationalist ideology of the ruling Ba'athist Party. As a result Ba'athist ideology has collapsed, leaving a vacuum which the opposition parties are eager to fill. The Iraqi bourgeoisie are siding with the revolt for their own advantage: the economy has been crippled by the war and international sanctions, and the working class and poor don't have money to buy things. The Ba'athists can't revive the economy, so, like the U.S. they want to remove Saddam without breaking up the Iraqi state. Unfortunately most people still believe in the "need" for leaders and parties, even during uprisings.

ORGANISE!* What is the role and influence of religion?

60% of the population are Shi'ite: it is the dominant religion in Iran, which Saddam uses to say that the revolt in the south was made by outsiders. The rest of Iraq is Sunni, including the Kurds. There are also 1 million Christians. Most of the high-ups in the military and government are Sunni, which is the dominant religion of Islam covering Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Pakistan. Sadun Hamadi, a Shi'ite, was made Prime Minister after the Gulf War to placate Shi'ite people. The government uses religion to divide and rule. The media worldwide have characterised the revolt in the south as religious – Shi'ite versus Sunni and in the north as nationalistic, Kurds versus Arabs.

ORGANISE!* What is the make-up of the Iraqi economy?

Iraq is rich in agriculture., there are 2 big rivers, the Euphrates and the Tigris, and the land is very fertile. Prior to Genghis Khan's murderous regime it supported a population of 40 million people – current population is 16 million. Now most people are concentrated in cities. The agricultural economy has been almost totally destroyed in favour of oil, 90% of the national income. In the 1950s Iraq had an agricultural surplus and exported food. Now virtually all food requirements need to be imported. Oil is swapped for arms, food and machinery. The countryside no longer exists – in the 1980s 4,000 villages were razed to the ground and the population were forced to go to the cities where there were few jobs. As a result many joined the "security" forces or government guerilla mercenaries through economic conscription.

ORGANISE!* What were the causes of the Gulf War?

The Iraqi army is very powerful due to its historical role in repressing the working class and poor. It has provided a big market for arms manufacturers. Iraq has been the world's largest importer of arms over the last five years, 1984-1988, accounting for over 9%-$16 billion of the $174 billion spent by countries.

The worldwide economic recession was also a cause – military spending is a crucial part of the American economy. The Gulf War revamped a sector undermined and threatened by the end of the Cold War. There is increasing evidence that the U.S. planned the war months before Kuwait was a twinkle in Saddam's eye. In the summer of 1990 detailed war plans were drawn up by the U.S. military and Bush advised a meeting of top U.S. businessmen to delay investing in the area.

The Gulf War commemorations – like all others – are to remind poor people all over the world what the future will hold. They are to glorify war and the nation state rather than the bitter reality that poor people live and die as slaves.

THE 75th ANNIVERSARY of the Easter Rising saw little "official" celebration in Ireland this year. It's no surprise of course to see the Fianna Fail-Progressive Democrat Government try to distance themselves from the celebrations as much as was decently possible. After all they could hold no desire to remember the fact that their constitutional state has its roots in a very unconstitutional armed insurrection.

Sinn Fein and the Republican Movement however did mobilise nationally to commemorate the "blood sacrifice" of 1916, a milestone in the political heritage they legitimately claim as their own. But what do anarchist communists have to say about all this? Do we, like Sinn Fein, consider the "call of 1916" to be the challenge of today?

Insurgents

First we must look at the nature and objectives of the Easter insurgents. The rising was led by the middle class nationalists of the Irish Republican Brotherhood and Irish Volunteers, supported by some smaller groupings, notably the Irish Citizens Army, a workers' militia originally formed to defend strikers in struggle with Dublin's intransigent bosses in the 1913 lock-out, a struggle which, not surprisingly, received no support from the Nationalist movement.

Their aim, stated in their "proclamation" to the people of Ireland, was the creation of a "sovereign independent state", an Irish republic. The proclamation declared the right of the Irish people to the ownership of Ireland and resolved to "pursue the happiness and prosperity of the whole nation". Civil and religious liberty, equal rights and opportunities for all citizens! Pretty much the slogans of all bourgeois republican revolutions since 1789.

Capitalism

But are we just being too cynical perhaps? No. Just look at the actions of the First Dail, Sinn Fein's colours were exposed in their determination to create and maintain an independent sovereign Irish capitalism and to defend the power of the native boss class, as we shall show later.

Of today's IRA claim to be "the same now as then" – we agree. The rebels of 1916 represented not the proletarian movement but the petit-bourgeoisie. Then as now the foot soldiers of this republican movement are working class.

Connolly

But what of the presence of the Irish Citizen Army and the socialist James Connolly? Didn't their involvement give the uprising a proletarian aspect? Sinn Fein have certainly emphasised the Connolly/I.C.A. involvement, a reflection of their socialist pretensions. An Phoblacht/Republican News (March 28th) features an article 'James Connolly – The Practical Visionary' which attempts to explain Connolly's decision to line up beside the Nationalists. It is argued that rather than abandoning his socialism in order to join the uprising, this was a tactic he employed in order to put socialism on the agenda in the proposed Democratic Republic. There is certainly evidence to support this argument, not least Connolly's advice that the I.C.A. hold onto their guns in the event of victory.

A Myth Exploded

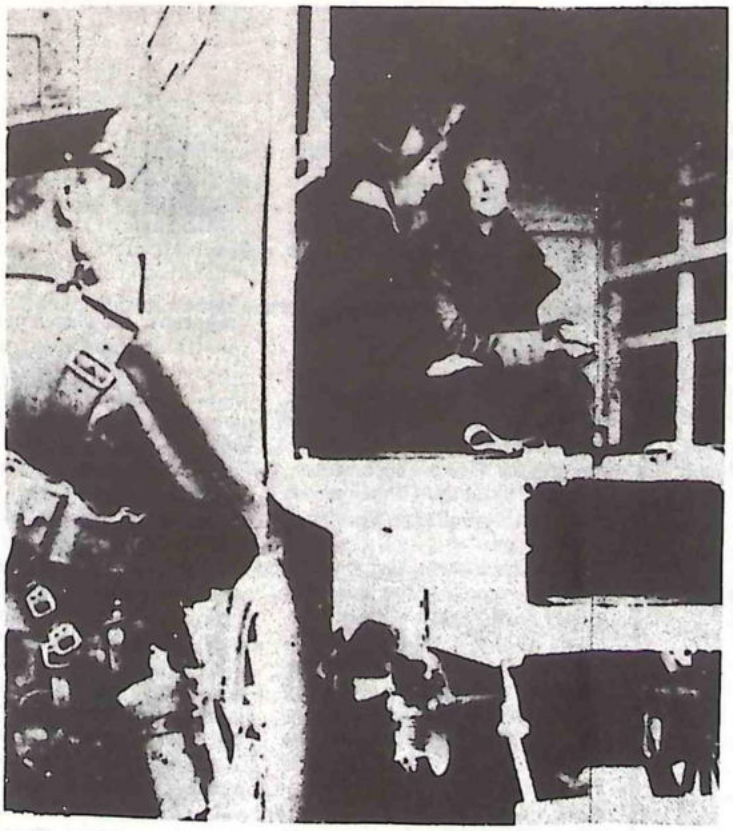
Irish Citizen Army

Weakness

However, if this was his belief then history has proven him wrong, very wrong. Just before his barbaric execution Connolly is reported to have said "The socialists will never understand why I am here". Indeed, we do not need to scapegoat Connolly, his leading of the I.C.A. into a cross-class alliance was a product of the weaknesses of the Irish Socialist Movement. Not least its tendency to be swayed by charismatic leaders but also its failure to maintain a revolutionary class perspective.

Soviets

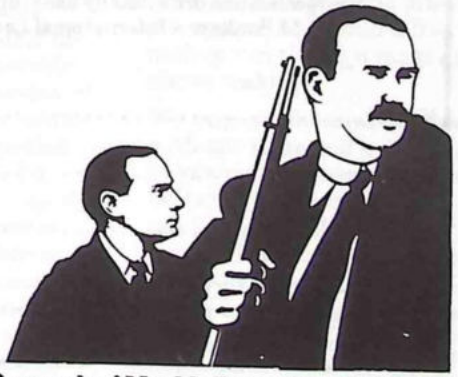
Rather than Easter 1916, anarchist communists look to the class struggle which swept Ireland from 1916-22 for inspiration. The same An Phoblacht article talks approvingly of this revolutionary wave, usually ignored by republicans and revisionists alike. This period of immense struggle saw the seizure of land, general strikes in many localities, soviets formed in Limerick and Cork, workers taking control of their workplaces and raising the red flag of socialism across the south. The article fails to mention, however, the role of the I.R.A. in smashing the Quarterstown Mills Soviet occupation, or the Sinn Fein land courts handing land seized in Co. Wexford back to the big land owners, or of the heroine of 1916 the Countess Markiewicz' warnings against "the imminence of social revolution". It wouldn't sit too well with their socialism we fear.



MARKIEWICZ being taken to jail

Revolution

But it's just that kind of social revolution that must be fought for in Ireland, north and south, today. A fight against all bosses, foreign or native and all states, no matter what flag flies above their prisons. The challenge of 1916 must be to learn that the working class has no allies, in any section of the boss class, no matter how radical their rhetoric. Let's rise to that challenge – the fight for a free communist Ireland!



Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class.

We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism.

The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours.

The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

Join us!

With the crisis of Leninism, the continuing disillusionment with the Labour Party and the increasing parliamentary greyness of the greens, revolutionary anarchist ideas are more relevant and necessary.

There has been increasing interest in anarchist ideas and growth in groups recently since the anti-poll tax battles outside the town halls and the Trafalgar Square victory. Similarly, the growth of the anarchist movement in countries like Poland, Germany, Greece and Bulgaria have attracted attention. Many people are now searching for a set of ideas that challenges the present obscene system of exploitation and does not think that outside the market and state controlled economies there are no alternatives. We urge all those who are seriously seeking a revolutionary alternative to consider the ideas of anarchist communism and to join us in the fight for a just, sane and free society.

Building

There has been an increase in the number of those who describe themselves as class struggle anarchists. Unfortunately, many do not look beyond their own back-yard. They think that the building of a local group is sufficient and fail to see the need for an effective united organisation on a national level, one that would reverse the trend of isolation and dispersed practice,one that would begin to offer a credible alternative to the miserable hierarchical vanguardist outfits that pose as revolutionary. Such an organisation would begin to make its presence known through the establishment of international links, and effective propaganda and action, whilst developing its theory in a lively dynamic way in interaction with practice. We don't claim to be that organisation, but we have that goal in mind.

The ACF works towards a social revolution, not to seize power itself, but participating in a revolutionary process as working class people, to assist the class as a whole to destroy the present system and build a free society run through mass decision making.

We urge all those who agree with our aims and principles to join our organisation, the better to take part in this coming about. Write to our national address for details. Apply for membership now. We've been on the defensive for too long – let's build a mass movement that goes on the attack!

BANGLADESH

Bangladesh has once again hit the headlines with the recent cyclone. Over 125,000 people have lost their lives and 10 million people are homeless. Cyclones are not new to Bangladesh; there were 37 such cyclones between 1960-1981 with 386,200 killed. In 1974, Bangladesh was at the centre of media attention when famine killed an unofficially estimated 1 million people.

These events, helped by the presentation in the media, lead people to believe that Bangladesh is naturally prone to such disasters. Many in the West have grown accustomed to see large death figures associated with Bangladesh and either ignore it or put the relief agencies into operation yet again and appeal for aid for the "poor victims". However Bangladesh is not, in fact, the only country in the world to experience cyclones. The U.S.A.,Caribbean and the Pacific all have regular storms which are a feature of the tropics. The difference is in the amount of lives lost. The Philippines had 39 cyclones between 1960 and 1981 but had only 5,650 dead. In Darwin, Australia only 49 people died in a similar cyclone to the one in Bangladesh.

Poor

The Philippines has a longer coastline than Bangladesh, but it is well-protected by reefs, mangroves and trees. Bangladesh's coastline is not so protected because of deforestation and erosion. Poor peasants have chopped down the trees both on the plains and up in the Himalayas in their desperation to make a living in a system where much of their crop is given to absentee landlords.

The result is an exposed flood plain that is defenceless against cyclones coming in from the ocean and floods descending from the mountains. The peasants do not have the means to build elaborate flood protection devices and do not want to leave the cyclone-prone areas because there is nothing for them anywhere else.

Cyclone

The Philippines and Australia are countries with a more highly developed infrastructure. The Philippines have better communications, an early warning system and a community help organisation. In Darwin,the emergency service was able to evacuate almost the entire population before the cyclone hit. Therefore the richer the country, the better able it is to save lives. The same applies when examining who actually dies within a country. In general, the poorer the people, the more likely they are to be the victims.

In La Paz, Mexico most of the 1976 cyclone victims lived in the shanty towns outside the city. Poor people are less likely to have protection, to be warned or evacuated in the event of an emergency.

Usual

The usual appeals have been made for relief aid. The rich pat themselves on the back because of their great "generosity". But there are several questions to be asked in relation to this relief aid. Firstly, the media gives the impression that disaster victims are helplessly waiting for the West to come to their aid. In fact, local people quickly organise themselves, to help each other survive and to rebuild. It is the victims who do most of the work and who bear the expense. Aid agencies often do not know the local conditions and provide totally inappropriate aid.

For example, pork sausages were sent to the Moslem Kurds, tea, tissues and tampax were provided by one British charity, and the EEC once sent powdered milk to a place where cows were plentiful but where there was no water.

These may be unintentional errors but aid is also a political weapon used much more cynically. Certain countries are more likely to receive aid than others. In 1973, the USA sent $2.2 billion in relief to Israel during the Yom Kippur war, but only $130 million to help the countries in the Sahel famine.

Protection

In the same period a not so pro-American leftist government in Bangladesh clashed with the USA over food and in the year preceding the 1974 famine, food aid dropped by 83%. The USA insisted that Bangladesh stop exporting jute to Cuba and allow for more private sector investment. While negotiations were going on, people were dying in famines and floods. The government of Bangladesh soon gave in to the US demands.

Saudi Arabia is providing $100 million of the $137 million in aid so far collected for Bangladesh. Their "generosity" was justified in terms of helping their "Moslem brothers". If the cyclone had hit Buddhist Thailand, the $100 million would not have been forthcoming.

Natural

Natural disasters like cyclones, earthquakes and volcano eruptions are not something that people can do away with. However, death and hardship could be avoided if protection of the environment and of the mass of the people were a priority. However the system that dominates the globe is able to mobilise vast resources for war and destruction but is unable to make more than a token effort to save thousands of people from death. It has no interest in doing so. In the Gulf War, oil and strategic and economic interests were worth both billions of dollars and thousands of lives.

The people dead in Bangladesh have no such value to the world's rulers. It is easy to dismiss what happened in Bangladesh as another natural disaster but the only real disaster is capitalism and we are all its victims.

ORGANISE!

ORGANISE! IS THE national magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF). Organise! is a quarterly theoretical journal published in order to develop anarchist communist ideas. It aims to give a clear anarchist viewpoint on contemporary issues, and initiate debates on areas not normally covered by agitational journals.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and others open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us to develop our ideas further.

Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! — as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree with our A&Ps at all.)

The next issue will be out in early January. The deadlines are November 16th for features and reviews, and November 30th for letters and news.

All contributions for the next issue should be sent to:

Iron Felix in the Scrapyard — Piggies Go to Market

THE RECENT FAILED coup in the Soviet Union was a final attempt by the Stalinist section of the ruling class to regain control. It ushered in the collapse of the empire which had been taken over lock, stock and barrel from Tsarism. It further opened the road to re-entry of the Eastern European bloc into the capitalist market.

The coup was sparked off by the increasing autonomy of the republics, to be made official by a treaty agreed by Gorbachev. Gorbachev's frantic manoeuvring led him into an alliance with Boris Yeltsin who represents an alternative section of the Russian ruling class, a section which wants to speed up entry into the market. For his part, Gorbachev wanted to hold together the Soviet Union and preserve the dominant role of the Communist Party, whilst granting some economic and political reforms. He attempted a balancing act between the two opposing sections of the Soviet ruling class.

Failure

The coup showed the extent to which this strategy has failed. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union, due to its implication in the coup was forced to be dissolved by Gorbachev. Many republics outlawed their local Communist Parties. Now Gorbachev is a political captive of the Yeltsin group, and will remain so, until he is made completely redundant by the continuing process of disintegration.

The coup failed because of the huge splits and confusion within the Soviet ruling class. This confusion showed itself in the lack of determination and decisiveness by the coup leaders. They failed to shoot Gorbachev immediately, they failed to round up opponents of their line like Yeltsin and Shevardnadze. They argued over what degree of repression they should use.

The confusion in the ranks of the bureaucrats was reflected in the ranks of the repressive apparatus of the State, the KGB, police, and army, with KGB commanders refusing to obey the orders of their superiors,and disaffection amongst the soldiers. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union was itself affected by this confusion. Gorbachev was held captive by those he had appointed to leading positions. His own deputy, Yanayev, was implicated, as was the Prime Minister, the Minister of the Defence, the Minister of the Interior and the chief of the KGB. They had talked with Gorbachev about imposing a state of emergency. Indeed, Gorbachev may have used the coup in an attempt to strengthen his own hand, an attempt which backfired. Yeltsin too, almost certainly knew about the preparation of the coup and deliberately delayed in taking action against the plotters, so that he could strengthen his hand by counting on popular indignation after any violence from them. He may have done a deal with the plotters so he could provoke them into action and profit from the repercussions.

Yeltsin is now in a dominant position. But if the Soviet working class have any illusions in him, they will soon be shattered. He is not their friend, he is a member of the same class that repressed and butchered workers for the last 70 years. He has often manoeuvred to support workers' action, like the miners' strike in March, to protect his own position from the Stalinist wing. This is purely tactical, as he is just as capable of demanding repressive action against strikes. He called for an end to the strikes after making a deal with Gorbachev and supported an anti-strike law. He used the threat of this law to head off a strike by Russian metal workers.

He and his allies, like Shevardnadze, (experienced in repression in Georgia) wish to change the way the bureaucratic ruling class operate. He wants a turn to the Western style of exploitation with local factory bosses as entrepreneurs. He is in a strong position now, but the result of this will not be better times for the working class but increased unemployment, exploitation and repression. He is supported by many factory managers ready to make the change to the market as well as by the intellectuals, the media professionals and the leaders of the 'independent' unions.

The Yeltsin group hopes that this coalition of different strata will be able to head off any working class unrest. This remains to be seen. The regime of Romania used the miners to smash opposition, but now the miners have turned against it. The first signs of independent working class action in Eastern Europe may be a forerunner of a mass response to the horrors to be inflicted.

The failed coup threw the rotting Communist Parties in the West into even further disarray. Here in Britain the fragments of the once united Communist Party reacted in different ways. The EuroCommunists of the Communist Party of Great Britain, soon to transform itself into the Democratic Left, condemned the coup and supported Gorbachev. The rabid hard-liners of the New Communist Party cheered on the plotters saying that with Gorbachev's removal 'the morale of genuine communists and progressives throughout the world has risen'. But now the morale of these 'genuine' communists must now be at an all time low and their final death agony is much nearer. As for the Communist Party of Britain, their mouthpiece, the Morning Star, acted in its usual opportunistic way, calling the coup 'unconstitutional' whilst at the same time offering a weak criticism of Gorbachev. This was followed by a call for him to be reinstated. The CPB too will be torn by even greater internal crisis.

As for the Leninist left, the Trotskyists and others, that all rushed to distance Lenin from the growth of Stalinism, conveniently forgetting the repression that began almost immediately under the Bolsheviks. Somehow the founding of the secret police, the Cheka, the shooting and imprisonment of revolutionaries, the prison camps, the crushing of the Kronstadt revolt and the savage conditions imposed on workers and peasants was okay under Lenin but not under Stalin. They forget their 'materialist' analysis and imagine that Stalinism sprang from nowhere. With the collapse of the Stalinist monolith, the Trotskyists are scuttling to dodge any falling masonry.

The Socialist Workers Party in their paper Socialist Worker said that "Boris Yeltsin ...has courageously called a general strike. But workers cannot rely on him to stand firm". (24 August 1991) The man who had backed anti-strike laws was supported by the SWP! They argued that the working class should back the champion of the market against the plotters, that it should support one boss against another. In varying degrees this was the response of all the Trotskyists.

Hoax

Stalinism has fallen, but the working class of eastern Europe are facing the hoax of democracy. The collapse of the coup was not a triumph for working people as they stood on the sidelines, a small minority only answering Yeltsin's call for strike action. What they face now is speed-ups at work, layoffs, a rising cost of living and the butchery and dislocation that will come with the rise of the nationalist demagogues. The road ahead is dark, especially as many working people in Eastern Europe may be fooled for a time that democracy and the market will offer a better future.

It is up to us anarchist-communists, both in the West and in the East, to argue for the creation of a revolutionary alternative, a genuine communism which is based on free and collective decision- making and where production is based on need. This is anarchist-communism. A ray of light shines through the settling dust of the ruins of Stalinism — the anarchist-communist alternative. Those sincere people who have been misled by the various brands of Leninism should now seriously consider our ideas.

The Moral Crusade Continues

A MAJOR PART of the Conservative government's policies is the re-establishment of the old moral order and the sanctity of the family. They will be unable to reverse many of the great changes that have taken place in the last 30 years, but they hope to reverse some of the trends that developed from the '60s onwards when homosexuality came out of the closet. They have already passed the notorious Clause 28 introduced in 1989, and now they have Clause 25 in the new Criminal Justice Bill (published in November 1990) which they intend to enact.

Clause 28 affected the promotion of homosexuality via local councils, for example in books stocked by public libraries. Now Clause 25 will apply to sexual behaviour, attempting to police homosexual behaviour on three counts, with up to five years' imprisonment followed by five years' 'psychiatric supervision'. These three counts are:

1 Procuring of sexual acts, in other words letting two men use your spare room to commit a sexual act, or introducing two men to each other in a pub, club or at a party.

2 Indecency between men — this can be any homosexual affection in public, and could be interpreted as anything from cottaging, to kissing or holding hands.

3 Solicitation by a man — this could be interpreted as including exchanging telephone numbers, smiling, etc.

In addition to clause 25, paragraph 16 of the Children's Act guidelines was published in December 1990. This paragraph makes it impossible for lesbian or gay couples to adopt or foster children. Alongside this is an increase in the level of police harassment of gay men.

The Sexual Offences Act of 1967 was a 'liberalisation' of the attitudes of the State and ruling class towards homosexuality. It allowed for the existence of homosexuals as long as this was kept closeted. The growth of the lesbian and gay movements in the '70s led to a situation where many lesbians and gays refused to put up with this state of affairs.

Homosexuality has always existed and will continue to exist. With the rise of Christianity in Western Europe came condemnation but it was not until the rise of capitalism that it was singled out as a particular form of sexuality that was outside the norm. It was seen as a threat to the new social order and the family in particular. The rise of industry under capitalism destroyed the old forms of production. Labour was removed from the efforts of individual families and villages and concentrated in factories. A split developed between material production in these new workplaces and private labour performed mostly by women at home. Male supremacy which had long existed before capitalism, became an institutional part of capitalism. In the process the family was idealised and male workers were paid higher wages than women workers. The family became the place where the individual was valued, and the working class took on the ruling class ideal of the family as a utopian retreat from the horrors of life from the workplaces.

At the same time, the family became the place where workers were serviced and where capitalism could ensure it always had an adequate labour supply.

Homosexuality began to be attacked and castigated with the establishment of these new family forms. It was seen as a criticism of the family, of going against the 'norm' of the heterosexual family unit which acted as a prop for capitalism.

The new measures are intended to force lesbians and gays back into the closets, and to make their sexual activities 'criminal' once again.

The moral crusade has to be taken on by the revolutionary groups and of course by those directly affected by it. Unfortunately, the organisation of demonstrations and activity against the new legal provisions is dominated by the gay professionals and entrepreneurs of 'pink capitalism'. As we have seen, the repression of homosexuality is directly related to the class nature of this society. Any 'reforms' in the short term will always stand the risk of being taken away again. The most effective way for lesbian and gay liberation, in fact the only way in which real liberation can come, is through the recognition that this class society must be destroyed. Lesbian and gay liberation has to be linked to the general onslaught on capitalism, and taken out of the ghetto and away from the domination of the leaders of the gay 'alternative society'.

BCCI, AND OTHER HYPOCRITES

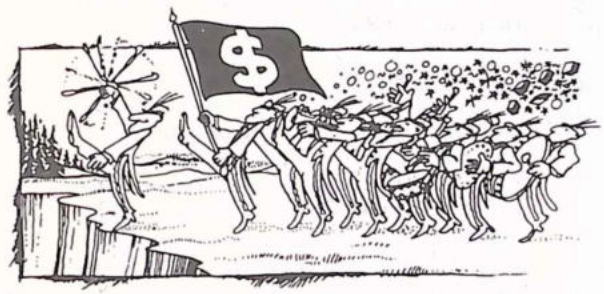
CAPITALISM IS LITTERED with the corpses of would-be gangs of supreme power-mongers. When an individual becomes so excessively wealthy and bloated with the obscenities of super-rich self-consumption, what else is there to do after all the executive toys have become tiresome? Sheikh Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, the 'government' of Abu Dhabi, is such an individual. Zayed's lapdogs created the Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) by imposing appalling wages and conditions upon thousands of immigrant workers who had come to the Middle East hoping for a better life. This thoroughly capitalist organisation was then encouraged to dance to capitalism's natural rhythm of fraud, money laundering, narcotics, extortion and bribery... the list goes on and on.

BCCI caught many hundreds of thousands of peasants and workers from Panama to Afghanistan, one way or the other, in a web of intricacy and intrigue. Hundreds of thousands have lost their only savings. In England, 35 councils saw 65 million pounds creamed from working class people go down the drain. Those more directly involved, the 53,000 holders of BCCI sterling accounts, will be rescued to the tune of no more than 15,000 pounds each. Without much doubt though, the Tories will concoct a financial package which will bail out the scum who lost much more. An election is looming and plenty of grateful and well-oiled friends will be needed. Bribery, after all, is an international characteristic of capitalism and always close to hand.

Of course an estimated US $20 billion of money being transferred between one gang of capitalist vultures to another does not go unnoticed in the world economy or, indeed, occur overnight. Evidence is mounting that for at least three years the Bank of England knew about the shady dealings of BCCI. Furthermore, in 1990, proof of BCCI's hidden agenda was discovered.

Good Boy Goes Bad

It was the discovery by the Americans that BCCI covertly owned the First American Bank that first revealed that BCCI had access to the potentially 'embarrassing' financial information contained within the accounts of many top officials in the major political and military establishments of the Bush administration. This ultimately led to BCCI's downfall. Furthermore, to the depraved ears of those who could hear the obscene sounds of the frenzied BCCI coupling with First American, this was purely ecstatic music. With this marriage of convenience BCCI's vast experience of making dirty money appear Persil white, twinned with First American's respectable establishment veneer, Abu Dhabi — a.k.a. Sheikh Zayed — saw the opportunity to establish a rival power base to challenge American hegemony.



The progression in time from allowing the privileged few access to preferential 'sweetheart' loans, to having tens of congressmen and generals dining on the graft from BCCI's pocket would not have been long. Whilst BCCI just got on with the 'normal' business of capitalist activity, (i.e. those listed above), it was ignored. BCCI methods were brutal and lacked finesse, but even so, did not present Western governments with too many difficulties or much of a threat. A blind eye was conveniently turned. Capitalism's assassins and henchmen, for the time being, were allowed to run amok, but would they turn upon the very ones who encouraged their existence? Yes, with the potential for dozens of America's high ranking officials to be in the pocket of the BCCI, all either blackmailed, corrupted or even just simply bought. Abu Dhabi had clearly signalled its higher intentions. The alarm bells between governments rang. It was decided that the rival power base, which BCCI represented, would have to be eliminated.

It is utter rubbish to suggest that Robin Leigh-Pemberton, governor of the Bank of England, did suddenly on the morning of the 5th of July, 1991 decide, all by himself, to save the world from BCCI. To suggest that this lackey may have had some independence and blown the whistle on BCCI before receiving, via the Tory machine, American instructions to do so, is the same as suggesting that, against all natural evidence, a jellyfish can grow a backbone. Leigh-Pemberton has been bought and paid for and must dance the dance of the corrupted. A total yes-man, he has, as a reward for his craveness, received this year from his Tory cohorts a £22,000 pay rise and an added bonus of £80,000 'compensation' for not growing grain on his 2,000 acre farm. The USA, as always finding England more than willing to do its international dirty work, nominated Leigh-Pemberton to be the bag-man for BCCI. It comes as little surprise, then, that at the investigational phase of Noreiga's indictment before the US courts, the records of the bank he liked to do massive business with are frozen and open to inspection. Could this be coincidence or convenience?

This sordid tale is one not dissimilar, at least in tactics, to that of the trojan horse. BCCI was a pretender to the throne, a 'third world' interloper. The battle between two sets of gangsters for ultimate power has been one by the present incumbent exploiters.

The Biggest Financial Fraud?

The biggest financial fraud is that fraud which considers it has the right to the economic control of millions of working class women and men — just because the exploiters own the means of production. The biggest social fraud is capitalism itself. Whilst the working class round the world is attacked, beaten and murdered every second of the day, capitalism plans redistribution of $20,000 billion — back into its own pockets!

The biggest political fraud is government. Within one form always lies the future of another and a guarantee that there will be no improvement for the working class. Neither the Majors of today nor the Noreigas of tomorrow are our friends.

As yesterday's and today's history drag humanity ever closer to the edge of the capitalist abyss, the choice before the world's working class becomes increasingly clear: Anarchist Communism or barbarism. There is no third way. Not until we reject all government, will real communism, anarchist communism, become a reality.

THOROUGHLY ROTTEN MILLIE

BEHIND THE FACADE of the Militant newspaper and its network of sellers, lies that most obscure and yet influential Trotskyist organisation, the Revolutionary Socialist League. Ever since this sect emerged inside the Labour Party under the influence of Ted Grant, it has kept its existence secret except to the initiated, which it recruits through the Labour Party branches, the Labour Party Young Socialists and the paper-selling network. For many years it remained a tiny grouping. Thanks to very hard and consistent work, and the departure of rival Trotskyist groups from the Labour Party, leaving it free to build its organisation without competition, it began to grow in the mid 70s. By 1980 it had just under 2000 members. In the heyday of Militant in 1986, thanks to the high profile of Derek Hatton and Tony Mulhearn it was able to boast of a membership of 8,000.

Liverpool

In Liverpool, Militant built up a powerbase and was able to count two Labour MPs amongst its membership, Dave Nellist in Coventry and Terry Fields in Liverpool. On Merseyside, Militant concentrated in taking over the district Labour Parties. When Derek Hatton was elected in 1979 there were only four Militant members as Labour councillors. Militant was able to increase this number considerably, and to gain control of the local party structure. In doing so they inherited and emulated the old system of patronage of Bessie and Jack Braddock, the right-wing Labourites who ran Liverpool as their fief, and developed support through 'jobs for the boys', in much the same manner as the U.S. Democratic Party in local government. Militant took on the old practices lock, stock and barrel. As Hatton admitted in his book, Inside Left, "People have accused me of handing out jobs to the boys. Of course we did. We wanted people around us who understood the plan, who were committed to it". Hatton was a high-flying careerist and wanted the post of council leader. The leadership of Militant refused to let him stand against John Hamilton, the group leader. They had become past masters at manipulation of structures, and reasoned that they controlled the council practically, and did not need the bad publicity of forcing Hamilton out. This illustrates their attitude to the Labour Party. Finally Hatton fell out with the leadership because he wanted to oppose the threatened disbandment of the District Labour Party by the Kinnock leadership in the winter of 1985-6. The Militant leadership of Grant, Peter Taaffe, and locally, Tony Mulhearn, argued against this, saying that such opposition to disbandment "would allow the right wing to separate some of the best left fighters from the Labour Party nationally". As it was, both Hatton and Mulhearn were expelled from Labour, and now 'our Degsie', denied his moment of glory, has gone on to male modelling and setting himself up as an entrepreneur, trading on his knowledge of council practice.

Grant and Taaffe at loggerheads

Militant's decision to run a candidate from the Broad Left as Real Labour in the Walton by-election shows the poverty of their analysis of, and strategy towards, the Labour Party. Even when forced to stand outside the official Labour structure they still choose to use the camouflage of Real Labour. In doing so they continue to perpetuate illusions in the Labour Party. Before the election they argued that even if they did not win, they would be happy if Leslie Mahmood received a substantial amount of votes. They were disappointed even in this.

Though they put themselves forward as a revolutionary grouping, all their actions only further the idea that Labour is somehow 'left-wing', 'socialist' or 'progressive'. They only strengthen the hoax of social-democracy. In their own book, Liverpool — A City that Dared to Fight, Taaffe and Mulhearn argued that their "achievements" in Liverpool Council "deepened support for Labour" leading to a "stunning victory" for Labour in the May 1986 local elections. In fact when Militant took over in May 1983, Labour had 47 per cent of the vote, dropping to 42 per cent in 1986. Even in terms of supporting Labour, they were a failure.

Any Labour Equals Real Fraud

Constant pressure from the Labour leadership has finally forced them to organise outside the Labour Party structure. But even here, their strategy is flawed. They will stand under the banner of Real Labour, continuing to hide the existence of the Revolutionary Socialist League, and continuing to further the myth that Labour is in any way a friend of the working class.

They have been a parasite inside the Labour Party for many years, and find it difficult to behave in a different way. Even at Walton there were severe problems. Terry Fields, one of their two MPs did not actually openly support Leslie Mahmood during the election, in line with being seen as a loyal Labour member. Now Militant is in total disarray, as Ted Grant, staunch partisan of remaining inside the Labour Party, finds himself in a minority on the central committee of Militant, and faces expulsion.

He is the second important Trotskyist leader to be spurned by his own creation, the first one being the corrupt, rapist, toad Gerry Healy.

Illusions

The majority appear to support a sort of Dr Dolittle PushMePullYou strategy of running for election under the banner of Real Labour in certain areas whilst continuing to work inside the Labour Party in other areas. Whatever they do, they still support the election of a Labour Government committed to 'socialism' which will nationalise the top companies. They are a brake on the development of a revolutionary movement in this country, with their peddling of illusions that somehow Labour can be won to socialism, that somehow nationalisation can be equated with any real change for the working class, that using the parliamentary process via electoralism can achieve revolutionary change. Hopefully their days are numbered. They are a parasite who may find it difficult to exist outside of the host body of Labour and may collapse. We look forward to that day.

CHILDREN: People or Property?

CHILDREN ARE THE only people who can be physically assaulted within the current legal set-up. Parents have the right to 'smack' their offspring and until fairly recently, teachers could dish out 'corporal punishment'. This alone should alert us to the fact that children are seen as something as less than fully human. Our society is actually awash with prejudice and discrimination against children. Hotels and restaurants may declare without irony that children and pets are not welcome.

In many ways our attitude towards children is similar to that of animals. On the one hand we sentimentalise over them yet on the other often humiliate, control and exploit them. True, in Britain at least, few children are engaged in full-time work and this must be preferable to the days when they were employed in coal mines and factories. But in giving them the now fashionable 'protected' status we enslave them. Like all protectorates the world of children is one of being controlled.

Derision

The language we use with reference to children indicate values which are synonymous with derision. Adults may be ridiculed as being 'childish' or 'infantile' and no-one respects the older child or adolescent who is a 'cry-baby'. Children have also been labelled as ego-centric, immature, lacking reason and logic and even of being anarchic(!!). Following from these characterisations adults often impose their will on children. They have to do things 'because we say so'.

One writer and childcare advisor, Judy Miller, has made a study of children of nursery age, and has found them to be quite capable and responsible. She found for example that four year olds could be compassionate and caring, skilful and safe in the use of woodworking tools and capable of logical thought. The problem often, is not with the children but of adults' perception of them as inadequate. This gives rise to negative stereotyping which in turn leads children to be treated unjustly. Judy Miller has coined the term 'adultism' to use when discussing these stereotypical views. Adultism is the assumption that adults are superior to children in every important respect.

On examination it is clear that adult behaviour is often far from perfect. How many adults can honestly deny that they have acted irrationally, stupidly, drunkenly or dishonestly in terms of human relationships? And isn't it adults in the guise of generals, politicians and capitalists who are fucking up the world and its populations?

Fictions

John Holt in his book Escape from Childhood has argued for giving children rights to protect them from arbitrary adult control. Whilst anarchist-communists would certainly question the whole idea of 'rights' as being liberal fictions, the realisation that children are fully human is an important one. His fundamentally reformist demands include; the right to equal treatment with adults under the law; the right to vote; to have financial independence and responsibility; to seek and choose guardians other than their parents. Most adults would reject these demands as silly or unrealisable. Despite the liberal character of the demands, they do point to the gross inequalities which are normally left unquestioned. To vote in elections is a waste of time for everyone, but why should children not be active in political struggle? For children to choose their own guardians may seem ridiculous but how many children are abused, neglected or fucked up by their natural or appointed ones? Children can't be trusted to handle their financial matters, it may be argued, but how many adults are in debt or have crippling overdrafts? As for equality before the law, it is a fiction in the adult world. Nevertheless, children often resent and reject the patronising and authoritarian law when it is applied to them.

Kropotkin

Many anarchists have been aware for decades of the potential of children and of the repressive and distorted environment in which they are brought up. Nevertheless a more conservative strand emanating from Kropotkin has survived as well. He argued that children 'naturally' depend on their parents who 'naturally' raise and control them within families. As children gain in years, Kropotkin argued, they will become increasingly independent until, at adolescence, 'children' openly challenge parental authority and ultimately break free.

Now while we cannot deny that babies and young children need safe, caring and supportive environments, there is little doubt that young children can survive independently of adult supervision. In the third world millions do so. Freedom from adults need not wait until adolescence; it should be available to children who demand it. When children are ready to take control of their own lives, we as anarchists should recognise and encourage them. We should take our propaganda into the schools. The bourgeoisie and the state will see this as corruption of youth and cry out abuse. However, comrades, the revolution is for children too. In South Africa it is interesting to note that it has been school children who have often been the most militant and uncompromising in the opposition to apartheid. They have an equal role in the revolution here!

This article has only touched on a few of the issues which relate to children. Other contributions are welcome.

NB. For Judy Miller's discussion on adultism etc. see the magazine Childright, March 1991.

A NEW WORLD

Anarchist Communism or Barbarism

This article is to form the first in a series concerning the trends in modern capitalism.

Introduction

It may seem that we have faced, over this past two years, the most momentous events that we are likely to face for the next ten. But I do not believe that to be so. The two major events — the Gulf War and the break up of the Soviet bloc — have only been steps along the way. Far more is at hand than actually meets the average eye. The phrase — The New World Order — is seen by Bush as a new Pax Americana, a new promised peace, security and wealth to be guaranteed by his military. What is on offer on the surface is the appearance of peace and prosperity, beneath is a reality of war of a different kind, not the old Cold War which was very much out in the open, but an economic war fought out of sight, but more importantly of course, the continuation of the class war on new ground.

THE BASIS OF THIS present and changing world order dates from the Second World War. Prior to the war the USA was entering another period of crisis similar to the depression of some years previous. The beginning of the war in Europe was the big chance for American capital to make its move. In the first two years the USA was given the opportunity to use its failing industrial capacity, by lend/lease etc., supplying all manner of goods to those engaged in war. Only in 1941 did the USA enter the war thus having two clear years of profit and preparation. The years up until the end of the war allowed a number of policies to be set up for the post-war period.

Stripped

The colonial powers were to be stripped of their exclusive markets and areas of investment. Thus the process of decolonisation was begun and a new era of neo-colonialism set in place. The old financial and trade order was to be reorganised by means of such things as the Bretton Woods agreement. The old gold standard was to be dropped and the dollar standard adopted for world currencies and trade. Thus one aspect of American financial hegemony was put in place. The creation of new world institutions were to complete the picture, the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs (GATT) was to supposedly remove the problems in world trade which had led to war, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank) was to give a framework for the reconstruction of those economies destroyed during the war. At the same time the International Monetary Fund (IMF) was to give credit and loans to help even the balance of differing economies. These institutions were dominated by the USA and could not avoid being used by those with the power within them to gain all manner of advantages. The institutions were to become like all other capitalist institutions as the means of exploiters to exploit, dividing the world, the 'Free World' and the rest.

Pax Americana

The Pax Americana was the concrete form of the Free World ideology, the USA being the policeman of the world, protector of those allied to it against its old ally, the Soviet Bloc, which had its own ideology and its own power interests at stake. This Free World ideology meant an American economy further perverted by its reliance upon military production to take up its spare capacity, the result being a military/industrial network throughout the USA. The further results of this, and the military/political paranoia that went with it were a series of wars fought away from the two super-powers but between their representatives. The most important of which was the Vietnam war, in actual fact involving Laos and Cambodia as well. Here the American ideology was in full swing, no neutrals allowed, there being only those for us and those against us.

By virtue of the Bretton Woods order the USA effectively had the rest of the world pay for the war by the use of the $ standard, the US government could print as many $ as it wished, borrow where it wanted, pay back when and if it wanted. Unfortunately it came to be that the US economy had only one major saleable commodity, arms, the rest of its industry having been neglected and starved. Of course, the US economy had other things to provide the world but it increasingly came to be that others were to take over where the USA had achieved so much in the immediate post-war era.

New

The new situation was this:

The world had been divided into two huge armed camps, a bi-polar world, with the USA leading one bloc, the Free World, an idea around which a whole ideology had been built up, stridently anti-communist, even to the point of seeing anyone not actively pro-american as communist or pro-communist, calling it 'the evil empire'.

A series of financial and trading institutions had been built up to order and organise the world market, itself in a sense denied the opposing bloc, and further dividing the world into two further opposing camps, the exploiting and the exploited.

This situation was to be further complicated by the emergence from the exploited nations of a new set of industrialised nations taking away from the old masters all manner of profitable industries.

Prior to this the old enemies of the war, Germany and Japan, had become major players in the world economy by virtue of the ways in which the victors had arranged the new rules. They did not have to spend in the same manner as the rest upon defence, they could concentrate upon making their capital super-competitive, but they remained essentially under the tutelage of the USA because of the division of the world politically.

From there being a whole range of political and economic players on the world scene pre-war, there was now essentially only two but there was a whole new vocabulary to the game:

Super-power, where the capacity for world destruction was in the hands of a very few.

Third world, poverty had been exposed, concentrated, intensified, institutionalised, continually recreated, poverty was becoming an absolute, there were the incredibly rich and the utterly poor.

The non-aligned, a category essentially denied by the Free World ideologists, there being communists, pro-communists and proto-communists.

THE END OF THE OLD WORLD ORDER

THIS INTERNATIONAL arrangement could not last for ever because it was based upon very shaky foundations. The focal point for the western bloc was a nation whose economy had been turned over to the continuous guardianship of an essentially paranoid idea. In addition the new forms of economics were to be based upon Keynesian lines: stopping underconsumption and overaccumulation.

That is, using credit and welfare payments to soak up as much of the production as possible which went unconsumed. This was to try to remove the basic cause of the crises of the past, hence IMF credit etc. The problem of some nations having a flood of profits, accumulating more than the world economy could stand was to be solved by using those excesses to finance the others via the IMF.

This was never to work because the strong economies had no interest in seeing their profits go to others, hence the US would not run the IMF on strict Keynesian lines but used it to its own advantage. Eventually it could only break down as it did. All of the old Bretton Woods agreements were to be abandoned as the US saw fit.

Command

The Eastern bloc of the USSR was run on command lines, a command economy and a command politics. Unfortunately for the inheritors of Stalin's mantle such a politics and economy has only so much capacity. The command economy could go only so far and then run out of steam, especially considering that it was beginning the race from miles behind. Command politics can only retain so much compliance, can exercise so much hegemony, and then without either a successful economy to bribe the working class or extremely intensive oppression cracks must appear.

From the very beginning Russia transformed into the USSR was going to be at a disadvantage. It was the weakest area of capital at the time of the First World War. It then had to endure the disruptions of conversion into a non-market capitalist economy and then destruction of the Second World War. It did not have the same technological pool as the West. Also it had the problems of its very size

Hackneyed Hacks

The following article was submitted by an anonymous reader. While we don't normally publish unsigned articles from non-members, we felt that at a time when state communism is in collapse and the Communist Party of Great Britain is hurriedly changing its name to Democratic Left it would be useful for purposes of debate as well as being valuable information.

I AM INTERESTED in revolutionary organisation. It's my belief that libertarian organisation forms the hub of the movement towards revolution. But to attract the calibre of revolutionary who has that fierce strength of inner resolve and determination required, we should be attempting to forge a movement that is so far removed from the preconceptions of 'ordinary' — read bourgeois — organisation that it is then seen and known to stand for a qualitatively different type of society. Anyway, as part of that I think it's important for libertarian communists to every now and again restate our organisational strengths. Hence, the article.

Authoritarian Communism

Authoritarian communism is a method of social organisation created by and made specifically for the social benefit of bureaucracies. It is a specialised but ideal vehicle for a body of ideology which seeks to justify the imposition of the world view of a cabal of intellectual and middle class totalitarians upon the working class. Its dogmatic and reactionary perceptions contribute nothing to the cause of working class freedom, but only have on offer a greater and harsher degree of exploitation. It has nothing at all in common with libertarian communism. A society of free and equal individuals acting without the constraints of the capitalist economy — whether that be state capitalist or socialist or otherwise — is what strikes real fear into the hearts of authoritarian communists. They would have no leverage and no way to make social privilege and to create hierarchy for themselves.

Contained below is an extract from a book published in 1952 entitled, The Communist Technique in Britain, written by Bob Darke, ex-'cadre leader' of the then Hackney branch of the British Communist Party.

"... The Hackney Borough Secretariat met once a week at this or that comrade's house. Thus did it save money and thus did it tie each comrade's private life more closely to the Party wheel. I have known Party members to sit in their own living room without protest while other members of the Secretariat ridiculed and censured their choice of furniture, curtains, books, newspapers, even toys for their children. The wife of the comrade in whose home the meeting took place may have taken part if she was a party member. If not, her place was in the kitchen making tea..."

The Party Line

"...First of all, the representatives of each grouping reported on their activities. A docker, for example, may have given a thorough outline of the situation at the docks. A housewife may report on the success or otherwise (and it had best not be otherwise) of the Peace Petition canvassed in her block of flats. Through all of these reports ran one consistent thread — the Party Line. If that was Peace, for example, each group representative had to show how the group had been exploiting it. When all reports had been made the Borough secretary rewarded them with praise or criticism. He was listened to with respect, for none there believed they were just listening to Comrade John Betteridge. They were listening to a man who had received his instructions from higher up. The Borough Secretariat was a lever to be lifted or depressed by the London District Committee, according to the Party Line, which was itself evolved by the National Executive of the Party..."

Hate-America

"...When Betteridge placed before us London district's commands that agitation and propaganda against the Americans must be intensified, no one questioned the wisdom of it. You would be surprised by the ease by which we could persuade the Hackney docker or the Hackney housewife to hate America. Tell an East Ender whose home has been three times bombed that the Americans want to launch a third world war, and how would you expect him to feel? Tell a Hackney housewife that the Americans are compelling the British government to spend money on arms that should be spent on food, and how would you expect her to feel? The hate- America campaign was one of the easiest waged in Hackney. When it began to work the communist had only to suggest that Russia could send Britain food were it allowed to do so, that Russia was disarming while America armed. Sometimes, though, there were embarrassing moments. This was invariably when the Party Line hiccuped..."

Titoism

"...The topsy-turvey business of Tito went unexplained for days. The whole world was discussing Tito. We were keeping our mouths shut. Had anyone else in the party thrown down a challenge to Stalin we should have attacked him immediately. But Tito was different. He was a communist hero. The shock of his break with the Russians stunned the Party, and not a few of us privately believed that it was the beginning of a great schism. But neither I nor anyone else was allowed time for such heresies to develop.

Only when every Party branch was formulating plans for 'fighting Titoism' did the District Committee start explaining the Cominform's case. I remember one speaker who came down from headquarters to talk to us about Titoism. He was calm, self- assured, like a school teacher patiently lecturing a dull class. Our Party's leaders had known all the time of Tito's possible defection. But what could you expect from a man who had been an American agent during the war?

There it was, flung at us casually like that. Tito was an American agent. During those wartime moments when we had all but made a saint of Tito he had been taking money from the Americans. He had betrayed us, let us down. We hated him. From then on we were all in step with Uncle Joe again. And the portraits of Tito were taken down from the walls and quietly burned. Harry Pollitt had once talked proudly of the signed photograph of Marshall Tito which hung on his wall. I wonder what he did with it."

The operation and structure of the Communist Party in Hackney in the late 1940s was not unique. It was the same as any other C.P. branch anywhere in the world. The only differences that existed were those of effectiveness. Tens of thousands of working class women and men were persuaded to join the various Communist Parties. What should have become a time for optimism, a new beginning after the defeats caused by Fascism, became instead just another false hope, another ideological rout by capitalism. Why?

Not all the blame can be put upon the Communist Parties; other factors must be taken into consideration. But, mainly through the policy of an unquestioning obedience to Moscow, did the C.P.s come to bear a very major responsibility. by choosing to defend the USSR the C.P.s defended the thoroughly bourgeois concept that some national states, whether they be state socialist or otherwise, are worth the spilling of working class blood. After two world wars in relatively quick succession the last thing the working class needed was a third one. To the detriment of fighting on the terrain of what were the real concerns of the population, the C.P.s became just another factor in the whole social spectrum of the powerful manipulating the powerless. But in this particular case, those responsible were more odious and reprehensible than most.

Enemies

To the class conscious observer of capitalism, the capitalist is one part of the economic equation, the other of course is the worker. The capitalist does what is required to keep his economic system surviving. As such he is our natural enemy. But there are other enemies, ones who deal in the realm of hopes and desires and dreams. They are not as open about their motivations as the capitalist is, but the end result is the same. Exploitation. Just as the parliamentarian politicians cynically manipulate the immediate hopes of their electorate, in the same way as the desires of working class men and women for a life of potential fulfilment are exploited through all manner of charlatans offering cheap and nasty palliatives, so also are the dreams of a new society taken up and manipulated to the ends of exploitation. True, the authoritarian communists do want to put an end to the capitalist system, but only so as to implement the system of state socialism, the system of economic decree, of bureaucratic command and yes, of course, more exploitation.

The western working classes of the '40s and '50s showed considerable common sense and political acumen in not permitting the lies and duplicities of Communism Inc. to sway them in favour of setting up copy-cat regimes of the USSR.

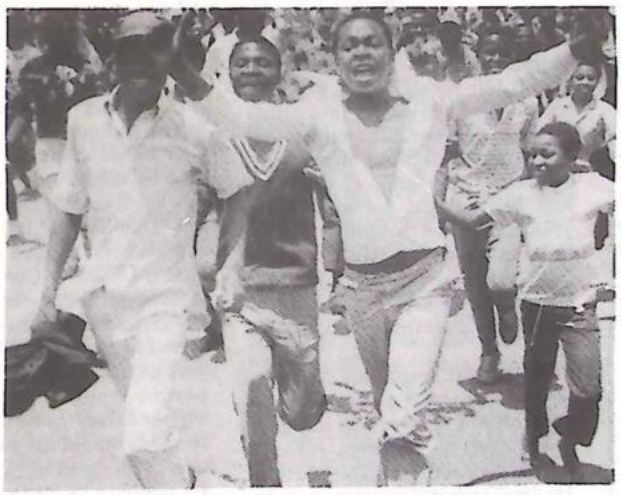
Should the working class in this country and in others decide once more to dream that dream of a society without exploitation, and to strive to make it a reality, it becomes incumbent upon libertarian communists to do all in our power to treat one another as equal participants and to fight against conceptions and forms of organisation which allow the working class to be treated as pawns to be manipulated to the dictates of any form of capitalism whatsoever.

The Politics of Tribalism

IN THE LAST issue of Organise! (No 23) we had an in-depth article on the African National Congress, showing that the politics of nationalism and Stalinism had nothing to offer the South African working class. However, this did not mean that we thought that the other organisations supposedly representing the South African masses are any better. The Pan African Congress is in many ways an ANC Mark II, distancing itself from that organisation by its own brand of nationalism and attempting to snatch its 'radical' mantle. The pamphlet mentioned in the previous article refers to "grim stories of what happened in PAC camps..." The PAC structure is just as hierarchical and authoritarian as that of the ANC.

Nationalists

In the 1980s the ruling Nationalist Party, faced with mounting social unrest, started to form an alliance with the emerging black capitalist class. This black bourgeoisie grew out of the industrial development of the Bantustans, the black reservations created by the regime. The mouth-piece of these small capitalists is Chief Buthelezi at the head of Inkatha with its strongholds amongst the Zulus of Natal. He advocated 'non-violent change' in the '70s and '80s and has strong links with Henry Oppenheimer, President of the multi-national giant Anglo-American. Oppenheimer himself is a leading light amongst pragmatic South African capitalists with strong ties to capitalism internationally.



Tension

The carnage in the townships is a direct result of the politics of tension developed by the Afrikaaner regime. President de Klerk agreed that his secret police should fund Inkatha and its trade union wing UWUSA with vast sums of money. An initial payment of £55,000 was revealed, and it appears much more has gone to Inkatha over the years. Inkatha impis have been used to attack ANC neighbourhoods, often with direct police and military connivance, and sometimes with the support of armed government undercover units. In addition, there have been reports of a number of direct attacks on the ANC by police and troops wearing balaclavas. The special services unit Five Recce, according to one of its ex-members, Felix Ndimene, have been involved in massacres on trains that further aggravated relations between supporters of ANC and Inkatha.

Factions

In some areas, whole townships with populations of at least 30,000 have fled before the warring factions. The ruling regime is pursuing an effective strategy to immobilise its opponents. It attempts to coopt the ANC whilst weakening it through building up an alternative 'opposition' amongst the black masses and encouraging the divisions of tribalism. It hopes that in the post-apartheid elections it can go into alliance with Inkatha.

One sign that Inkatha has an important role in helping the white boss class maintain its privileges is the phenomenon of many wealthy whites joining Inkatha. In some well-heeled areas, the white rich are setting up their own Inkatha branches.

Stalinists

As we said in Organise! 23, the ANC has been trapped and immobilised. Wedded as it is to a section of the new black capitalist class and espousing a 'stages' theory borrowed from the Stalinists which claims that bourgeois democracy must be won before anything else can be attempted, the ANC can offer no solution for the vast majority of the population. Indeed, the ANC is guilty of tribalism itself, filling the leadership with Xhosas.

There are many sincere militants in the townships and workplaces, members of one or another of the rival organisations (ANC, PAC, or AZAPO) who want the overthrow of the system of privilege and do not want to see their organisation become the new boss. The working class has to organise independently and for its own interests. It cannot rely on the ANC. This is especially true if the white regime drops Inkatha and Buthelezi due to their loss of credibility and pursues its alternative strategy of coming to terms with the ANC in order jointly to rule South Africa.

"The fact is that the free enterprise system remains the only system in which wealth can be generated in such a way as to provide the jobs and infrastructure necessary for growth and stability... the destruction of Western standards and capitalist bases is the last thing whites should fear in South Africa."

TERRORIZING THE NEIGHBOURHOOD: AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN THE POST-COLD WAR ERA
This book brilliantly describes how American power and capital fit into the New World Disorder. It's the best introduction available to Chomsky's work — short, to the point and free of endless footnotes and sidetracks. The recent history of American foreign policy and the real agenda of Reagan and Bush are clearly stated, along with the significance of the break-up of the Soviet Empire and shifts of national capitals. Chomsky is so good on these matters (and subject to a blanket ban by American mainstream publishers) because most of his sources are official American government documents, and for his trenchant criticism of so-called liberal intellectuals. The only drawback is that Chomsky (and his academic supporters) have a basically liberal view of how 'common sense' and rational philosophy are crucial parts of libertarian socialism — whereas we surely know that common sense can be dangerously misguided, given the influence of modern bourgeois culture and the media. This aside, the book is a little pricey, but is extremely well produced. Overall — absolutely essential reading.

AGAINST REDISTRIBUTING POVERTY
A pamphlet on the State's plans for child maintenance by the Wages for Housework Campaign and Payday men's network.

Editors' Introduction
We received this review from an Organise! reader and have included it in this issue to encourage discussion of a very important issue. We will review the pamphlet ourselves in the next issue and would also welcome contributions from readers.

Hackles should instinctively start to rise as soon as the State, particularly under the Tories, begins to murmur about wanting to help us out. But publicity, particularly adverse publicity, about the Child Support Bill currently slinking through Parliament, has been minimal.

The public face of this legislation has been that it is designed to alleviate the poverty of children by tracing absent fathers and forcing them to pay maintenance. Most people's gut reaction to this is that it's all fair enough. But, predictably, behind the smiley face comes the grim and devious trooper that is the reality of State social intervention. This pamphlet is a close look behind that mask. The two groups involved carefully examine the State's real motivations and base their resistance on a perspective far removed from the liberal collaboration of the Poverty Industry.

The most important thing to realise is that the money collected from absent fathers will not go to the women or children. All of it will be deducted from the mother's Income Support (and the proposed Child Support Agency will essentially only be interested in mothers on I.S.). The only beneficiary will be the Treasury.

The only proposal in the Bill which has proved newsworthy has been the threat to cut single mothers' I.S. by 20% if they refuse to name the father. Indeed DSS interviewers have already been threatening women in this way, illegally. To go by previous tactics, while the State would be only too glad to implement such a policy it may also be willing to sacrifice it as a 'compromise', creating the illusion that the legislation is then acceptable. The only dissent raised by an otherwise supportive scab Poverty Industry has centred on this aspect of the Bill, and in fact it has now been defeated in the Lords. It is therefore all the more important not to confine our attentions to this proposal alone. It is also dangerously simplistic to think that the Bill is only an attempt to save Benefit money.

Its major purpose is an attack on women's economic independence from men, which Income Support provides. The family has always been recognised by the State as an important instrument of Social Control and there has been vocal political alarm at its increasing self-destruction and abandonment in the UK as everywhere else.

"The financial independence of Income Support has helped women to break away from the traditional division of labour in the family: women as the dependent carers, men as breadwinning tyrants. By breaking away, women have made space for and strengthened the efforts of every member of the family — young people, men and other women — to reconsider what kind of relationships we want to be part of".
ARP, p4

By forcing women back into economic dependency on men it is forcing them back into the family, in contact with and under the economic influence of ex-partners. These men may well feel that they thus have continued 'rights' to a relationship — increasing the risks of rape, violence and general abuse. "The State upholds men's power over women in order to uphold it's power over everyone."

The only alternative to enforced contact with and dependency on an ex-partner will be to take up waged work on top of the unwaged work of caring for children. This 'option' is heartily and explicity encouraged in the White Paper, Children Come First (October, '90) that preceded the Bill:

"If maintenance were to be received in addition to Income Support payments then the custodial parent would have to earn a higher salary to be as well off in work. It would act as a disincentive to going to work and further frustrate the ambitions which the parents have for themselves."
ARP, p12

This idea that single mothers are a) not working, b) desire above all else a job outside the home (in effect a second job), and c) that this is the best route out of poverty, is supported by the Poverty Industry, who consequently come in for some well deserved criticism here. The facts constantly belie this the worst paid work by increasing their poverty fulfils only the employers' ambitions of hiring workers for less.

This attack and the posing of the two 'options' of family hell or low waged work on top of unwaged work is the attack on Income Support as a wage for the work that all mothers do as carers.

It is of course an attack on the poorest men as it extorts a larger proportion of their income. It is also an attack on the Black community especially. Of Afro-Caribbean families in the UK 43% are one-parent/women-headed and 47% of Afro-Caribbean children are born outside marriage. Therefore Black families and social networks would be proportionately more vulnerable than White families, even though Black families are a minority of those attacked by the maintenance proposals.

It is an attack on us all, not only with the bureaucracies sweeping new powers of surveillance as the State intrudes its policing of our sexual and social relations, but in its reinforcing divisions between men and women, forcing us back into relations which long struggles have rejected.

This pamphlet is readable, well-researched and a vital explanation of the motivations behind State action. It is unique in its definition of Income Support and clear in its explanation of the importance of women's economic independence for us all.

"Let us be clear. We are against the maintenance proposals not because we are being asked for money on behalf of children, but because the money is not going to children, it is going almost entirely to the State... which deprives women and children in particular of cash and services they are entitled to, only to further tighten its grip over all our lives."
'Payday men's network', ARP, p35

"The principle underlying this publication is: single mothers' Income Support is a wage, not charity, for the unwaged work which government and industry could not function without and which they must pay for."
'Wages for Housework', ARP, p3

SOVIET UNION

Dear Organise!,

What a load of rubbish the so called 'coup' and 'revolution' in the Soviet Union turned out to be. The coup was almost certainly a faked and manipulated stunt right from the start. It was used as a cover for the power struggle between Gorbachev and Yeltsin and the real coup that was going on: the rise of Yeltsin to populist dictator! The whole thing has since been turned into a spectacular myth and fairy-tale story by the capitalist media, with all the happy democratic people cheering in the streets, marching off into the democratic sunset and living democratically ever after. Now that Yeltsin and the liberals have made themselves mega-popular and diverted everyone's attention they can get on with the job of selling everything off to the business sector while dumping millions of workers on the dole. Fortunately, in amongst all the nationalist and democrat flags carried by the crowds, we could spot a few black and red anarchist flags.

Meanwhile back in this part of the world life continues with the boredom and misery of recession. In my local town, Reading, the slimy Labour council have begun the process of sending a number of poll tax resisters to prison to try and frighten us all, but we're still not paying! Today the word 'Democracy' is nothing more than a codeword for capitalism and austerity. Anytime they want to attack us and impose some oppressive new measure on us they do it in the name of 'Democracy'. I think it is about time we had a revolt against Democracy. Democracy is just a load of crap!

Paul (Reading)

Dear Organise!,

The contradictions of capitalism, state capitalism and bureaucracy are all reaching a dynamic climax in the USSR and Eastern Europe. The problems are not created by the working classes of these countries but by the mismanagement of their bureaucracies. For instance, grain is produced but inadequately stored due to lack of facilities. Workers are alienated by the greed of production managers. Contradictions are also generated by ethnic exploitation as in Ulster. Defence systems were developed at the expense of industrial commodities due to the endless onslaught on the USSR by those interested in destroying the first attempted workers state. Workers' commitment to socialism is undermined by the irresponsible consumerism flaunted by the West. The breakdown of the Soviet system is therefore the direct result of capitalist, state-capitalist and bureaucratic brutality and mismanagement. Only socialism can solve these contradictions.

A.A. (Edinburgh)

REPLY TO A.A.

Anarchist-communists don't believe a 'workers' state' is possible. As the Russian example shows, revolution means the working class collectively seizing control of the workplaces, land and streets from the bosses and the state and creating organisations based on mass decision-making to run things e.g. workplace and neighbourhood assemblies, councils and committees. Similar defensive organisations such as workers' militias will be needed to defend these gains against Leninists and others who would set up a new state and hence boss class.

To us the Russian counter-revolution began in October 1917 when the Bolsheviks seized power in the name of the working class and began to take over collective organisations such as the Soviets and factory committees, implementing Bolshevik control and one- man management, thereby consolidating state power. Debate and opposition (both inside and outside the party) were eliminated through repression which involved the setting up of the Cheka (political police) on Lenin's advice in December 1917, imprisonment, shootings and the crushing of the anarchist Makhnovists in the Ukraine and the Kronstadt sailors' rebellion in 1921.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Dear Organise!,

From the Battle of the Boyne to the Hunger Strikers, in Northern Ireland there has been nothing but appalling bloodshed, death and torture inflicted on the Irish people.

The fight has been going on for 800 years and "has not ceased nor will not cease" until the Irish people are allowed self dignity and respect.

The Birmingham Six, Guildford Four, Macguire Seven, Bloody Sunday, the Hunger Strikes, the Gibraltar Killings and the numerous deaths of many volunteers and non-volunteers for the Irish Republican Army. These are the reasons why we can't, won't and aren't going to forget the past as one SDP councillor said we should. The list could go on forever. Nothing can be achieved in the way of peace until:

- The troops are out.
- The prevention of terrorism act is smashed.
- The border is removed.
- The RUC and UDR are disbanded.
- Prisoners are out of jail.

This is why we all have to pull together and stop what atrocities are going on now. The brutality of the UDR, RUC, UVF and British army etc. is horrific! There have been more violations of human rights in Northern Ireland than there are drops of water in the Irish sea!

Once there is peace in Northern Ireland, and only then, can we try to rebuild what we have lost.

S.L. aged 13 (Saffron Walden)

REPLY TO S.L.

We are opposed to the military occupation and repression carried out by the British state in Ireland. History shows us, however, that national liberation struggles make little difference to the working class majority. The foreign military withdraw and often the more obvious direct foreign colonial exploitation ceases, but the working class remain exploited by 'their' national bosses and repressed by 'their' army and police. In addition, the old colonial relationships persist through economic domination by foreign capital in the form of multinationals and international banks.

It follows from the above analysis that the Irish working class does not have the same interests as the Irish ruling class just because they're both Irish. A united capitalist Ireland is not worth fighting and dying for. As we said in Organise! 14, "Therefore we struggle for working class unity. However, we don't see this as a simple slogan to throw at the problem so as to renege on our revolutionary responsibilities to defend the Catholic working class against reactionary Loyalist workers. Protestant workers will only be broken from loyalty to the Orange bosses by the building of a revolutionary secular socialist movement which is opposed to the Green as it is to the Orange.

The essentially petit-bourgeois republican movement, tied to nationalism, cannot create this movement. It is the task of revolutionaries in Ireland to build this, North and South. This, like workers' unity, will be a hard struggle for our Irish comrades, but there is no alternative.

The task of libertarian revolutionaries in England is to oppose British Imperialism; its bloody repression in Ireland and its media propaganda war against the community of opposition in the North (not synonymous with the IRA/INLA). We must win support amongst British workers for the call for Troops Out and Working Class Unity".

BANGLADESH

Dear Organise!,

As the author of the article, now entitled 'The Long Arm of the State', I must draw the editors' attention to an error in transfer of the article — as we all know Martin Foran is not an anarchist nor has he ever been — the article should have read, "long supported by anarchists".

I must also make mention of the Back Page article about Bangladesh. First of all, there are protections against floods. Around two-thirds of the major river bank system has had extensive work done on it. These river systems are the channels which burst and cause severe inland flooding. They are now served by high banks and dikes. The problem with them though are numerous:

- they were designed and built by eternal 'expert' contractors, thus not employing local unemployed or underemployed labour;
- they cost millions of dollars which had to be borrowed, the so- called aid thus doubly depriving the country;
- the design was essentially a straight-line design not regularly following natural curves, as pointed out by both local peasants and radical engineers;
- the design even then did not incorporate any pumps to get rid of the flood waters collecting on the hopefully 'dry' side of the dikes;
- these pumps had to be bought, causing extra borrowing, and then incorporated causing extra cost;
- the local unemployed have since been used to modify the designs and install the pumps.

Secondly Himalayan deforestation is only a minor cause of inland flooding. The Himalayas are still a dynamic mountain range, ie they are still going upwards, which causes large landslides which are the major cause of flooding, something unaffected by the presence or not of trees.

The essential problem for Bangladesh is that large sections of its population are pushed out onto dangerously vulnerable land, both for housing and farming purposes, because of poverty.

REPLY FROM GREEN FLAME

We thank you warmly for showing us the courtesy of a review of our seminal work, Paradise Referred Back — a radical look at the Green Party. Many of your comments in the review are pertinent, others are a bit wide of the mark. In the pamphlet our comrades, O'Hara and Matthews, stress the utter importance of class struggle politics. Although the pamphlet is a libertarian-revolutionary critique from within the UK Green Party, nowhere in its pages will you find a recruiting drive for the Green Party. Hence, we find your reviewer's comments suggesting that anarchists should not join the Green Party a little strange. Green Flame has never advocated membership of the Green Party itself as the sole modus operandi. There are some good radicals in the Party, fighting a losing battle against the new and geography. It stretches over nearly half the world and large areas are incredibly cold. In spite of all this huge strides were made. To become a super-power in terms of modern weapons of mass destruction is a huge feat. Unfortunately it could only be made at very real cost.

Whereas the USA had industrial capacity which needed war manufacture to continue producing, it had a huge over-capacity, the USSR was the exact opposite. Competing in the super-power stakes, being a military super-power also perverted its economy. Having a huge relative under-capacity could only result firstly in an economy which was to remain stunted and under-developed.

Krushchev in his infamous 20th congress speech saw the need for the creation of an economy which included consumer commodities. This was to remain largely unfulfilled, partly by virtue of his own crazy ideas at the head of the command economy and by the geographical aspects of the Soviet economy. Stalin had begun the whole trend by making each republic specialist producers of particular things, production being concentrated in huge plants but often thousands of miles apart. In addition the best products of Soviet society were reserved for the military. The rest of the economy had to deal with second or third best. The wastage in production was incredible, physical inefficiency must have been at least 25%, something which no economy can endure long.

For example, the Soviet textile industry needed cotton so Stalin decreed that large areas of the Central Asian Republics be made over to the crop, whether it was a sensible use of land or not. The cotton was then to be sent to the Moscow area where most of the factories are concentrated. Thus, land which might have a better use is tailored to fit a political decision, using for instance large amounts of chemicals for often poor returns, the transport network is doubly loaded, transporting materials miles to factories which could be relocated and food is not produced which then has to be shipped in. Food production is chaotic, not having proper transport, such as refrigerated trucks, depots etc. allowing meat and other perishables to rot. Huge areas given over to one crop allow massive crop failures so the USSR has to buy on the world market. In industry the same failures are repeated and sometimes worse, the best materials, resources and personnel being given over to military production. The economy being confined by political command cannot develop. Needs are left unanswered, desires frustrated.

Problems

Many of these problems were recognised both by Krushchev and later leaders but politico-military considerations were to come first. What was described as a thaw under Krushchev became a new freeze under Brezhnev. Indeed the other great development of the Soviet economy was to achieve dizzying heights under Brezhnev, that being the Black market. Not only did it comprise the usual smuggled goods and illicit manufacture, it largely contained goods stolen from the production system either directly or with the connivance of the bureaucracy. The privileged profited twice. After Brezhnev's death his son-in-law was arrested and convicted of a huge number of corruption charges.

With the rise of Gorbachev a new era was to begin. The command economy had reached breaking point, the forces of repression could not keep in check the forces of a population which had to have change. The big problem for Gorbachev was always going to be how much change and of what sort? He attempted a Bonapartist balancing of forces, keeping a firm hand upon a concentration of power while making surface political reforms which would help to revitalise an ailing economy which itself would be partially reformed. Thus, Glasnost was initially only to allow a certain freedom of expression, politically and culturally, leaving the major areas of power in place. Perestroika was to give some land back to the rural workforce, give a greater freedom to industrial management but not the financial capacity, cooperatives were to be allowed to add to the service and small production sector. None of these cosmetic measures could ever be enough.

Turmoil Nationalism became rampant, often accelerated by local communist bosses to play one ethnic group against another and forestall any deeper examination of other and more revolutionary political possibilities. Out of this turmoil came the various initial declarations of independence, from the Baltic states, the rise of new political forces, the democracy movement and populist leader Boris Yeltsin, the forces of long repressed religion, Russian fascism in groups such as Pamyat, and nationalism which pitted different ethnic groups against each other, murderously so in some areas, such as the Armenian/Azeri fighting in the Caucasus.

Eastern Europe disintegrated as a bloc being led by Hungary, closely followed by a Poland brought down by successive failed pro-Moscow regimes, the victors being the Catholic nationalist Thatcherites of Lech Walesa. The German Democratic Republic was to be swallowed up by its big brother in the West. Bulgaria and Romania have only made half 'revolutions'. For a long time the eastern bloc had been well integrated into the world economy. The USSR had had to buy huge quantities of grain on the world market. Now the corpse of its European empire was being picked over by the wolves of the IMF and Western finance, Poland and Hungary had huge debts to finance. They have now been largely sold off cheaply to Western investors.

This rush of investment had been the sort of thing that Gorbachev had hoped to encourage for the USSR. His quotes from the Lenin of the NEP (New Economic Policy, a partial return to capitalist economics following the failures of war communism) era and his statements of good faith were not enough to bring in aid. For the west the death of communism had already been announced with the withdrawal of the USSR from the world stage and the oncoming collapse of eastern Europe, now the body had to lie down and die so that they could pick over the bones. The Free World had been vindicated in its victory, the archangels capitalism and democracy could come centre stage, complete with 'mom, apple pie and sunday school'. The USSR was now bankrupt, its industries were not functioning, production had contracted by around 10%, help to turn military production to civilian purposes had been requested. The European Bank for Reconstruction and Development was created — specifically to deal with the East. It proposes to aid the process of democratisation and its protection, to improve the environment and aid the economies of the east by — leasing machinery, recreating banking structures, accounting, legal systems, offering investment. All of this was to be done on a budget of around $10-20b. Projected costs for the reconstruction of the east come to around $2000b. Working together with the IMF and the World Bank there can only be one set of results — the Latin Americanisation of Eastern Europe, which will become a total captive of the west. Hungary and Poland are already essentially in that position.

In the next issue of Organise! we continue our look at the New World Order.

We believe that a radical, socialist and libertarian movement will be composed of class struggle organisations, direct action ecologists, and an amalgamation of the new social movements.

We are also keen to emphasise the importance of anarchist and libertarian philosophy and politics in our overall strategy. Thus, Murray Bookchin, Kropotkin, and Bakunin, to name but three, have figured in our group of influences. We are a loose, informal but organised grouping active now in many European centres and, following the success of Paradise Referred Back, we are now happy to announce the publication of our Statement of Principles, written by myself and Dave Scott, available at 60p (including p&p) from Green Flame, BM 4769, London WC1N 3XX, United Kingdom. Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method.

We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

Join us!

The Labour Party has now lurched so far to the right that even the parasitical Trotskyite groups who have been trying to turn it into a genuine socialist party (something it never could be) are thinking of leaving. The Stalinist parties are in their death throes with the collapse of State 'Communism' in Eastern Europe. Leninist and Trotskyite groups (especially Militant) are split over whether to continue as tapeworm tendencies inside the Labour Party or set up alternative (sic) parties. They're all busy bleating that what collapsed in Eastern Europe was Stalinism, supposedly a different system to that set up by their heroes, Lenin and Trotsky. The British Green Party, following the example of their German counterparts Die Grunen, are rapidly becoming another traditional Grey Party.

Opportunity

This crisis in party politics and the accompanying major crisis in the economy present an opportunity for Anarchist-Communists. We have the only credible alternative to the twin horrors of the 'free' market and state-managed socialism, otherwise known as state-capitalism. It's also an opportunity for other groups, however: the Trots (Stalinism disguised) and the Fascists who are again becoming stronger.

Building

In order to build a movement we need to organise in class struggle anarchist groups both locally and nationally. This enables us to work more effectively, co-ordinating our activity and supporting each other so that we are a credible alternative to the vanguardist revolutionary groups who sabotage struggles for their own party-building ends. Such an organisation would begin to make its presence known trough effective propaganda and action whilst developing its theory in a lively, dynamic way in interaction with practice. This is the kind of organisation the ACF is trying to build.

The ACF works towards a social revolution, not to seize power itself, but participating in a revolutionary process as working class people, to assist the class as a whole to destroy the present system and build a free society run through mass decision making.

We urge all those who agree with our aims and principles to join our organisation, the better to take part in this coming about. Write to our national address for details. Apply for membership now. We've been on the defensive for too long — let's build a mass movement that goes on the attack!

SOLIDARITY

THE IDEA THAT the individual is of supreme importance is only a relatively recent development in historical terms. For most of human history, belonging to a group took precedence as people identified with the tribe, the clan, the family and locality.

Social solidarity was what counted and acts committed by individuals were perceived to be the responsibility of the wider social groupings to which they belonged. Blood feuds, for example, which involved warring extended families, often arose from the action of a single individual but carried collective responsibility.

Unlike modern capitalism, which tends to isolate individuals, pre-capitalist systems tended to incorporate them. People were bound together through a variety of strong social ties. This social solidarity was once the normal and universal form of relationship.

Natural

Insofar as individuals find it extremely difficult to live in total isolation, we may argue that social solidarity, to some degree, is natural. Human beings are social animals who necessarily must cooperate. Even within modern industrial societies, the urge to belong to some community or other seems overwhelming. So-called tribalism in respect of football supporters is an example of this.

In the fight against exploitation and oppression within the capitalist system, workers have always recognised the need for solidarity in order to win even basic demands. From the beginning of the nineteenth century, striking workers have had to try to create and enforce the greatest degree of unity in order to beat their employers. The tension between individualism arising from the dynamic of capitalism and the need for united action has been one of the main preoccupations of workers in struggle. The issue of 'scab' labour has been so important that the success of workers' actions has often depended upon the ability to overcome imported strike-breakers.

Trade unions normally act as a barrier to wider solidarity since their main concern is with a particular craft, industry or occupation.

Sectionalism, meaning a divided workforce, has always been an essential feature of trade unionism in Britain.

Powerful

Solidarity on a mass scale can be tremendously powerful. During the General Strike of 1926 in Britain, sympathy and support for locked-out miners was so great that there was no strike breaking from within the working class. The one serious occasion in which the union bosses pushed for united struggle ended in disaster. The power and potential threat of millions of workers on strike frightened the government. It frightened the union leaders even more and they called off the strike when the issue of parliamentary sovereignty (sic) came onto the agenda.

The failure to achieve solidarity of purpose and action usually has dire consequences. During the 1984 miners strike internal dissension within the union's ranks and lack of significant support outside seriously weakened the struggle to preserve jobs.

If solidarity is important for struggles which are of a defensive and limited nature within capitalism, then it is clear that in order to overthrow the system, the widest determined unity is going to be essential. Failure to involve the great mass of working class people and at least neutralise most others will lead either to quick defeat or civil war. The greater the cohesion of the struggle, the easier will be the task of creating post revolutionary anarchy.

Government

An anarchist society by definition requires the absence of government. Anarchists have, however, gone much further than this and fight for the abolition of all coercive institutions and relationships. How then, can order be maintained, for without order society would be intolerable. Part of the answer must lie in the creation of networks of manageable (in personal terms) social groups which have strong bonds within them and in their wider contacts.

Dynamic

Whilst the danger exists that social pressures will negate individual freedom, these must be counteracted by libertarian education and effective structural devices which promote the greatest possible degree of personal autonomy. Anarchist communists believe that social solidarity is simply the most 'natural' form of living in the world. Anarchy will not be an amalgam of unconnected, isolated individuals but a dynamic solidarity in which people interact on the basis of freedom and equality.

A grand tradition

IN 1925 NESTOR MAKHNO, Piotr Arshinov and other veteran Russian and Ukrainian anarchists in exile in Paris set up the excellent bi-monthly Dielo Trouda. Many incisive and analytical articles examining the Russian Revolution and developing anarchist-communist theory appeared in its pages.

In October 1936 the Italian anarchist, Camillo Berneri, in exile in Spain published the magazine Guerra di Classe (Class War) This paper printed some important and critical articles on the course that the Spanish Revolution was taking until the murder of Berneri in 1937 silenced it.

For fourteen years from 1956 to 1970 French anarchist communists around the magazine Noir et Rouge (Red and Black) developed theory in a multitude of articles and had an important influence on the events of May-June 1968 in France.

Today Organise! continues the tradition of criticism and analysis of all the major problems in developing both revolutionary theory and movement. We think that Organise! has an important role to play in the growth of a real revolutionary movement. We know from rising sales that many of our readers feel the same.

But we need your support to help keep the furnace burning.

Sell Organise! Although our sales are rising, we need to keep boosting circulation, so try and take a bundle to sell to friends or workmates. By selling Organise! you can help our ideas to reach more and more people.

Write for Organise! You can help to make Organise! yours by writing letters and articles.

Feedback Organise! will improve through a two-way process of criticism and feedback, and will better reflect the reality of struggle through readers communicating with us. Please write in with your ideas.

Please send all feedback, contributions for Organise!, requests for papers and Press Fund money (payable to ACF) to the London address.

No Justice! No Peace!! Los Angeles Riots

AFTER FOUR NIGHTS of "riot and looting" resulting in 58 deaths, 4,000 injuries, and 12,000 arrests, have the wrongs been righted? Sociologists and liberals will continue to burn the midnight oil dreaming up half-baked solutions aimed at opening the dead ends of hopelessness into the avenues of infinitely useless capitalist reforms. But little more than a few weeks later, this particular chapter of revolt has already receded from the exceedingly short memories of rich, well-protected and indifferent America — except that is, by LA taxpayer groups calling foul a 0.5% increase in local sales tax!

As well as being a gross injustice, the jury verdict in acquitting four police thugs of the Rodney King beating gave the stamp of approval to the official city policy of "restrained force". As represented on the video taken of the Rodney King beating, city policing in the USA is, more and more, simply a euphemism for state-inspired violence of unequal and cowardly application. It was this, along with the frustration born out of unremitting poverty which sparked the anger on the streets of LA.

Protected by massive security, Bush toured the area and promised $600m in federal aid. If that money is to be seen much of it will be creamed off into the pockets of entrepreneurial businessmen and corrupt city administrators, selling with all the razzmatazz but empty promise of a Wild West travelling medicine-man, a "new" range of band-aids and miracle cream. Within the managerial realms of social work and so forth the availability of funds for projects and ideological campaigns will be directly related to how close they are to the status-quo views of the purse-string holders. The "mopping-up" campaign by the Bush administration is well on course.

The end result of the invested $600m will be a state version of the revolt as unconnected to reality as the American dream is to the one in five US families living below the official poverty line. But even with all the propaganda machinery at its beck and call, the well-worn ruling-class tactic of presenting events such as LA as mere blimps, as unfortunate reactions against a perceived remoteness of the justice system, as one of the to-be-suffered checks and balances of a "widely accessible democracy", will be seen by many to be the big lie that it undoubtedly is. The more the US economy fails to live up to its expectations, the more reality will impose its ugly head into the fantasies of the American leadership.

Racism

"We have a stealth type of racism that manifests itself institutionally within society. It's invisible racism. The same kind of racism that whites would vent on you in the south, kicking you in the rear end, or putting a dog on you or cracking your head open, they don't have to do that, they can use the police to do that. It's invisible, you can't see it. When you go in for a job opportunity and they tell you no, they don't even tell you why, but you know why. And this kind of incident with Rodney King just coalesced a broad range of issues that black Americans have been suffering with and putting an identifiable form to it in the form of a police uniform." (Don Jackson, civil rights activist.)

Racism is an undeniable fact. Its purpose today, in most of the industrialised west, is to establish as a supposed naturalism the superiority of white over black. Racism has always existed. The Crusades, of which Bush's new world army was but the latest instalment of cultural and economic imperialism via a technological superiority of armaments, are just one pre-capitalist example of how rulers are aware of the power of the race card. In this century we just have to look at the Nazis/Jews and also the racist characterisations of the Germans and Japanese during the war to see what sort of benefit the bosses gain from its usage. Even for the US electioneering process now in progress, Bush's use of black prisoners to bounce off their actions an image totally detrimental to all blacks is considered fair and normal.

Racism is not an attitude that, no matter how comfortable it would be for conspiracy theorists to think so, is a deliberately calculated policy of government. Government colludes with racism, because divide and rule is what makes the money machine churn. Because capitalist society is one based upon the competitive philosophy that produces winners and losers, the losers, isolated and without a cohesive political agenda, begin to view themselves as victims. They look for more victims to heap their problems upon, and so they contribute to the pecking order.

Purism

This analysis does not, though, in any way justify racism. Any manifestation of racism must be eradicated, for apart from the irrational injustice of such prejudice, nazi scum will take advantage of any lack of combativeness to push their own foul filth. It is also absolutely necessary for whites to support black struggles.

For no matter how reformist, even nationalistic and inversely racist many black leaderships in the struggle are, for white revolutionaries to retreat into a political purism would be disastrous for at least two reasons.

One, the visible factor of black and white acting together destabilises the racist images. Two, when the black-hate-white rhetoric is seen to be the dead end it is and an anti-capitalist agenda is adopted, revolutionaries should be at hand as friends, not as outsiders.

Class War, Not Race War

Impoverished workers, black and white, all over the industrialised world are beginning to question the economic situation they find themselves in. Although not yet articulate on a class basis, these workers are refusing to continue believing in many of the instilled cultural values so beloved by the ruling class. Respect for authority, fear of police, thankfulness and piety for a pitiful dole or a welfare cheque; the threads binding the ruling class's thinking processes to individual workers are beginning to slowly unravel and in some cases, snap with a vicious backlash.

The reality of life for an increasing amount of the poor has created a cynicism in spirit, an apathy in actuality. There have been years and years of broken promises made by corrupt politicians extracting taxes like gangsters demanding 'protection' money. The don't-cares are getting more, and the have-nots are slurred as losers and wasters by a ruling-lass controlled media. As the economic crisis refuses to slow down, so capitalist society becomes more competitive, more aggressive, more dog eat dog, less the 'dream', more the nightmare or the daily grind. The ruling class lies are becoming threadbare and worn and very transparent.

The cry, no justice! no peace! found its way into the consciousness of poor workers all around the globe. As well as referring to the LA verdict, how many also took this to be a summary upon their own miserable and soul-destroying daily existence?

Rebellious Times

It makes little difference if the businesses of our immediate exploiters be owned by white, black, Korean, or any other race. Class activists may well welcome the opportunity to trash and shop. But as we saw of LA the satisfaction of immediate needs and desires allowed the class enemy to organise repressive force. No matter how much food or things the individual "collects", if at the end the conditions which caused the rebellion still exist, are we happy with that? As anarchists, we must answer no. Our first priority is to encourage and develop the revolutionary potential in any rebellious mass. An assault upon the state outposts of capitalist power, whatever their form and however the capitalist media would present it, carries within it a positively forward-looking message that if taken up, copied, understood is of great value.

The practicalities of how to get from here to there need to be thought of. In the absence — for now — of the real thing, let your imagination run riot. And don't keep the results to yourself! To fan the fires of discontent is what Organise! exists for. Forward to the leadership of ideas!

GERMANY

ONE OF THE main weapons in the ideological attacks led on revolutionary movements over the last 15 years is the statement that the working class is no more, is passed away, deceased, is ex-working class. A whole gaggle of fawning intellectuals has pushed this in many a weighty tome, on scores of documentaries and cosy late night chat shows. This has been a shared viewpoint from the Right to the sickening trendies of Marxism Today.

Strikes

However, history often has a pleasant knack of disproving the pet theories of these lapdogs of the boss class. A recent example has been the strikes in Germany.

And so the "end of history" has been shown to be a complete sham. The triumph of "liberal" capitalism and the establishment of a Thousand Years of the Market has not seemed so sure with the actions of the German working class, often held up as a shining example of a "good" and tame workforce.

Up to two million were involved in the strikes which swept through both the public and the private sectors. The trade union bureaucrats in the DGB (German equivalent of the British Trades Union Congress) and the IG Metall (steel workers) and OTV (public sector workers) were forced to call strikes faced with a smouldering anger throughout the German working class. The unions are thoroughly integrated into the Germany economy and are widely regarded as a necessary part of the social structure.

Control

These strikes were regimented and very much under the control of the unions. The hold of the unions and the Social Democratic Party (SDP) over workers is an historical fact. The German revolution in 1918 was sabotaged by the ideological hold that they had.

German workers were used to wage increases every year. The unification of West and East has flung this out of gear. The cost of unification was high, and the optimistic view that profits would increase with the exploitation of the eastern market has proved to be ill-founded. Any profits from investment in the East will not be reaped until at least 1996. The East has proved to be a great drain on the economy and inflation and interest rates have soared as a result.

To pay for the integration of the East the German working class is expected to pay by having their wages forced down. But many workers are not prepared to make sacrifices. As one skilled worker said, (Independent 30.4.92) "I have worked hard to reach this level and do not see why I should have to sacrifice it now". Sympathy for the public sector workers was high among the engineering and metal workers and they joined their protests. Already 60,000 jobs have been lost in the last year in engineering and metal and 20,000 jobs are threatened at Mercedes Benz.

Bathtime

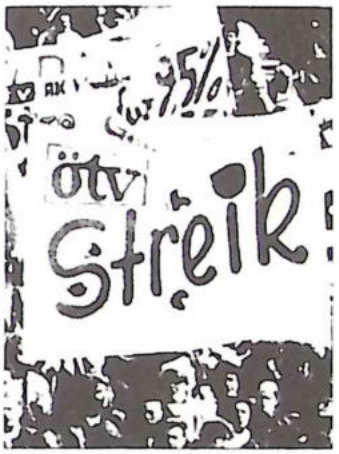
The public sector workers have been particularly badly hit by inflation and steep rises in rents and energy costs. One dustcart driver was quoted as saying, "Nowadays I can only afford to shop in the cheapest stores; I only take baths at home once a fortnight instead of once a week".

The public sector action closed down refuse collection, transport and the docks, postal services, and kindergartens. Lightning strikes by metal and engineering workers brought out 130,000.

The bosses have been under the illusion that they would have it easy with the building of a pan-European market. Now, however, things don't look so rosy. The prospect of a Germany, regarded as the foundation of the European Community, plagued by working class unrest, has been reinforced by the continuing instability in Eastern Europe.

Aware

For now, the unions have managed to secure a wage increase, much below that originally demanded. The OTV got a 5.7% wage increase after initially demanding 9.5%. Social stability has been restored, but the German working class is still deeply dissatisfied. It has been made aware of its strength and initial unity between public and private sectors has been built on. In Hamburg 10,000 striking refuse collectors and steel workers marched together. So far, the strikes were limited to the West. In the East however, a number of occupations against redundancies have taken place in the shipyards, steelworks and building sites.



Unity has to be established between workers in the East and West of Germany. The high level of militancy needs to be translated into action and organisation outside the control of the unions. These strikes have been the biggest actions of German workers since 1933. They have terrified the capitalists throughout Europe. Let us hope that these fears are kid's stuff compared to what could come.

QUICKIES

Guinness is good for you.
Or so they used to say before trading standards said it wasn't. Then again, "former employee" Ernest (tea-leaf) Saunders, sent down for theft & false accounting, then released due to "incurable" ill health and senile dementia, is now fit as a fiddle (oops). And, just to show there's no hard feelings, the firm has given him a £75,000 a year pension. This clearly proves that Guinness is indeed good for you. Can we assume this treatment is available to all Guinness employees? Can we get it on the NHS?

No Bad Apples!
Another lot off the hook is the West Midlands Serious Crime Squad. What a surprise! An avalanche of people released because of faked confessions etc. And then, just when we thought we had the WMSCS bang to rights (I don't think), we discover there is no evidence. How tight can you get? We demand our scapegoat! Surely one bad apple isn't too much to ask for. That's all that's needed to prove to us the police are doing a damn fine job, a service to the community etc. Now we'll never be able to rest easily, with faith in our police.

White Elephant
Ooer! Olympia and York, the firm behind the London docklands Canary Wharf monstrosity is filing for bankruptcy and the government refuses to lift a finger to save them. So much for London docklands, the boom town that has never been more than a ghost town really. Now it's just a white elephant since the crash of 1987 Yuppies are too "broke" to move in. While we can have a right good laugh at the Yuppies' misfortune, for the super rich people behind it all, it's just another failed venture. You won't see them pauperised by it or claiming income support. At the end of the day, they'll still be doing very well, thank you! But this sordid episode of ruling class adventurism has meant the uprooting and disruption of the lives of many working class Eastenders. Olympia and York promised a "jobs bonanza" in Tower Hamlets. Unemployment however, has gone up 25% in the past year.

Fist of Fury
One who didn't get away with it now! Management at French port authorities decided to "rationalise" the system and "modernise" established working practices in the industry (we all know what this means). None too happy about this, the dockers went on strike. In the town of Rouen, some "have-a-go" strikers attacked the head of the freight handling company's trade association. The broken nose and three broken ribs they gave him sets a fine example to us all.

Tanks for the Memory

THE FEBRUARY SPLIT in the Workers' Party in Ireland, when six of its seven TDs (MPs) left and formed the originally titled Democratic Left, has left the Stalinoid group feeling bitter and betrayed. (Shame!) At the Party's May Ard Fheis, (Conference) former Party boss and only surviving TD, Tomas Maggiolla, described the "split" as "a leadership-led coup against the Party and its membership". The new Party Chairwoman Ms Marian Donnelly, of Derry, however, claimed to bear no "ill will". Whether the rank and file will take such a conciliatory line seems rather unlikely!

The Dublin Ard Fheis allowed the shrunken party the opportunity both to lick its wounds and to re-affirm its commitment to its vision, if it merits such a description, of "socialism". That "vision" is basically one of parliamentary reformism in the direction of the state capitalism as modelled by the recently collapsed Stalinist police states. For the time being however, the Workers' Party is calling upon the State and domestic capital to invest in Irish industrial development in order to make native Irish capitalists more competitive on the world market!

If this doesn't illustrate what Workers' Party "socialism" is all about then their perspectives on the Six Counties, where they have maintained much of their membership, should speak volumes even more loudly.

Delegate after delegate attacked the IRA, castigating it as "sectarian and bigoted". The assembled "Republican Socialists" (or is it "Socialist Republicans"?) did not however hear similar condemnation of the sectarian and bigoted State apparatus. Instead the anti-Unionist community was urged to co-operate with the security forces, Chairwoman Donnelly stating that "...nobody has the right to act outside the law"! Of course this should come as no surprise since we are, after all, talking about the Party which considers the non-sectarian, non-bigoted RUC to be the best police force in Europe!

Patently Leninism/Stalinism, which the Workers' Party is a somewhat grotesque example of, has entered a crisis from which it will not recover unscathed. However we would be wrong to think that it is dead and buried (that remains our task!) It is stupid to underestimate the destructive potential of these groups.

The Workers' Party can still draw working class people into its ranks with its talk of "secular socialism" and its apparent alternative to the ghetto of sectarian or establishment politics. The Leninist menace will not go away because the libertarian revolutionaries shout loudly that it is in the dustbin of history. It is not. The politics of the Workers' Party and left republicanism, like those of the Labourite or Trotskyist Left in Britain must be challenged on all fronts by anarchist-communists. A revolutionary alternative to their dead-end, though sadly not yet dead, politics is what's needed.

Exciting news from the North!

We are pleased to report that the Irish Anarchist Bulletin Organise! has been relaunched after an absence of three years. The Spring '92 edition, produced by class struggle anarchists from across the Six Counties, contains lots of interesting stuff with articles on sectarianism, the uselessness of electoral politics, the abortion controversy and the disturbing fascist mobilisation in the north.

Comrades in the Six Counties are highly optimistic about the potentiality of a significant growth of libertarian communist politics in the area and are slowly but surely building the nucleus of a movement.

The next issue of Organise! — British version — will have a full, detailed report on the resurgence of class struggle anarchism in Ireland. In the meantime get hold of a copy of Organise! — Irish version — for 10p and SAE from: — Organise!, Black Cat Press, P.O. BOX 5, Derry, Ireland BT48.

Bundles of this poster can be got from London address. Please send donation. Or get single copy and photocopy 'em.

London ACF have also produced a small concertina leaflet explaining basic ideas of anarchist communism. Again, donation for a bundle to above address. And, not satisfied with this, we've produced 8 different stickers (Anti-capitalist, anti-fascist, homelessness, women, etc) black lettering on red. Again, bundles can be obtained from London address, if you enclose donation.

The Role of the Revolutionary Organisation

Anarchist communists reject the Leninist model of a "vanguard" party as counter-revolutionary. What then is the role of a revolutionary organisation? This pamphlet sets out to explain. All libertarian revolutionaries should read this fundamental text. 60p including post from ACF c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1 7QX.

PROMISING THE MOON

COLIN WARD, anarchist writer and journalist, explained in an article in The Independent why he would not use his vote on polling day. The article showed what anarchists and others know to be true already: that all parties (and I include those which advocate an independent Wales, Zoroastrian calculus, bottom spanking, a united Ireland, enzyme-free washing powders, hanging, and spraying dog-turds green) are the same. Those of us who have been raised to associate the vote — almost instinctively — with the exercise of personal power find it difficult to overcome the notion that the right sort of party with the right sort of policy can, if elected, contribute to our betterment.

Once overcome, however, the truism, "Whoever you vote for, the government always gets in", becomes more than a catchy slogan since to be against government is to be against elections.

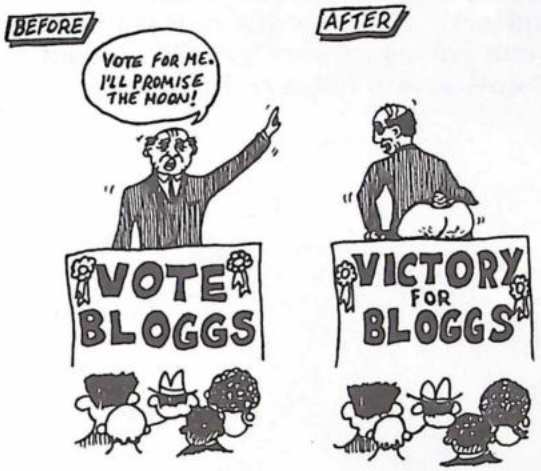
But the existence of the recent occurrence of the five-yearly farce has presented more than just an ideological hurdle; it sets out to destroy what anarchists hold to be an essential component of a better society. The right to vote dupes the "democrat" into believing that she or he is changing something and that this is the only way voices will be heard in the political arena. If the government or MP of "choice" has not been elected, then the punter must direct personal struggle into party work, bar-room debate and buying the correct newspaper.

Distortion

The electoral system shapes and distorts our perceptions and involvement in many ways. Apart from the expensive razzmatazz, an election, like the government which must inevitably result, is divorced from the community with its particular problems and the individual elector and his or her wider aspirations. So great must the diversion factor be that the punter must not at any point between elections think of acting independently. Not only must the individual never shape those forces which affect her or his own life and the lives of those close, but lending voice to wider debate must not be encouraged. All expression must be processed so that it eventually comes out of the mouth of a government spokesperson (or is re-routed into political dead-ends by middle-class liberalism). It is essential that this processing be maintained. It is the mark of twentieth century existence that we consume nothing that has not been processed. Our ability to relate directly to anything in its basic state — like a child unable to relate its milk-shake to a cow, or a fish-finger to the sea — has become seriously and effectively impaired.

Trap

It is self-evident that there cannot be as many parties as there are issues. For this reason, the focus on some issues (PR, tax, NHS) diverts the punter from others that are not shunted to the forefront of media debate. Gaetano Piluso writing on education in The Raven 16 remarks: "It is easy to fall into the trap of thinking that it is possible to overcome oppression on one level while not changing the very structure of society. In its hierarchical form, society allows for and, in fact, calls for the domination of the powerless by the powerful. By compartmentalising the different forms of oppression, a new hierarchy is formed which inevitably acts to safeguard the structure of society by focusing attention on "social problems" rather than on society itself." ('Nurturing the Radical Spirit').



Other issues are tackled identically by all main parties. Those looking to a change of government to answer a problem — teachers fiercely opposed to testing, for example — are thereby disenfranchised. Other issues are not raised in the manifestoes — medical care in prisons, safety in merchant shipping, nutritional content of school meals — and the voter can only hope that a change of regime will bring about a change of attitude.

Management

But the greatest value that the electoral system brings to capitalism is the way that it allows viewpoints to be categorised and managed. There is tactical voting where voting is encouraged for a party which has no real following and poll-based predictions where voting is encouraged for parties whose supporters fear that victory is not certain. Voting patterns are managed using the pressures of locality, gender and racial origin as well as those of class, status and, of course, wealth. But more significantly, protest about the system is rendered impotent, since criticism of the system is merely interpreted by one party as condemnation of the other. Within the either/or presentation of false choice, to find fault with the NHS means wanting to privatise it. To criticise Labour equals Tory support. In the battle against schools "opting out", we're fighting for the supremacy of plainly deficient LEAs in the running of education.

But the sickening strength of ruling-class propaganda is such that even some of those who did not vote and would not vote find it hard to dissociate themselves from the proceedings. The underlying assumption that a vote for Labour, whilst meaning more of the same as far as working class welfare is concerned (high defence bills, prescription charges, immigration laws, troops into Ireland etc, etc) would have at least pointed to a measure of dissatisfaction with the system, some desire for something different, a belief that what is wrong ought not to continue, still endures to weave its persistent ideological spell. But all this viewpoint does is give concessions to the belief that Labour's supposed traditional voters do believe that Labour represents a more humane management of capitalism, when, in fact, evidence of this is very elusive, except that is within the rabid daydreams of most of the Trotskyist sects. If there is an underlying cynicism to be detected amongst the class it is that which we, as libertarian revolutionaries, must build upon. There is no room for offering may-maybes and half way accommodations with capitalism. Those that are already the forgotten ones, the alienated in this society, need steadfast and solid friends.

The option of choice between all pro-capitalist parties is a false one if the goal is a lasting and irreversible change for a better world. We must encourage the refusal to exercise those "democratic rights" which only lend a legitimacy to the rotten system. Refusing to vote, in countrywide and local council elections, refusing to pay the poll tax or that which follows, refusing to give information or help in any form whatsoever to the panoply of blood-sucking bureaucrats and middle-class liberals making our lives a misery — all these actions are important practical steps. Build the culture of refusal and resistance!

YUGOBARBARISM

YUGOSLAVIA HAS BEEN pulled into a horrific civil war, where the different factions of the emerging bourgeoisie (Croat, Serb, Slovene etc) have whipped up nationalist hysteria to draw the different populations behind them. The crisis in the Yugoslav region illustrates the degree of decomposition of the organisation of world capitalism: civil war and barbarism as a consequence of the New World "Order". This latest war is at the very borders of Western Europe. A Europe of "Civil Liberties" and "The Rights of Man" celebrated the fall of "Communism" with the symbolic fall of the Berlin Wall. Now it builds another wall to protect itself from the waves of immigrants caused by the economic and political collapse of Eastern Europe.

The frontiers of Croatia since 1945

Croatian territory desired by Serb nationalists

As with the Gulf War, disagreements have appeared among the partners of the Western bloc. The Yugoslav crisis has aggravated the conflict of interests between the European and US states and between the European states themselves. The United States, continuing in its role as world policeman, declared that it would not tolerate the disintegration of Yugoslavia. The newly emergent ruling class of Serbia, determined to forcibly maintain Yugoslavia under their own domination, could not undertake its military offensive and defeat of the Croats without the implicit assent of the United States. At the same time, the US blocks the interests of Germany, its most dangerous rival in Europe. The German ruling class and state, through their geographic and historic situation, intends to re-establish its spheres of influence both to its east and to its south. The disarray of the ex-satellites of the USSR, as well as Russia, allow it to build these spheres of influence more quickly and strongly.

This disturbs its European partners and the plans and interests of the United States. The German state from the beginning of the Yugoslav crisis was quick to demand the independence of Slovenia and Croatia. It wanted a Franco-German "peace-keeping" force, to increase its influence, and insure the independence of Croatia. It was the German state that first suggested sanctions against Serbia, through the EEC. These suggestions were at first blocked by the long term allies of the United States, Great Britain and Holland.

Slides

The longer the different fractions of the ruling class squabble over their own interests, the more Yugoslavia slides into the barbarism of civil war.

The incapacity of the European states to solve the Yugoslav crisis after 3 summits at the Hague, six peace conferences and more than a dozen cease-fires, shows the conflict of interests of the European boss classes in applying a common strategy. These contradictions highlight the chronic weakness of the EEC and its attempts to create a bloc independent of American capitalism. The last conference at Maastricht tried to sort out "the differences that still exist" and to give the EEC a "political personality". It attempted to develop a common strategy for the European bloc which can insure the defence of its interests, (even if these interests are not always the same) and strengthen European capitalism.

Even if the Yugoslav crisis is "solved", we can be sure that other outbreaks whipped up by nationalist rabble-rousers will demand a direct intervention of the "Great Powers". If there is one thing the European and American boss classes can agree upon, it is that no "independence struggle" will escape their control. If that is true for today, it may well collapse under the weight of conflicting interests of the different "allies". This has happened already to some extent: Italy, Germany, and Austria jumped the gun in recognising Slovenia and Croatia, against the wishes of the rest of the European "Community".

The Vultures Gather

Slovenia was seen as a juicy morsel because it was richer than the other republics and could provide a healthy supply of cut- price skilled workers for the EEC. In recognising Slovenia, Austria was making a gamble. It wished to increase its influence in the area, and had to put aside its worries that the Slovenes in the Klagenfurt enclave of Austria would be manipulated into demanding unity with their fellows over the border. Similarly, Italy wishes to increase its influence in the area, using Trieste as a focus, but has to remember that the Italian-Slovene border could be put in question by the new Slovenian state. Already the fascists of the MSI, as well as the "patriots" of the Italian Socialist Party are expressing their fears about this.

Egged on by the manipulations of the Western powers, some of the East European states are making their claims. Hungary has stated that the predominantly Hungarian region of Vojvodina— in Serbia — never agreed to the Yugoslav union and was forcibly incorporated. Romania, for its part, has its eye on the Romanian-language villages of the Serbian Banat. Bulgaria has never accepted the establishment of the Macedonian republic, and wants to incorporate part of it into its own nation-state. Greece, for its part has claims on Macedonia, as well as wishing to stop any Macedonian claims on Greek Macedonia! The Greek tourist board has put a number of ads about Greek Macedonia in British papers. This was not to promote British tourism there, but to assert its right to the area, and to show how Greek it was. The Greek state has closer links with the Serbians than any of the other EEC countries, arguing against the sanctions and allying with the Serbs to stop any pretensions of the new Macedonian nation-state.

Turkey, too, wants to assert its influence in the area. As well as building up its links with the Turkic states of the ex-USSR in Central Asia, it hopes to penetrate the Balkans by supposedly "defending" the ethnic Turks and Moslems in Bulgaria, and the Bosnian Moslems. The Albanian nation-state for its part has its eyes on Macedonia, the Kossovo region, and northern Greece.

The Balkans are indeed a danger for the "New World Order". Not only could the civil war there drag in other powers, but it could aggravate the tensions between the US and the European powers, as well as the newly-emergent powers like Turkey. That is why it is seen as having to be contained. The "Great Powers" couldn't care less about the bloodshed there, they are worried about their own interests.

Slobo

The Serbian leader Slobodan Milosevic started his career in the Communist Party structure in Yugoslavia, the League of Communists. Through his defense of the Serbs in Kosovo province, and his aggressively nationalist stance, he was able to come to power in Serbia. He dreams of replacing Tito as the great leader, whilst accusing the latter of betraying and humiliating Serbia "aided by the conspiracy of the Vatican and the Comintern"! The first stage of his bid for power was to desert the sinking ship of Yugoslav federalism, to purge the League and to set in motion an "anti-bureaucratic revolution", involving public meetings of solidarity with the Serbs and Montenegrins of Kossovo. This ended with the fall from power of several politicians who had refused to submit to him. He also managed to engineer the fall of the governments of the autonomous regions of Vojvodina and of the Montenegro republic. The banning of his "meeting of truth" in Slovenia was a pretext for an economic declaration of war with a Serbian boycott of Slovene products. In Kossovo, his strategy was to be naked repression. This backfired because it created a total unity of the Albanian population, and even the Kossovo parliament, composed as it was of good "communists" voted through a status of republic. Milosevic then had to rule this, and autonomy for Vojvodina, as out of order. The Albanian language in the schools and the media was completely suppressed.

Milosevic could manipulate the central parliament through his three votes of Serbia and that of his Montenegrin satellites. This allowed the Serbian state to mobilise the army against the other republicans, aided by the Serbian militarists in the ranks. In the other republics, where like in Croatia and Slovenia the market economy had penetrated quicker, the aggressive politics and conservatism of Milosevic, along with the economic crisis and the first disillusionment with economic liberalism provoked a re-birth of nearly forgotten nationalism, and a desire to move closer to Western Europe. In Croatia the regime had been severe in its suppression of anything smacking of Croat nationalism. The May 1990 elections led to victory for the most nationalist of the parties. The new Croat government consisted of the most number of ex-political prisoners as well as the largest number of WWII anti-fascist partisans than any other in Yugoslavia. A new regime was established, based on traditional values and the church, the model of Western democracy and the free market. Serbs in Croatia were given a status of national minority. Milosevic whipped up the reaction of the Serbian minority, referring to imminent genocide and the events of WWII.

Retreat

In Slovenia, the Yugoslav Army had to face a humiliating retreat, but the precedent was used to invade Croatia, with the "defence of the Croatian Serbs" used as justification. The insurgent Serbs of Knin, backed by the Army, waged an "anti-fascist" war, in reality a war to create a Greater Serbia.

In the long-run both Serb and Croat nationalists may agree to a dividing up of the other Republics like Bosnia-Herzegovina. Whether the obscenities of this war continue is up to the working class wearied by war and economic hardship turning against the nationalist ruling cliques. This development of a revolutionary opposition is made more difficult by the repression of the Yugoslav anarchist movement. Many have been forced to flee to Italy, France and North America, whilst others may have been murdered and others infected by nationalism. Nevertheless, resistance is there, both in anti-war mobilisations and in desertions. 25,000 members of the Hungarian minority abandoned the country to escape conscription and 170 refused military service in Vojvodina. In Serbia two deserters were sentenced to prison for 15 and 9 months for "resistance to their superiors" whilst others fled abroad.

In the face of civil war and slaughter, we re-affirm the watchword of the revolutionary movement: unity and internationalism of the working masses against the barbarism of the bosses and nationalist demagogues.

LABOUR PAINS

THE ELECTION RESULT produced deep, deep gloom among the assorted leftists, be they social-democratic like the Socialist Movement, Eurocommunist, like the Democratic Left, Stalinist like the Communist Party of Britain and the Morning Star newspaper, or Trotskyist like as in Heinz (57 varieties).

In all of their papers (with exceptions like the Leninist, Revolutionary Communist Group) they time and again urged the working class to vote Labour "without illusions". This across the board support for the Labour Party shows how much the Left is tied into the whole rotten stinking system. Instead of trying to encourage self-awareness within the working class, they aim to increase illusions in the Labour Party. Despite everything, despite the Labour Party's obvious anti-working class record in and out of government, they once again urged a vote for a party that is a capitalist party, implying that such a vote would be a working-class vote.

The Socialist Workers Party showed utter confusion in their analysis of Labour. Over the years they have described Labour as a Party of the trade union bureaucrats and their rhetoric has involved an apparently more anti-Labour approach than more orthodox Trotskyists practising entryism in the Labour Party, even though it was always a call for "vote Labour without illusions" that the SWP fell back on when it came to the elections. But now in an Open Letter to the Militant parliamentary candidates in the last election (25/4/92), they refer to the Labour Party as being "built out of successive strike waves — the New Unionism of the early 1890s, the syndicalist revolt before 1914, the great strikes at the end of the First World War", abandoning their previous analysis. This is in order to suck up to Militant and the Labour Left, in a desperate attempt to recruit more party fodder.

Break

But our class, the working class, can only fight the appalling attacks it is suffering from the boss class, by developing independent forms of struggle and organisation. And independence means a real break with Labour, which has been involved in the administration of the British capitalist system since the early decades of this century.

To urge a vote for Labour, even if weakly qualified by "without illusions", is to create illusions. In the absence of independent working class organisation, any working class vote for Labour shows the lack of confidence and self awareness prevailing at the moment.

The Leftists know that as soon as elected, Labour would have continued the policies of the bosses. They think that we need to be led through another "educational" experience of another Labour term of office, as if the last five Labour governments haven't been educational enough! They freely admit that a Labour government would be followed by a struggle between it and the working class, in which that government would have to be overthrown. In the meantime of course, working people would have to vote for a government which they would then attack. Logical, eh?

The regular round of elections means the sabotaging of working class struggle. Instead of building for independent struggle, the Leftists urge a suspension of the struggle, in order to scuttle off to the election booths and file in one by one, one of the most alienated, individualised acts under capitalism!

The whole of the Left has been thrown into disarray, disillusion and depression by the Tory victory. This will contribute to their further decline. We on the other hand, anarchist communists committed to helping our class establish self-consciousness and independent organisation, are not discouraged. We have no illusions, either in a Labour victory or in the realisation that the building of a revolutionary movement will not require extreme patience, dogged determination and ceaseless agitation and propaganda.

Malcolm X and Black Nationalism

THE IDEAS OF the black militant, Malcolm X, have become popular again both through rap records and images of him on T-shirts and posters. Black separatists like Louis Farakhan have claimed him as their hero (when in fact Farakhan had been one of those in the Nation of Islam calling for his death!)

And yet a quick look at the man and his ideas reveals a much more complex figure than the black nationalist so often portrayed.

Malcolm X started out life as Malcolm Little, the son of a Baptist preacher in Nebraska. At the age of 23, serving a prison sentence for stealing, he came in contact with the ideas of the Nation of Islam (the Black Muslims) led by Elijah Muhammad, and through painful effort began to educate himself. After several years, he was released, and by 1954 was the Muslim Minister of the New York Temple of the Black Muslims. He changed his name to "X" to stand for the African family whose real name he could never know.

He spent 12 years with the Nation of Islam. During that time he attracted much greater media coverage than Elijah Muhammad, due to his charismatic personality. This aroused Elijah's jealousy, used to running the Nation of Islam in a dictatorial fashion. The Nation of Islam was run by Elijah like a State-within a-State. By divine right he headed a Church-State. He alone appointed the Ministers of each Temple. The aim of the Nation was a completely separate black economy, with its own farms, groceries and restaurants.

The friction between Malcolm X and Elijah was seen in other ways. Malcolm became increasingly dissatisfied with the lack of militancy and the conservatism Opportunity Knocks!

LOCAL AUTHORITIES POSSIBLY employ more workers than any other sector of the economy. In the past few years the councils, whether Labour, Tory or Liberal-Democrat, have competed with each other when advertising job vacancies to declare that they are "equal opportunity employers". Why, after years and years of radical-right toryism is such an apparently progressive slogan like "equal opportunities" so popular?

In part the answer lies in the fact that essentially oppressive systems often assume radical or pseudo radical slogans. Fascists in particular have been keen to borrow symbols, slogans etc from the left eg. the nazi red flag and Mussolini's "National- Syndicalism". Liberal-democratic states such as Britain do not shrink from cloaking reactionary strategies with superficial "radical" glosses. So we have a racist immigration system co-existing with race relation laws that ban racism! John Major's adoption of the slogan of the "classless society" is a similar device which is closely related to the idea of equal opportunities. What is remarkable about these is not their novelty (they've been around before) but the fact that some middle class lefties have fallen for them, hook, line and sinker.

The "classless society" and "equal opportunities" are both aspects of an old capitalist idea which early nineteenth century Liberals brought in to advance the life chances of up and coming capitalists at the expense of the entrenched aristocracy and establishment. Another term for them is the "meritocratic society". None of them have anything to do with equality but are devices designed to ensure inequality on the basis of unrestrained individualism. Hierarchy, differences in wealth and power are all to continue but are to be more open and flexible, allowing those with "ability" to gain access to the elite. Entrenched privilege is supposed to give way to the free movement of individuals up and down social and economic ladders on the basis of their efforts and abilities.

Strangely, this competition is not meant to apply to the inbuilt privileges of the Royal Family, the House of Lords, the public schools, the "old boys'" networks etc. No, equal opportunities is to apply to the public sector, primarily to increase competition within the middle class, teachers, council managers, social workers and the like. Real power, that of the establishment/ruling class remains untouched.

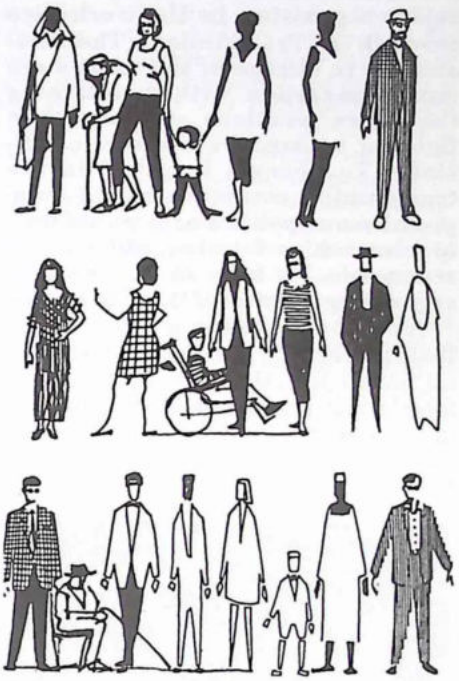
Cynical

The major determinant of success for people without wealth is education and as any sociological study will show, the main purpose of education is not to create equal opportunities but to erect hurdles so as to ration the personnel available for the plum jobs in our society. The middle class is aware of this and manipulates the state system to its advantage. The working class is so cynical about educational prospects that it has largely given up on the school system. Equal opportunities (in the 1950s and 1960s in education it was known as "equality of opportunity") will be sustained by the tiny number of working class children who do succeed in entering the middle class. Their success will be used as an ideological weapon to "prove" that equal opportunities exists. Those who "fail" will believe it is their fault. After all, hasn't everyone got the same opportunities?

Within the middle class equal opportunities is a vehicle for individuals to gain greater power and income for themselves. Of course, they don't believe in equality at all; they want to open up management whilst preserving unequal status and income. They want to get to the top. They feel that the barriers to their promotion are unfair- skin colour, sex etc aren't valid reasons for blocking their promotion. Within local authority structures, say a secondary school, teachers concerned with "wrongful" exclusion for themselves have no interest in the appallingly paid ancillary staff-cleaners, caretakers, technicians, kitchen staff etc. Equal opportunities are generally pursued without regard for the class system which operates within institutions, hence arguments for more women, black, gay managers, not the ending of income and status differentials.

Lavatory

As a system, equal opportunities provides an industry for middle class intellectuals from "minorities", giving them well-paid, high status jobs. One local authority in London recently advertised a post for a Women's Officer at £34,000 a year. One wonders how much the woman (almost certainly) who cleans out her lavatory will earn or how much real difference she will make to women in low-paid jobs. Race relations bodies provide a similar function of institutionalising and compartmentalising real issues relating to inequality. These detached experts develop systems of communication and language which are designed to exclude those very people that they claim to represent.



All in all, equal opportunities are a confidence trick designed to conceal the massive inequalities in our society. They can never really work because of institutionalised class differences. If they could be realised, they would be equally unacceptable, since an elite class based on wealth and power would give way to an elite based upon luck, aggressiveness and crawling to the boss. Equal opportunities may help local authorities smarten up their image, but they do nothing to relieve the distress caused by a society in which necessarily there are very few winners and very many losers.

The only sense in which the term might be used is in a society where class, sex and race privileges have been abolished, where genuine freedom exists and where individual and social freedoms are given the widest expression. Then, equal opportunities might mean a generalised system of plenty which could allow and promote self-fulfillment. Until that day, fight equal opportunities whilst fighting racism, sexism and class oppression.

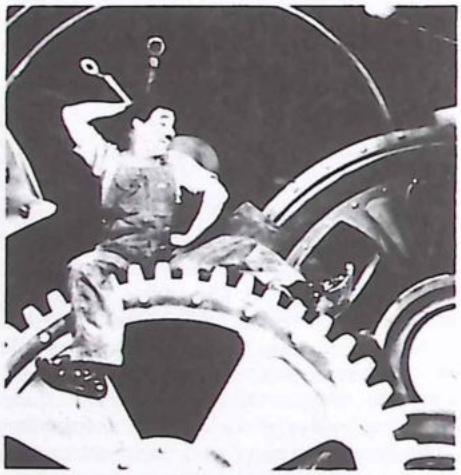
Organising in the Workplace

AS ANARCHIST-COMMUNISTS we reject organising in the workplace through the Trade Unions. The bureaucrats in charge of the unions are more concerned with maintaining their own positions of power than fighting to improve workers conditions. To become involved in the trade union structure would compromise our politics as it would lead to hierarchies forming, elitism and reformism. We have to find ways of organising outside of the unions.

Anarcho-syndicalists try to overcome these problems by forming non-hierarchical unions controlled directly by all the members. In principle this is obviously an improvement but in practice they have found it difficult to escape the problems of working as trade unions.



As these organisations are confined to the workplace only, they tend to concentrate on work orientated demands such as better wages or conditions. Whilst these are obviously necessary, revolutionaries should be broadening the struggle and raising expectations, not just concentrating on simple economic demands.

To function effectively as unions is at odds with anarchist communist principles. For a union, winning demands means dealing directly with the bosses — negotiating with them to try and create a fairer form of exploitation. It is surely a contradiction to claim to be for the revolutionary destruction of capitalism if you've just finished having a business meeting with the bosses. Having people to negotiate with the bosses leads to the creation of leaderships and hierarchies — an obvious example of this is the Spanish CNT at the time of the Civil War. The flaws in this organisation led to a leadership being formed which then proceeded to make many mistakes, one of the most notable being entering the Republican government as ministers. This can't just be blamed on the individuals, the fault also lay in the organisation which allowed it to happen. As anarchist communists we have to find ways of working which do not allow power structures to develop, yet enable effective agitation to be carried out.

Outside

Only by working outside of unions can we do this. Unions are by their very nature reformist and as such should be left to reformers. It is possible to be a revolutionary and to be a trade unionist, but not to be a revolutionary trade unionist. It may be possible to do useful work as a member of a trade union, if only by using meetings as a forum for putting our ideas across to the more militant sections of the working class. We should however be careful to avoid being drawn into the union bureaucracy and it is evident that the main thrust of our activity should be outside of the unions.

In the immediate short term the first step towards workplace organisation should be the linking up of anarchist communists within an industry to form a network. This should be broad based to try and bring in as many people as possible. The networks should include all the people involved in the industry who would be interested in bringing about anarchism — not just people involved in working for the industry but as far as possible consumers as well as producers. For example if an education industry network was set up it would include teachers, technicians, office staff as well as students and pupils.

By bringing in as many people as possible the networks will not become dominated by one section and so will be more orientated towards the wishes of the community.

Starting

The obvious starting point of a fledgeling industrial network is to begin producing propaganda. It is easy for only a few people to make and distribute leaflets, or put up some posters giving an anarchist view point on a particular struggle.

There are, unfortunately, problems with openly disseminating anarchist propaganda at work. Bosses will not look kindly on this and when in a position of weakness it may be necessary for anarchists to only carry out low key work to avoid victimisation. Comrades from outside the workplace may help overcome this. This outside help could come from within the network eg — comrades could demonstrate mutual aid by distributing leaflets outside each others place of employment.

When it becomes possible a paper concerned with the industry could be produced to be sold to friends and colleagues, as well as others concerned with the industry. As the propaganda takes effect and the networks grow it will be possible to move onto more long term objectives. In particularly large or class-conscious workplaces Anarchist-Communist workplace groups can be set up. Whilst these will retain their involvement in the wider network they will be able to focus more closely on the issues at hand and be able to react immediately to any developments at work.

A group can also have an educational role, injecting useful ideas into a struggle. It can show people that real and lasting victories can only come about by people directly taking control of their own lives — without leaders, be they company director or union bosses. As people learn the lessons of past struggles they will develop more effective methods and a workplace group of Anarchist-Communists would encourage and be active in this, whilst themselves learning through experience at the same time.

We can see that by organising at work we can fight effectively on one of the main battlefields of the class struggle. It is vital for revolutionaries to agitate in every area of life, showing how capitalism attacks us in all areas. By organising in the community, both inside and outside of the workplace we can work to bring about our ultimate goal of social revolution.

Making Progress. Describes how and why the ACF was formed, and the continuing evolution of our ideas and practice. A "beginners' guide" to ACF! 30p & SAE.

Manifesto of Libertarian Communism by Georges Fontenis. A key text of anarchist communism. Though flawed, the best features need to be incorporated into modern revolutionary libertarian theory and practice. 60p & SAE.

Myth of Labour's Socialism. Labourism, the ideology that holds the Labour Party together is decaying. This pamphlet explains why, and examines what opportunities will be opened up by the collapse of the Labour myth. 60p & SAE.

Anarchy in the USSR. A New Beginning. Edited by Phil Ruff. ASP. £3. 80 pages.

This pamphlet is a handy introduction to the rebirth of the Russian anarchist movement. It consists mainly of documents drawn from anarchist and syndicalist organisations, as well as an account of workers uprisings in the 1960s by a Russian anarchist.

Unfortunately many mistakes made by the anarchists during the Russian revolution appear to be being repeated. "Synthesis" organisations like the Moscow Union of Anarchists, combine mutually incompatible groups like the Revolutionary union of Anarcho-Communists, the Christian Anarchists(!) and the "dissident anarchist fringe". The Anarcho-Syndicalist grouping KAS (Confederation of Anarcho-Syndicalists) calls for a "system of stateless market socialism with mixed forms of property". In fact, some of the KAS leaders have been compromised by their dealings with the trade unions and attempts by elements of the fragmented Communist Party to construct a British-style Labour Party. Andrei Isaev, for example, quoted in the pamphlet, has become chief editor of the paper of the Moscow Federation of Trade Unions, besides attempting with the head of the Socialist Party, Kagalitsky, and various union bureaucrats to help set this Labour party up.

The most important and interesting document here is by Vadim Damier who broke with KAS and fights for an anarchist-communist position in the group IREAN (Initiative of Revolutionary Anarchists). As he says, "I am for direct action and against the free market... I envisage a federation of free communes... this federation would be on the basis of solidarity and would decide on where, how, what and when things should be produced. Through such co-ordination a libertarian communist society would be achieved."

Poll Tax Rebellion. Danny Burns. AK Press and Attack International. £4.95. 205 pages.

The sinking of the Tory flagship, ironically enough involving the Battle of Trafalgar Square, is well documented in this account by Danny Burns, a non-aligned member of the All Britain Anti-Poll Tax Federation National Committee. He describes the growth of the movement, neighbourhood organisation, the town hall demonstrations and riots, Trafalgar Square, anti-bailiff work and the role of groups like Militant. The denunciation of the actions of the Trafalgar Square rioters by Militant leaders like Sheridan and Nally is well-covered. Perhaps even more important is how the All Britain Federation and some of its component Anti-Poll Tax Unions were manipulated, gerrymandered and packed. Others were genuine expressions of ordinary people's determination to resist, and in some of these, forms of organisation developed that empowered all concerned. For example, as an activist in the book says, "We rotate the chair at every meeting. People take the chair now who would never have dreamed of taking chairs of anything. That's the beauty of it. It's great. It's become like a social education."

There was mass support for the anti-poll tax movement, particularly in Scotland. However, the book tends to let euphoria get in the way of political judgement. In some areas, local anti- poll tax groups after possibly fairly large public meetings initially, received very little support and depended on the activities of a few. The packing of anti-poll tax groups by Militant did lead to demobilisation in some areas. These issues are not adequately dealt with.

As the book says, the defeat of the Poll Tax was a great moment in British working class history. However, the author is quite sanguine about capitalism carrying on "pretty much as usual" and notes how much capitalism has fragmented society by breaking up communities and work-place organisation. However, capitalism has also created a potential for strengthening neighbourhood communities with the less well-off being ghettoised in the inner city and suburban estates. Resistance was built up through the informal networks of these areas. The book argues that these will remain for some time as the strongest bases of action and should focus on more than one issue.

There does seem an overly optimistic hope that these informal organisations thrown up by the anti-poll tax struggles will provide the nucleus for a new community-based mass movement. Unfortunately, the truth is that a demobilisation has taken place since the defeat of the Poll Tax. Many anti-poll tax groups have disappeared completely, others are empty shells and, meanwhile, large numbers of people are still being pursued for non-payment. The series of cosmetic legislation put through by the Tories gave the impression that the Poll Tax was finished when, in fact, it is still there and many are unable to pay and are being pursued by the State with dogged determination.

On the positive side, never were so many people in Britain involved in direct confrontation with the law. Many were involved in political activity during the struggle. Many women, as had happened before with the miners' strike, were galvanised and transformed. As one woman activist is quoted as saying, "I just cannot return to being just an ordinary housewife". Before the movement, many working class people unquestioningly paid their bills. All this has changed. This feeling could, for example, be mobilised to resist rent rises.

We realise there is a general demobilisation and lack of struggle at the moment. However, unlike the Labour left and the vanguard parties, we know that sooner or later mass movements will reemerge and we must prepare for that. We think society can be transformed, unlike those who, as Jim Kelman, a quoted Scottish activist says, believe in "compromise and negotiation".

The book clearly describes the struggle in the community as a basis for advocating community-based mass struggle. Unfortunately, though partly borne out by practical experience, this reinforces an unbalanced view of how struggle can and should develop. As anarchist-communists we have always argued for struggle in both the community and workplaces, with neither being prioritised. This was our strength during the anti-poll tax struggle when Trotskyists and others were arguing for workplace struggle to the detriment, and despite the material evidence to the contrary, of the effectiveness of community struggle. Unfortunately, in reaction to this discredited approach, Danny Burns goes too far in the opposite direction. Resistance to capitalism and the State must be, and we think will develop, in both the estates and neighbourhoods and in the factories and offices.

Unfinished Business: The Politics of Class War. AK Press. £4.50. 186 pages.

The Class War Federation argue in this book for the "re-creation of an independent revolutionary organisation within the working class, under the control of no-one but themselves". It explains the politics and structure of the CWF and has sections on Capitalism, the State, Class, Class Struggle and Revolutionary Organisations. As it modestly points out, it does not claim, like a left-wing party, to have all the answers. it is written in a clear style, as devoid of jargon as possible. Indeed, though it does not explicitly say as much, it is in many ways an excellent expose of anarchist-communist ideas.

The section on capitalism accurately describes the workings of the system, taking in consumerism and the role trade unions play in the maintenance of capitalism. Perhaps more attention could have been paid to the development of state capitalism in the USSR and its satellites, China, Cuba and Vietnam. Any idea of class struggle revolutionary theory must be emphatically divorced from the sham of state capitalism masquerading as "communism".

Class War enthusiastically reminds us of the traditions of the British working class which have been too often ignored by the Left. A minor quibble, and it is minor, would be the omission of the Diggers, much more radical than the Levellers in the English Civil War and the uncritical mention of the "volunteers that went to fight fascism in Spain during the Spanish Civil War". Remember, apart from the volunteers organised by the Independent Labour Party, many were members of the Communist Party and thoroughly imbued with Stalinism. They were unwittingly or knowingly involved in the sabotage of the Spanish revolution through Stalin's international, the Comintern. And why is this revolutionary tradition only British, not including for example the Paris Commune of 1871, the Russian Revolutions of 1905 and 1917, the German Revolution of 1918, the Hungarian uprising in 1956 and May 1968 in France, amongst others? A re-affirmation of the British revolutionary tradition should not mean that the internationalist baby gets thrown out with the bathwater.

The book makes no bones about the problems facing a potential revolution. It correctly criticises most of the anarchist movement (more of this later) for its ineffectiveness and selects an excellent passage from Arshinov's History of the Makhnovist Movement to highlight this. It counters the charges of anti-intellectualism levelled against the CWF by saying that "our aim is to make everyone an intellectual". It draws out the better points of the Organisational Platform of the Libertarians ie theoretical and tactical unity, collective responsibility and federalism, and endorses them. These and other passages are remarkably close to the positions of the ACF. We might not endorse words like "self-management (which could imply a form of self-managed capitalism) and we would not be so eager to use Nicaragua as an example of revolutionary struggle (you have to separate out the Sandinista government from any popular organisations that developed there, whilst asking how much the latter were manipulated by the former). Overall, however, the comrades of Class War should be congratulated on this book. We hope the criticisms made here are received in a comradely and constructive way, in the spirit in which they were given.

But hang on! I hear many readers now cry. If you agree as much with the politics of Class War, why aren't the ACF and CWF in the same organisation? The fact is there remain many differences of approach, and there is a problem with the ideas expressed by Class War in this book actually being translated into practice. But, yes, the development of ideas in the book is a healthy development and who knows what kind of dialogue could develop in the future?

Secret Ballot

Dear comrades,

Why does "Big Brother" keep a secret ballot?

Demokrassy prides itself on the fact that the ballot is secret. Even this pandering to the people is a lie as I found out on the 9th April. The voting clerk provides you with a ballot sheet including a number. This number is also on the stub and behind the stub they also write in pencil a coded number for your address. So much for a secret ballot. The ballot provides those in power with all the secret voting information they need. When you vote they cross off your name from the list. So they know whether you vote or not and which party you vote for.

I was considering voting Labour but when I saw the amount of voting information the minions of "Big Brother" have I reverted to type and scored a black cross over the whole voting form.

Its the same old story, one people, one country and three potential führers, but which one will it be, or will they all have to thrash about in a "hung" parliament. I'm tempted to say if you have a hung parliament why not take the opportunity to hang all the power-crazed bastards once and for all, but being a rationalist humanitarian, how about putting them all on the dole and making them pay poll tax as well!

Yours in freedom,
A.A., Edinburgh

Money?

Dear Organise!

In your article (issue 26) 'After the Revolution' you state about councils being operated on anarchist communist principles. "Equality of income" is mentioned. Surely in an anarchist communist society money which is a means of exchange will be abolished and people will take from society according to self determining needs and give according to their ability. The alternative of equal income is unworkable as how can anyone possibly decide what each individual gets in terms of a monetary reward?

The article goes on to talk about equal access to the resources and products of society. I think instead of equal access you should use the words free access.

There may well be some things especially after the revolution which will have to be rationed, however that will be the least of our problems, as we will have to get down to the work of making sure essentials such as food, good homes, healthcare, etc are freely available throughout the world.

By and large I enjoyed reading your magazine which is refreshingly different from the Leninist/Trotskyist drivel which makes me very cross.

For communism/anarchism

Letters from Abroad

Dear comrades,

Thank you very much for your magazine. I think that your magazine is very good. I read other magazines which are published by other anarchists in the West but your magazine is the best. With our magazine I can't compare it. You have very good articles about economy and other articles are interesting too. But, on the other hand, I think your magazine has too few articles about the anarchist movement in Europe, especially Eastern Europe. Some of your articles will be translated and published in our magazine Autonomie.

Our address in Prague is:
Autonomie, CAS, Box 223

Dear comrades,

Hello from Russia!

I'm a Russian anarchist, a member of a little anarchist group in a little town near Moscow. When my friends and I have read No 25 of Organise! magazine, then we have understood that we agree with ACF Aims and Principles and that much views and opinions of ACF coincide with ours... Our group is very little (consists of 6 members) and begun its activity 3 months ago. Unfortunately we have very little information about anarchist movement in other countries. Can't you help us and send something about anarchists in other countries and (of course) additional information about ACF? We are particularly interested in the Anarchist Communist Federation's views on the last events in Russia, Boris Yeltsin's role in them and the last events in Afghanistan.

M.S.
Chernogolovko, Moscow Region.

Dear Organise!

I've bought one of your issue (No. 24) and I've found it very good. Especially the texts which speak about anarchist theory. In France we have anarchist newspaper but all their articles are based on actuality and none about the history of anarchy or its thoughts. I know that actuality is important and must be seen through a critical point of view but it must not be the only subject in an anarchist magazine in my opinion. To conclude about this point I would tell you: "Continue the theory articles!".

I do a 'zine L'epingle Noire and do my best to change "their world where I've been bought" (demonstrations, pasting-up in the streets, promotion for anarchist newspapers; "Courant alternatif", L'epingle Noire...). For the third issue of my 'zine I've already done an interview of one member of the Class Struggle Anarchist Network (from England of course).

MALCOLM X

and corruption of the Nation's leaders. The Nation had consistently criticised the civil rights movement for their non-violent methods, but Malcolm X saw that they were able to pull out large numbers of black people, and wished to become involved in the demonstrations.

The final break with the Nation came with the position taken by Malcolm X over the assassination of President Kennedy. He stated that those who enslaved black people through violence would often die violently, and saw no need to mourn. Elijah Muhammad had wanted the Nation to remain quiet on this question. Malcolm X was forced out in March 1964.

He now set up a rival group, Muslim Mosque Inc, and after a pilgrimage to Mecca, the Organisation of Afro-American Unity, which was on a political, non-sectarian basis.

He was an independent leader of his own movement for only one year, before he was shut down, probably by Black Muslims, themselves possibly manipulated by the CIA. His 12 years as a faithful servant of Elijah Muhammad have to be divorced from his brief later period.

What he did do was drop the idea of a separate black nation in America. This took place slowly, and only a month before his death was he able to state that he no longer believed in a black State in America. "I believe in a society in which people can live like human beings on the basis of equality". In an interview printed after his death, he pointed out that he had not been using the term for several months, adding; "But I still would be hard pressed to give a specific definition of the over-all philosophy which I think is necessary for the liberation of black people in this country".

However, this process of development involved him in a number of illusions. He travelled through Africa, the Middle East and Europe and remarked that, "All of the countries that are emerging from under the shackles of colonialism are turning towards socialism... It's impossible for a white person to believe in capitalism and not believe in racism. You can't have capitalism without racism". He developed anti-capitalist positions, but was fooled by the "socialist" rhetoric of the newly emergent African states.

Ballots

Similarly, his position on parliamentary activity was far from abstentionist. "Don't be throwing out any ballots. A ballot is like a bullet. You don't throw your ballots until you see a target, and if that target is not within your reach, keep your ballot in your pocket".

Malcolm X was developing his ideas. As he himself said, "My whole life has been a chronology of changes". Perhaps further development would have moved him in a more revolutionary direction, perhaps not.

He was breaking with black nationalism. Unfortunately the number of revolutionary anarchists in the black working class was very small, and could not act as a powerful influence on his ideas.

The body of ideas he developed is not coherent, because of his constant evolution towards an anti-capitalist position. While the black nationalists claim him as their own, it can be seen from an examination of his ideas that he was moving beyond such a position. As he stated just before he was murdered, "I believe that there will ultimately be a clash between the oppressed and those that do the oppressing. I believe that there will be a clash between those that want freedom, justice and equality for everyone and those who want to continue the systems of exploitation. I believe that there will be that kind of clash, but I don't think that it will be based upon the colour of the skin, as Elijah Muhammad had taught it".

Next issue: the Black Panthers, Black Nationalism and the Black American anarchists.

Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary, class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution.

In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons about self-activity.

9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method.

We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

JOIN US!

War, exploitation, crime, poverty, racism, mass unemployment... If you're a reader of Organise! you'll know how rotten to the very core the system is. You have the capacity to critically question, to look the real world in the eye. You're not a dodger of the uncomfortable issues,and you've long ago given up believing in the hype of the politicians. You understand that whatever its weaknesses, the working class united cannot be defeated.

If, on the other hand, you're a Tory or Labour supporter, and if you're a still reading this, you're kidding yourself. Get serious or keep riding the train to hell. We're here to derail it.

If you're a Trotskyist and you're feeling sad, we don't blame you. For years you got radical, attacked Labour... and then were told to vote for Labour "with no illusions". Are your leaders for real? Do yourself a favour and ditch the leadership mentality.

The next step

The major political parties are only interested in maintaining the system. The vanguardist revolutionary groups are experts — in sabotaging struggles for their own party-building ends. What's needed is a credible alternative to the twin horrors of the 'free' market and state-managed socialism, otherwise known as state capitalism

Forward

We need to build a movement, organising in class struggle groups both locally and nationally. This enables us to work more effectively, co-ordinating our activity and supporting each other so that we are the credible alternative. Such an organisation would begin to make its presence known through effective propaganda and action whilst developing its theory in a lively, dynamic way in interaction with practice. This is the kind of organisation the ACF is building.

The ACF works towards a social revolution, not to seize power itself, but participating in a revolutionary process as working class people, to assist the class as a whole to destroy the present system and build a free society run through mass decision making.

We urge all those who agree with our aims and principles to join our organisation, the better to take part in this coming about. Write to our national address for details. Apply for membership. Now's the time!

Federalism

THOSE ANARCHISTS WHICH make up the major part of the movement are in one sense collectivist in the sense that they perceive the anarchist goal as being based upon communities of one sort or another. Anarchist-communists, in particular, envisage freedom and security etc within the context of a solidaristic society. In other words, our goal is not a world of individuals concerned simply with their own well-being, regardless of others but one in which personal freedom can be encouraged and developed for the benefit of all. Freedom comes from, and not in opposition to, community.

It is a misfortune of "collectivist" anarchists that the popular image of anarchism promoted for decades by the mass media is one of isolated individuals bent upon terror. The reality is that in the main, anarchists work in groups and some, like the ACF, seek to build large-scale national and even international organisations. We want a mass anarchist movement. The problems that present themselves, once we reject individualism, is how to organise the movement and, hopefully, a future society which gives the benefits of solidarity with the preservation of individual and collective freedom. How do we, in our revolutionary struggle and the eventual transformation of society, avoid the problems of bureaucracy, elites and power?

To quote from Malatesta, the Italian anarchist, "An anarchist organisation must... allow for complete autonomy and independence and therefore full responsibility to individuals and groups; free agreement between those who think it is useful to come together for co-operative action, for common aims; a moral duty to fulfil one's pledges and to take no action which is contrary to the accepted programme." (Il Risveglio, October 15, 1927) In other words, for an anarchist organisation to operate effectively on a principled basis, its members must combine freedom with responsibility, full participation in the decision-making processes with a commitment to carry out collective decisions. No anarchist organisation can be effective if its members act against the collective aims and methods. Equally, however, no organisation can be anarchist without total freedom to take part in the formulation of goals, aims and methods plus, ultimately, the right to withdraw from this process.

Summit

The usual method adopted by anarchists to combine freedom with organisation has been federalism. This idea is the reversal of the standard form of organisation in which decisions are made at the top by an élite and carried out by the rank and file. Under a federal system autonomous members of the organisation, organised within groups or branches at the base, make the decisions which are carried out by the organisation. Political power flows from the base to the summit, or rather from the circumference to the centre, since organisation is "horizontal" (ie based on equality) not "vertical" (ie based on inequality and hierarchy). In other words, anarchist organisations should be expressions of the collective voice, not directing centres which control people.

The basic "unit" is the member who voluntarily joins the organisation. Usually a member will be part of a local or industrial group which freely agrees to join a larger unit at say the district level. The district grouping is in turn affiliated to a regional body which is part of a national and ultimately international organisation. For example, smaller collectives take responsibility for their immediate areas of concern, involve themselves in other layers of decision-making and are bound by those decisions. A commune might perhaps decide on the location of a new hospital but the damming of a river which has much wider consequences, affecting several communes, would have to be agreed upon by a federation of communes. So long as each "unit" accepts the goals and methods etc it influences the orientation of the organisation. Should a "unit" disagree with decisions reached, it has the right to leave the organisation. However, if it has participated in the decision-making process, to quote Malatesta again, it has a duty "to take no action which is contrary to the accepted programme" so long as it remains in the organisation.

For a federal system to operate in an anarchist fashion there must be the greatest possible degree of involvement by members, free communication and blocks to prevent the development of leaders (eg. rotation and recall of any "officials" and ban on full-time posts). Strictly speaking, there should not be any officials as such. Each layer/segment of the organisation represents its views directly through the organisation's press and through temporary elected delegates. However, in the end, the health of any organisation is a reflection of the membership's enthusiasm and commitment.

Not only the anarchist organisation but also the anarchist world society would be run on a federal basis. There would be a multi-compartmental system of decision-making, from again the local to the international sphere. Each unit would have the right to secede and would have the right to self-determination in respect of its own affairs. The basic social unit would probably be the Commune or Soviet which would voluntarily federate to a wider body, say the region or the province. Delegates from the communes would at this next level concern itself with issues relevant to its mandate ie regional issues. The region in turn would affiliate to a national body or its equivalent since we expect artificial "nation-states" to disappear in an international society.

Ideal

So federalism is a straightforward form of organisation which combines the maximum individual and local freedom and autonomy with collective direction. It permits planning on a wide scale on the basis of mutual agreement, whether it be the revolutionary organisation or the anarchist society. Federalism, with its vital right to secession, safeguards the minority from the majority.

However, this is an ideal picture and federalism alone cannot create or preserve a free society. It must be combined with the elimination of centralised power, hierarchy, authority and inequality. Where these are preserved federalism becomes a sham which would fail its first major test, especially a potential secession.

In theory the Soviet Union was a federation of republics which enjoyed the right of secession. In reality, it was probably the most centralised of twentieth century nations. The self- proclaimed federation of Yugoslavia was (like the USSR) a federation of mutually hostile nations which were united at gunpoint. When in both countries the central authority failed, local nationalisms and rivalries re-emerged and the pseudo-federations disintegrated. These false-federations, based upon social, national and state inequalities, involved none of the essential features of the anarchist vision. Free federation is possible. It is the task of revolutionary anarchists and the working class to create it.

ORGANISE!

ORGANISE! IS THE national magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF). Organise! is a quarterly theoretical journal published in order to develop anarchist communist ideas. It aims to give a clear anarchist viewpoint on contemporary issues, and initiate debates on areas not normally covered by agitational journals.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and others open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us to develop our ideas further.

Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! — as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree with our A&Ps at all.)

Deadlines for next issue are 22nd February for features and reviews, and 5th March for letters and news.

All contributions for the next issue should be sent to:
ACF, c/o 84b Whitechapel High Street, London E1 7QX.

WITH FRIENDS LIKE THESE...

WERE YOU bewildered, or maybe sickened, by all those back-bench Tory MPs, The Sun, The Star, Paddy Ashdown and the bishops all expressing horror at the pit closures and pledging support? Were you maybe suspicious of the support the Labour Party gave the miners after how they behaved in 1984-5? And what did you think about Arthur Scargill getting chummy with the well-heeled residents of Kensington?

Alongside the threatened closure of 31 pits comes the massive redundancies and lay-offs in the car industry, amongst building workers and steelworkers and in London's teaching hospitals and the docks. The list goes on and on. Those still in employment in both the public and private sector face wage freezes and further rounds of sackings. A massive attack on the working class is being launched to pay for the chronic recession.

The massive pits closure was a spark that lit a big flare-up of anger throughout our class. The TUC mobilised hundreds of thousands of people. Yet, several months later, where is the anger, where are the mass mobilisations?

It is likely that the announcement of the pit closures was a play for power by Heseltine in order to win the leadership of the Tory Party. He banked on the support of the Thatcherite wing of the party, hoping that they would unite with him against their hated foe, the miners. He failed to realise that their animosity to him overrode any such consideration. The attack on the miners would have come sooner or later, but it was ineptly and untimely chosen.

Phoney

In order to defuse this anger the TUC, the media and other sections of the Establishment began their phoney campaign to save the mines. What could be more obscene than to see Winston Churchill, whose father ordered the shooting of miners, supposedly running to their defence. Or all the lie-sheets of the media, which unleashed a barrage of anti-miner propaganda, now lauding their praises.

The TUC and Labour Party, actively aided by The Daily Mirror, pushed for the two demonstrations of October 25 and 30, and both of these demonstrations were massive. After listening quietly to speeches by assorted clergymen, Liberal Democrat and Labour leaders and union bureaucrats, the demonstrations dispersed without incident. Both were restrained and 'orderly'. The TUC had won the day. They had successfully let a little steam be let off, without the crowds taking any radical action. They feel that this is enough now, and have no need to call any demonstrations. The arrival of marching miners in London in late December was not met by a demonstration, but consisted of a tour around the capital in an open-top bus!

The leadership of the National Union of Miners connived at this. They were content to mobilise 'public opinion' and to go through the courts to stop the closure of the pits. All this was designed to head off any action amongst both the miners and other sections of workers. No appeals were made for solidarity action from other workers in other industries, either those directly or indirectly affected by the knock-on effect of the closure of the pits.

Scargill is no different from other union bureaucrats. He uses radical rhetoric to disguise his manoeuvres. This writer remembers with anger the day a mass picket was planned to blockade Grunwicks in North London, where a long hard strike had gone on for months. Scargill turned up with a large battalion of miners, and then proceeded to lead them and thousands of others away from the factory on a walk-about. The mass picket was sabotaged. On that day in 1977 I was left standing with a hundred or so others, surrounded and outnumbered by the police. Yes, Scargill is a past master at defusing struggles!

Nationalist

With his allies in the Labour Left, like Skinner, Scargill talks about the need for 'British' coal, echoing the strong nationalist message in the TUC-Labour campaign of 'For Jobs and Recovery'. He has used the opportunity of going through the courts to delay any actions by miners, in the same way he called off mass pickets in the Great Strike after court orders. The left of the NUM apparatus, like Dave Douglass, has happily gone along with this use of the courts and obsession with public opinion.

As for the extreme left, they once again demonstrated their attachment to the unions and to the TUC, totally discredited among many workers. The Socialist Workers Party demanded that the TUC call a general strike! As if the TUC was willing or capable of doing such a thing. When the TUC did call a General Strike in 1926 they succeeded in limiting and enfeebling it and brought about the biggest defeat our class has ever suffered in this country. Groups like the Communist Party of Great Britain (The Leninist) rabbited on about preparing for a General Strike, with or without the TUC. Any effective strike action would mean not with or without but against the TUC!

All these different elements, from the TUC and Labour to the extreme left are attempting to limit and blinker any actions that the working class will take. The demonstrations and related activity were designed to divert and demoralise. People were meant to feel that they had done their bit, that after all, nothing could be changed, and that after a dreary walk through driving rain, they must go home and accept "Things as they are".

Refuse

But we are among those who are unwilling to knuckle under, who refuse to accept that social change cannot and will not come. The anger is still there, and it could ignite a social inferno!

The miners have been weakened by the defeat of the Great Strike. They have been decimated by redundancies. They cannot fight alone. If they do so, they will be defeated again, and demoralisation will be even greater. Any action by the miners must be independent action, decided upon collectively and with fully mandated committees, which actively seek to go out to other workers, those in industries threatened by the shutdown of the mines, like rail and steel workers, but also other workers under threat like health workers, tube workers, bank and insurance workers. Any occupation of the pits cannot take place in isolation, as some have advocated. They must go hand in hand with the sending out of delegates to other workplaces and industries, to mobilise regional and national stoppages. Blockades of road and rail on a mass scale could be usefully employed. The unemployed must be effectively involved in the struggle, with flying columns going to the dole queues. The working class population of each area, including housewives, the young and the old must be involved in any collective decision-making and mass action.

The battle to defend the miners is not just for the miners themselves. If the boss class win this battle they will feel even more confident and will press on with renewed confidence in cutting jobs and slashing services. The miners fight is the fight of the entire working class. Solidarity action is vital. Workers at Drax power station, a thousand of them, showed an example, when they struck in support of the miners on October 21. And the anger is building up in other workplaces. Health workers at University College Hospital in London successfully won their strike recently. Militant action is beginning to be taken. But action must come not in an isolated way, but with united joint action, seeking to draw in other workers.

STRUGGLE WORLDWIDE

Nigeria

TO CAMOUFLAGE THE nature of the military dictatorship in Nigeria the regime of General Ibrahim Babangida convoked elections for December 1992. The military regime has created its own political parties for the election, the Social Democratic Party and the National Republican Convention.

In the run up to the elections the military regime has increased its arbitrary detentions of political activists, prohibition of certain political activities, imposition of legal edicts and all sorts of militarist interventions.

The repression coincided with the increased balance of payments deficit (40 billion dollars) and hyper-inflation (32%) combined with the increasing social problems.

The increasing desperation of the regime has resulted in the closing of the universities since July and the persecution of university teachers and students.

The Babangida regime has also harassed journalists, arresting people working on the Lagos Daily News and an independent newspaper, the African Guardian. The four journalists arrested on the African Guardian had reported the murder of two students during clashes with the armed forces.

Among those still in detention are the four comrades of the Awareness League, a libertarian socialist group, Udemba Chuks, Garba Audu, Kingsley Etioni and James Ndubuisi.

They were arrested after one of the demonstrations by students and workers which have spread throughout the country during the last few months. The Awareness League comrades are imprisoned in appalling conditions.

The Awareness League has launched a campaign for their release, along with all the others detained. Any donations and pledges of support will be much appreciated. Make contact via Awareness League c/o Samuel Mbah, PO Box 28, Aghani, Enugu State, Nigeria.

Moldavia

TWO ANARCHISTS have fallen victim to the authoritarian nationalist regime in Moldavia. On 29 April Tamara Burdenko was dismissed for "violation of work discipline" from the review Kodry where she had worked for 14 years.

The real reason is the politics of her and her husband Igor Hergenreorder, who is disabled. Igor has written several articles in the opposition press analysing the warmongering policies of the Pridneestrovye regime. The Moldavian KGB have pursued Igor for these articles.

The chief editor has denied that Tamara was dismissed for political reasons. He is an ardent supporter of the government.

Dictator

The ultra-right National Christian Party has been organising a campaign to rehabilitate the Romanian fascist dictator Ion Antonescu, an ally of Hitler. This campaign has been supported by various government officials who follow the Romanian government. Igor and Tamara were among those who denounced fascism in a press declaration in July.

Since then the two libertarians have had their door kicked down by an unknown attacker who fled when the neighbours intervened. Two days later another unknown handed Igor a sack containing a dog's head. The day after, the TV news informed the public that the Russian Trans-Dniester separatists were setting up anarchist groups in the Moldavian capital. The State Public Prosecutor intends to press charges against the two, and their lawyer has said he will no longer defend them.

Send telegrams and postcards of protest to the following addresses. This is not a waste of time as the Moldavian government can be pressured to stop their witchhunt. A campaign earlier in 1992 led to charges being dropped against two anarchists in Russia.

Greece

THE ANARCHIST Group of Chania in Crete has published some extracts from a letter sent by an imprisoned militant, Vardis Tsouris. We reprint them here:

"They have imprisoned me, it must be two years now, because of my participation in a demonstration at Chania against the presence of the American Army, which constitutes a permanent war menace, particularly in that month of July 1990.

I was released thanks to the movement of support organised by the Chania Committee against the bases and dependence on the Americans. Today I'm back in prison. Why?

First of all for refusing to obey, because I refused the humiliation of presenting myself at the police station every month...an individual is free or not free. I don't want a mutilated liberty: in prison for saying no to the state, I have kept my liberty; outside as submissive citizen, I would have lost it. Secondly, for prevention. The government, overwhelmed by the recent popular awakening, have seen strikes and demonstrations proliferate, including at Chania. They want to isolate the presumed inciters.

But people don't come out in the streets because of an individual but because of their social conditions, and finally for their right to justice, economic equality and freedom.

I express my solidarity with all those who are opposed to the class in power, to capital, to the multinationals and to Maastricht...as well as to those who could join this opposition, because if things are bad then they'll get worse".

Vardis Tsouris has not been judged and if he is refused bail will spend another 18 months in jail. He is at present on hunger strike.

Mass demonstration

The mass demonstration at Chania on 23-24 July 1990 against the American bases has not been forgotten by the rulers. And the moment chosen to gaol Vardis Tsouris coincided with a period of general strike massively supported by the working class in response to a huge price rise on many products, as well as a rise in the rate of national insurance, drastically effecting the cost of living of working people. All designed so that on the eve of Maastricht the Greek economy becomes Euro-compatible.

Los Angeles

DONALD COLEMAN has been the first of 8,000 people arrested after the Los Angeles riots to be sentenced.

He received 19 years and 8 months from Superior Judge Nancy Brown for chucking a molotov cocktail into a 7-11 store on the second night of rioting.

This vicious sentence is a sign of what will come for all those arrested for daring to express their rage at their conditions, racism and State brutality.

Italy: Workers against the Unions

ENORMOUS CHANGES and great unrest, hardly reported on by the British media, have swept through Italy. The example given by the Italian working class is not one that the British rulers want us to take to heart.

The fall of the Wall and the defeat of state capitalism in Eastern and Central Europe led to a change of circumstances in Italy. The old system that had existed since the end of the last World War ended. The Christian Democrats (DC) had stayed in power in conjunction with a number of allies whilst the Italian Communist Party (PCI) who could muster 30% of the vote remained as an 'opposition' in a 'historic compromise'.

The government forces lost the complete support of the USA which had helped keep them in power, whilst the PCI dropped its pretence at opposition, changed its name to Democratic Party of the Left (PDS) along with its structure, and became a pretender to government as a credible 'democratic force'. All this happened over the heads of a population, in particular the large number of workers who had been under the ideological sway of the PCI, and who were further alienated by the actions of the political class.

Scandal

This was further aggravated by scandal after scandal concerning the political parties, first of all the Italian Socialist Party (PSI), and then the DC and PDS. Party officials had funnelled money into their own bank accounts or for the benefit of their party. A section of the magistrature led a series of investigations into these scandals, revealing the depth of corruption within the Italian State. There is a strong likelihood that elements within the State with the participation of certain sections of the ruling class gave these judges free rein, to help in a formal change of power in line with a 'United Europe'. These investigations failed to reveal all the wheelings and dealings of the secret services, the State engineered massacres and 'politics of tension' of the '70s and '80s. This would be too much to ask.

Animosity

At the same time the Leagues of the North emerged. These were political organisations created several years ago, with a pseudo-federalist rhetoric, playing on the animosity between the 'productive' North and a 'parasitic' Centre and South. The Leagues increased their electoral support at the last elections in April, passing from one MP to 80, and have consolidated their support in the great industrial centres of the North like Milan, Brescia, Bergamo, etc.

After the April elections a new government was cobbled together with a small majority on an anti-League basis, led by the 'socialist' Amato. The clear aim of this government was the destruction of the 'historic compromise' that has been the basis of the post-war Italian State.

House of Cards

The Italian economy, much vaunted as the fourth or fifth healthiest in the world, had become a house of cards. Consumerism, encouraged up to the present, became for the government, a danger leading to inflation. Everyone now had to make sacrifices. In July the unions (CGIL, CSIL, UIL) signed an accord with the government and the employers agreeing a wage freeze and the abolition of the sliding scale of wages (which adjusted wages with any rise in inflation). Of course, the union membership had not been consulted. The unions had, obviously afraid of working class anger, signed the accord during the annual closure of the factories.

In September, the Amato government launched a series of measures attacking the working class. Amongst the most vicious was the freeze of pensions and a raising of the age of retirement, the housing tax extended to lodgers and tenants, the ending of health benefits for many working class people and a tax on bank savings, as well as a rise in costs of driving licences, passports and other official documents. The excuse for all these measures was a huge State budget deficit. These measures, it is estimated, would put an additional 500,000 below the poverty line. In addition, rises in gas, electricity and rent were at the planning stage, as well as big cuts in social expenditure.

All the parties and unions supported the manoeuvres of the government, with the exception of Rifondazione Communista (a merger of those who had rejected the change of direction of the PCI with the Leftist group Democrazia Proletaria) and the Greens in parliament.

Outburst

To the great surprise of many, the token demonstrations called by the unions in mid-September turned into a huge outburst of working class anger. In Florence, Turin, Milan, Naples and above all Rome, the rallies were interrupted by slogan-chanting, whistling and the throwing of eggs and rotten tomatoes. The police had to be called in to protect the union bureaucrats behind riot shields! The union stewards waded into the crowd savagely beating workers and students with clubs. The media explained the events by saying that several dozen provocateurs, autonomists, anarchists and ex-terrorists had sabotaged the 'peaceful and democratic' demonstrations. In reality, newsreels revealed the mass nature of the discontent and the indiscriminate charges of the police in collaboration with the union stewards. In the workplaces the discontent was shown with 25% of workers not renewing their union membership this year. In Milan factory workers marched to the rail station, calling on the railway workers for support and blockaded the rails. Other blockades of rail and road took place in other areas. In Naples a crowd of factory workers stormed a meeting of the metalworkers union leadership. In terror, the union called a general strike in the area that night. In Milan a hundred workers wrecked a union H.Q.

Wildcat strikes then broke out in places like Venice, Florence, Ancona and above all at Genoa. Here the workers on the public transport system held a mass assembly, marched to meet the council workers, where another assembly was held, and called on the postal workers to join them. A march took place, bringing out large numbers of factory workers and sailors.

Sabotage

The unions attempted to limit the independent action of the workers by calling general strikes, but limiting them to regions. In Genoa they sabotaged the mass movement there by calling their own mass assembly and persuading workers to only strike for a day.

In response to the union manoeuvres, a number of organisations developed. Inside the CGIL union, a left emerged called Essere Sindicato (To Be Unionised). This was backed by Rifondazione Communista and represented an attempt to keep the struggle within the unions. The CUB (United Rank and File Confederation) was created outside the unions, rallying several thousand workers, above all among metalworkers. The COBAS (rank and file committees created in the 1986-7 wave of struggle), strong in the public sector, appear to be establishing links with CUB. Outside of these structures are the RDB (Rank and File Representatives) who appear to be federating, as well as structures created in the '70s, factory councils created by the anarchists and Autonomia Operaia.

All these structures came together to organise an alternative demonstration to the official union one in Rome on October 2. This brought out 30,000, demonstrating a desire of many workers to go beyond the unions.

The unions were able to use the tactic of 'saving democracy' with a temporary abating of working class anger, to divert attention from the government attacks and complicity by the unions. The relative weakness of the new forces of struggle allowed the unions to exploit the debates in the workplaces.

Block

In particular the neo-communists of Rifondazione Communista with their leftist allies can hope on increasing beyond the 18% support given to their union bloc, Essere Sindicato. Like it or not, they have a substantial number of workers under their ideological sway and can be counted on to block any future radicalisation of struggle. The strike of October 13 only lasted four hours and the unions were able to control events in the street, with the help of the neo-communists and the aid of the police.

What has been vitally important has been the mobilisation of large numbers of workers, organising outside the unions and on the streets, and the direct confrontation with the union bureaucrats. The independent structures increased their influence considerably in several weeks in September-October. Even Essere Sindicato will face problems in the future. Its bureaucrats hope for a few extra posts in the union leadership (but the established bureaucrats may put a stop to this if things calm down!).

On the other hand those workers supporting it have other expectations. Whatever happens, we can expect further momentous struggles in Italy, which can hopefully spread further afield and can inspire us all.

Uprising in the Land of the Rising Sun

WORKERS RIOTING ON the streets is not an image generally associated with Japan but that's just what happened last October in Osaka, Japan's second largest city. When unemployed day labourers, living on a day to day, hand-to-mouth basis had their emergency payments stopped almost 1,000 of them angrily took to the streets, constructing burning barricades and fighting 1,500 riot police for three consecutive nights.

To understand how this could happen in the mythical land of the happy worker we need to look beyond the image and at the history of Japanese capitalism's development of the past 120 years since the 1868 'revolution'.

Modern capitalist Japan has its origins in the revolution which saw the victory, after a civil war, of the lower Samurai class under the restored Emperor Maiji. The desire of this class was the creation of a secure Japan, using military might, and the development of a capacity to engage in imperialist adventures abroad. They realised that Japan's feudalistic system had to make way for Western-style emergent capitalism. In 1871 they formally 'abolished' feudalism and were on their way to developing a powerful economy based upon heavy industry.

Industrialisation

The Japanese State was, therefore, instrumental in advancing capitalism in a very direct fashion. Engaging in a massive industrialisation programme, setting enterprises up and then selling them off at knock-down prices to budding capitalists to run! It was a tradition very different to either the state capitalism of say, the Soviet Union or the nationalisation of industry in Britain.

Japanese capitalism soon took off and quickly a 'dual economy' developed with the emergence of a light industry sector, mainly textile producing and considerably less state-aided.

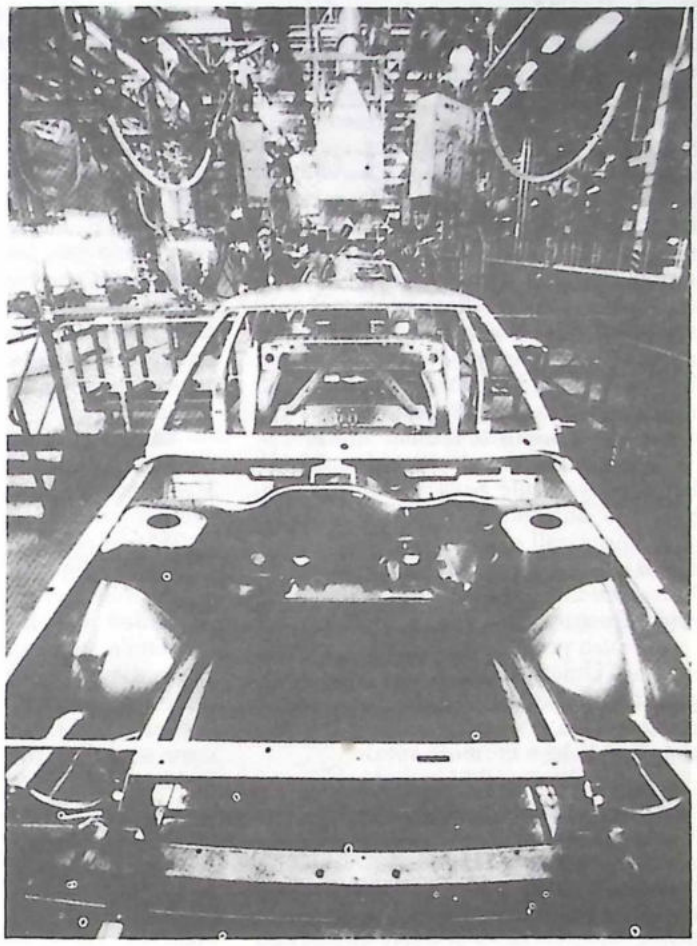
Employing mainly women workers it paid lower wages for longer hours in generally worse conditions than in the male-dominated heavy industry sector. This dual economy/dual workforce divide is still fundamental to Japanese bosses, but with some important differences.

Zaibatsu

The 1930s saw the development of the massive Zaibatsu companies, which dominate Japanese capitalism today. These giant corporate bodies were quick to embrace Taylorist management and production methods (not unlike the Bolsheviks in the USSR) and, hand in hand with the increasingly militarist and fascist State, mercilessly crushed attempts at workers' organisations.

The anarchist contribution to working class resistance at this time came in the form of the anarchist-communist Black Youth League and the All-Japan Libertarian Federation of Labour Unions (really more a specific anarchist-communist organisation than a union body) as well as the syndicalist minority union, the Japanese Libertarian United Conference of Labour Unions. There were, at their peak, more than 20,000 active anarchists in Japan. These groupings engaged in a ferocious struggle with Japan's bosses and State until their eventual suppression in 1937.

Despite Japan's defeat in the Second World War the Zaibatsu came out intact and actually having made a profit! However the de-industrialisation of Japan by the victorious allies led to 50% of the working population employed in more or less permanent agricultural labour. However, once the reins of economic self-determination were handed back to the Japanese bourgeoisie the State intervened strongly with a programme of re-industrialisation whilst also launching a phenomenal export drive.



Sub-class

The division of the working class continued with the creation of a 'sub class' of what could be described as semi-unemployed alongside what some have misleadingly labelled a labour aristocracy. The 'semi-unemployed' consists of workers employed on a temporary, seasonal or day labour basis, by the Zaibatsu giants (like Toyota, Mitsubishu, Nissan etc) and workers in small firms which are themselves often subcontractors, subsidiaries or suppliers of the giants.

These latter workers often find themselves working for lower wages, for longer hours and in worse conditions than those privileged to sweat for Zaibatsu.

But what of the permanent Zaibatsu workers (who incidentally make up only 30% of the Japanese workforce)? Do they really fit the image of the happy company-loyal employees as portrayed in the West?

Zaibatsu are certainly loyal; there is little alternative when your wages are paid according to time served rather than skill. Put simply, loyalty tends to exist when workers can only raise their level of income by staying with the firm! Satashi Kamata's Japan in the Passing Lane: An Insider's Account of Life in a Japanese Auto-Factory is well worth a read. His descriptions of seemingly ever-increasing workloads on

DEBATE

WHAT SHOULD WE DO

WE ARE OPENING THE pages of Organise! to a debate on the unions. Included are the text of a leaflet handed out at a recent Socialist Movement conference on the unions, a letter sharply attacking the leaflet, a letter from a DAM member in reply to the article in Organise! 27 on the unions and an editorial reply.

Text of ACF (London) leaflet

CONSTANT government-employer attacks on workers' rights and conditions coupled with the illegalisation of any useful workers' actions have been met with total compliance by the unions. It has always been so, to one degree or another, but now, all union strategies are based on the acceptance of total defeat.

Some proposals to counter this are:

"Elect a left-wing leadership...the Labour Party should back the unions...Repeal the anti-union laws...TUC get off your knees, call a general strike..! Create broad left campaigns in order to get broad left candidates into positions of power and influence..."

All such proposals are simply a waste of time. Unions have always been compliant with the ruling class. Today, their collaboration is overt. In previous years they had to be a bit more subtle.

Starting point

If you want social justice for the working class of the world, a general starting point is anti-capitalism. Unions have never been anti-capitalist (although many union members are). The job of the union is to alleviate the sufferings of workers within the present system. This has developed into things like legal help, pension funds, various deals with management over wages, hours and conditions. Sometimes the union may even call for a strike in defence of all the workers, but only if workers are really pushy in their demands. All these are not in themselves 'bad' aims. But it stands to reason, that to truly serve the cause of the workers, this requires total and ceaseless hostility to the system based on the naked exploitation of our labour.

Trade unions have tried to have it both ways. In the past they may not have 'liked' capitalism very much (today they are staunch supporters of it) but at the same time they knew that they had to be legally recognised by the bosses. It is this legality which has been the kiss of death to any revolutionary movement. At the same time legality has allowed the growth (and now decline) of a reformist workers' movement.

Unions love the law, they will bend over backwards to ensure their members obey it. Increased anti-union laws, sequestration, etc, haven't led unions to love it any less, let alone break the law. The unions' response to such attacks is to protest without action and vainly hope that some day, Labour will get elected and repeal those 'bad' laws — ironic really as trade unions were originally born out of illegality.

Added to this, we have the unions' traditional link with the Labour Party. Historically, Labour has always been for 'worker friendly' capitalism.

This, of course, is a contradiction. Labour governments have also suppressed strikes (on occasion even using troops), defended the Empire against independence movements, brought in the Prevention of Terrorism Act, attempted wage freezes and have been responsible for the Social Contract and the 5% wage norm as well as the introduction of monetarism. This was when the Labour Party still talked about 'socialism'. Now they have dropped all such pretences.

But what about the social gains brought about by the unions and the Labour Party? Yes there have, in the past, been real gains. But how did these come about? Nothing has ever been given freely by governments, workers have had to fight for it. And though reformers have claimed the credit for them, in reality all social gains have been won by strikes, occupations, sabotage and riots by militant sections of the working class. In short, by direct action (something Labour and the unions are totally opposed to) and workers' solidarity.

We don't need to tell you that Labour and the union bureaucrats have always been against such struggles. Indeed, anyone who's ever been involved in a dispute knows only too well that half the battle is actually against the union and its attempts to control or water-down our struggle.

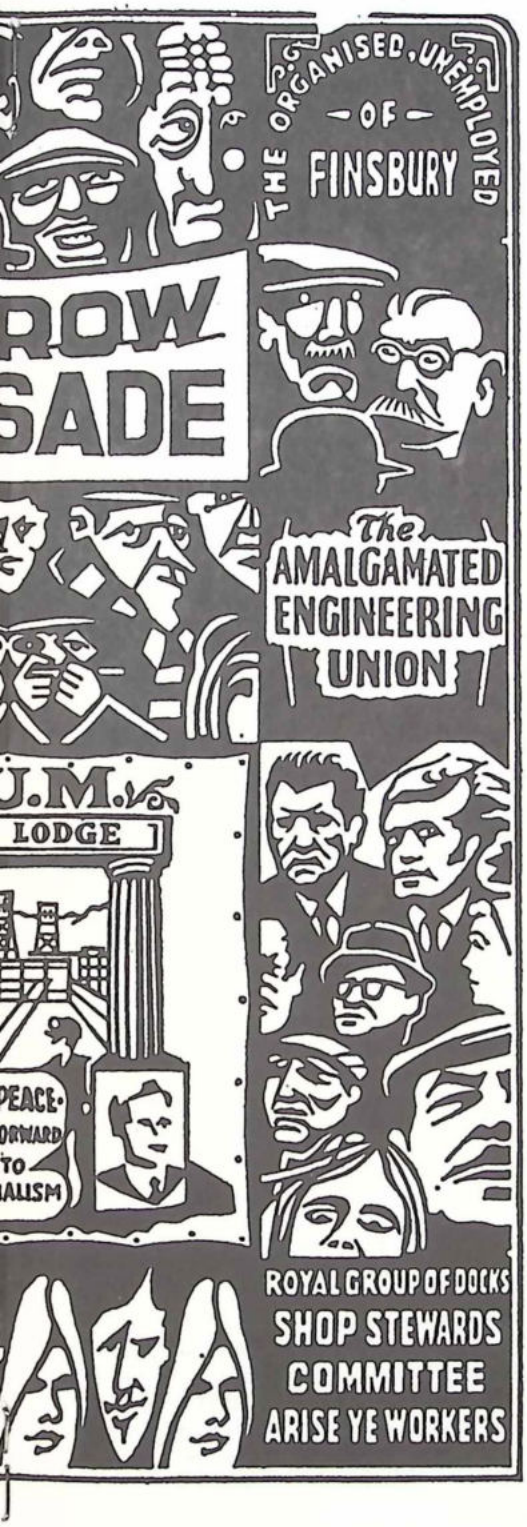
"We need left-wing leadership". The history of the labour movement is littered with sincere socialists who, once in power, have turned out to be just as bad, or worse, than the rightists. Those who have tried not to compromise their ideals have achieved nothing for the workers. One-time leftists are accused of 'selling-out', but in truth, can it really be any other way? After all, what has a union leader got in common with a shop floor worker? To the worker, the union bureaucrat is pretty indistinguishable from the boss. In fact, many union leaders see themselves as being part of the same clique as the bosses. For workers, any meaningful change can only come from below. Real workers power lies in our own hands.

ABOUT THE UNIONS?



A way forward

One positive step would be the creation of a strong rank and file movement. In the past, such movements tended to put pressure on union leaders, 'democratise' the unions, create left-wing unions or have been vehicles for getting rank and file workers into positions of power. Such tactics have always led to stagnation and betrayal.

The best rank and file movement is one which acts as a workers' solidarity movement, a reservoir of strength and support for those in struggle. It needs to be a movement of the base, with union officials actively barred from involvement. Above all it must be combative, unafraid of the law and should base its tactics on direct action. As a movement it should be independent of all parties, its allegiance being to the working class only. Such a movement is long overdue.

Yet rank and file movements are not necessarily revolutionary or anti-capitalist. Revolutionary workers need to build groups and networks both in their workplaces and across industries. Such groups should work across union boundaries also. Such groups should aim to spread revolutionary ideas among rank and file workers and should also try to oppose reformist trends in rank and file organisations. (e.g. illusions in union leaders and political parties). Such groups should be overtly anti-capitalist, anti-trade union, and hostile to all political parties. They need to be autonomous by nature, not controlled from outside but directly by their members. They should urge maximum resistance to the boss class and seek abolition of the capitalist system and the creation of a society based not on profit but on meeting human needs.

And the Unions?

Unions have always been defensive. Today, they don't even do this. They need to be replaced by a workers' movement that is not defensive but actively goes on the attack and has as its ultimate goal, the total transformation of society.

Letter in reply from Dave Douglass

DEAR COMRADES,

Just a line to say how utterly bad /inaccurate/counter-revolutionary your What's to be Done about the Unions? leaflet is.

Actually describing yourself as anti-trade union certainly puts you in the same camp as the Tories and big business.

To be anti-union is simply anti-working class in this and many other necks of the woods.

You could have no credibility among workers, in any workplace I know with an anti-union position.

In fact you'd just be regarded as a strike breaker, a scab or a 'non' which is a scab waiting to happen.

Look around you — 100,000 workers on strike at one time — all at one time — unions are combat organisations, albeit often deformed, betrayed or distorted by bureaucracy but it is within unions that people at work first take up the cudgels with the boss.

I refer you to my extended examples of this in the current edition of The Heavy Stuff, 'Charge of the Left Brigade'.

I'm afraid comrades, your enthusiasm to be radical and 'agin it all' has carried you over the class line at least as far as this pathetic leaflet is concerned.

I suggest you urgently and thoroughly rethink your position:

a) Where is the Class?
b) How does it fight when it fights?
c) Where do we stand while that fight is ongoing?

Obviously you believe the answer to c) is outside telling the workers how "you've got it all wrong again".

We are such simpletons.

Revolutionary greetings,

Dave Douglass
National Union of Mineworkers
Bloody Proud of It.

EDITORIAL REPLY: Hardly surprising to receive such a letter from you, Dave. In anarchist circles you put yourself over as the fine flower of the working class, a down-to-earth rank and file worker. When in fact you are heavily implicated in the NUM structure as a full-time official (vice-chair of South Yorkshire NUM panel) and have your own column in the Daily Worker, newspaper of the fiercely vanguardist Communist Party of Great Britain. Here you talk about the "self-serving slogans" of various Trotskyist groups which keep them on the fringes of most workers' perceptions. Perhaps you should tell this to the CPGB. Isn't being a full-time union official and a supporter of a Leninist organisation in contradiction to being a member of Class War?

Anyway to get to the point. First the hysterical and abusive language you employ. To call someone a scab or strike-breaker is a very serious charge. No one in the ACF has ever been guilty of this. We have enthusiastically supported all workplace struggles.

Many of us did active solidarity work in the last Miners' Strike, some of us in the previous two. We also actively worked in solidarity action for P&O and Silent Night strikers, the Wapping Printworkers, the list is long. This does not mean that we ever supported the union bureaucrats.

Sabotage

No, you're wrong. Many workers are on different levels aware that the unions are incapable of defending their interests. The history of class struggle in the car factories points to this.

Just look at the declining membership of the unions. Workers aren't leaving or failing to join the unions because they lack class consciousness. They see clearly that it is a waste of time and money joining an organisation that does not defend their interests.

On the underground, on the rail, in the docks, the unions have worked consistently to sabotage any action by workers organising themselves. In the recent wave of strikes in Greece and Germany, the unions successfully stymied independent workers action.

In Italy (see elsewhere in this issue) the working class moved outside and against the unions. In the next wave of class struggle throughout the world, workers will increasingly move outside the unions, creating new forms of organisation.

This will be the reality. Those people still in love with the unions will either have to re-think, or be a barrier to any advances in the war with the bosses.

Reply to 'Unions' article

DEAR COMRADES,

I was very interested to read the article in Organise! No. 27 on 'Organising in the Workplace'. It is good to see that you are trying to confront this issue which is of vital importance. I write as a member of the Public service workers' network, a body recently set up by members and ex-members of DAM.

Unfortunately, there are a number of errors in your article which give it a narrow sectarian tone. You really should ditch this council communist dogma about all unions necessarily ending in a mess of hierarchy and sell-outs regardless of how they are structured, composed, or politically oriented. Leave this kind of ultra leftist posturing to the likes of the ICC and Subversion. In my view, at this point in history the working class has a wealth of historical experience to draw on and should be able to avoid many of the mistakes of the past in the organisations it builds. Also, as the ACF-model 'networks' will not actually dirty their hands with real struggle (as this would presumably be reformist) they will remain purely propaganda networks — little more than workplace branches of the ACF. You don't have to have cosy 'beer and sandwiches business meetings' to win concessions off the bosses — look at all the 'unofficial' disputes that have won gains!

The alternative we put forward is to build networks which whilst starting out like yours as propaganda networks, aim to become fighting organisations, tools in the class struggle. These will be shaped by the needs of the workers on the ground, but will be informed by the history and practice of anarchism/anarcho-syndicalism. It seems stupid for all three libertarian left organisations in Britain to support separate industrial networks in a sectarian way. (What would Makhno have said!) An Anarcho syndicalist union is a long way off — so why does the ACF erect this as a barrier against working in cooperation with anarcho syndicalists seeking to build industrial networks?

We would like to believe that you would not put the ideological purity of your organisation before the interests of the class.

We would like to see members and non-members of DAM, ACF and CWF working together on the task of building industrial networks and a culture of resistance in the workplace.

in the spirit of comradely criticism
Paul F. PSWN/DAM (S.Yorks)

EDITORIAL REPLY: Thanks for your constructive letter, Paul. Perhaps our article on workplace organisation was not clear enough. We were not arguing against fighting for immediate needs, in terms of pay and conditions. We agree with you that 'unofficial' disputes have won gains. Of course we want to be involved in 'real struggle'.

Although we think that anarcho-syndicalism had its faults and has been transcended, we agree there is much to learn from it. However, we take issue with your statement that unions need not necessarily end in a "mess of hierarchy and sell-outs, regardless of how they are structured, composed, or politically oriented". Only workplace groups and networks can advance independent working class struggle. Unions, however they are structured, always end up negotiating away workers' interests. Workplace organisation cannot be based on a union, even if it is anarcho-syndicalist or even assemblyist. Effective organisation has to go beyond the particular factory/industry; it must draw in workers in all workplaces in the area, and go beyond the workplace into the neighbourhood/locality. Yes, the struggle at the point of production is vitally important, but an effective struggle must break down the false barriers in life under capitalism, between workplace and 'community'. In their pamphlet on unions Wildcat point out that territorially based struggles have the greatest subversive potential. This was well-illustrated by the anti-poll tax movement. This is one reason we call ourselves anarchist communists, because we want to destroy the artificial barriers between struggle in the workplace and the neighbourhood.

As regards cooperation in one united network. This is something that the ACF will have to discuss nationally before we can give you an answer. Obviously we are in favour of the unity of revolutionaries. However one obstacle would be disagreements over whether or when an anarcho-syndicalist union could be set up. Such differences led to the breakup of the Communication Worker group in the postal depots. A point would come when DAM members would be arguing for the establishment of an anarcho-syndicalist union. The question arises as to how much joint work, and on what level, anarchist communists and anarcho-syndicalists can cooperate in the short and medium term.

We hope to continue with this debate in future. Next issue we review two pamphlets: Dave Douglass' pamphlet on the unions and Wildcat's reply to it.

The Death of the AWG

The Anarchist Workers Group was set up in June 1988. Their expressed aim was to build a "libertarian communist organisation that can — for the first time in this country — put it truly where it belongs: centre stage in the arena of class struggle.." Four years later the AWG has dissolved itself and most of its members have retreated into private life, with two or three gravitating to a Leninist magazine Analysis. Organise! takes a look at the politics of the AWG and why it collapsed.

THE AWG LEFT the anarcho-syndicalist organisation, the Direct Action Movement, because they disagreed over building syndicalist unions in Britain. They criticised this strategy as being divorced from reality and added, looking at the example of Spain during the Civil War there, that a "revolutionary union does not guarantee a revolution". ACF members would agree with them on this point, and indeed the DAM's attempt to construct a syndicalist union, the Dispatch Industry Workers' Union, collapsed in mid-1992 in apathy.

The AWG went on to produce four issues of a magazine Socialism from Below. In the first issue there was a major article on 'Anarchism in the Thatcher Years'. Most of the analysis of British anarchism was correct enough, and the ACF would agree with it. They stated that British anarchism had been divorced from class struggle, and that for years anarchists had been content to live 'outside' of society, and was seen as a 'counter-cultural' rebellion at society's fringes rather than a dynamic force.

Watershed

They quite rightly saw the Miners' Strike of 1984-5 as a watershed in recent British anarchist history. Many activists began to "rediscover the class roots of anarchism and realise how far the movement had strayed from them. From the Miners' Strike and through to the end of the printers' dispute at Wapping many were forced... to make the break and embrace the class struggle".

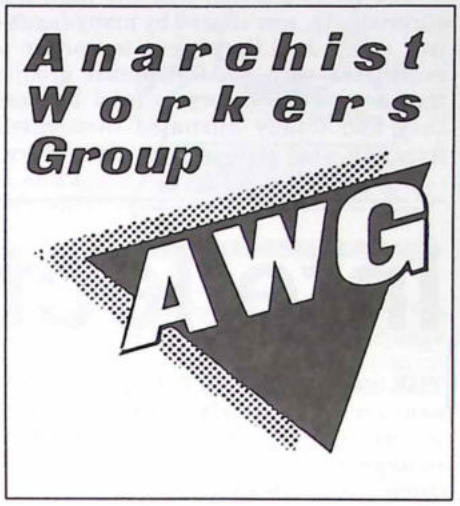
The AWG also, with reason, pointed to the lack of politics in anarchist support for the miners' strike. There was a refusal to criticise Scargill and the NUM leadership, activity being reduced to unquestioning support of the NUM.

However, the general analysis went on to consider specific Anarchist organisations, and here the tone was extremely patronising, particularly as the AWG owed its existence to political developments that had taken place in DAM, the ACF and Class War, before the AWG had even existed. When they analysed ACF politics they showed little interest in a real examination. Their analysis was more of a dismissal, accusing us of ultra-leftism, without adequately explaining what they meant by this term.

Indeed the politics that the AWG developed was partly shared by the ACF, in terms of the need for class struggle politics, and theoretical and tactical unity. However they did not share similar positions on the unions, on nationalism, and as time passed their concept of organisation began to evolve. The ACF, long before its discovery by future AWG members, had taken a look at the Organisational Platform of the Libertarian Communists, a document produced in 1926 by Makhno, Arshinov and other Russian anarchists, that persuasively argued for a strong national anarchist organisation based on tactical and ideological unity. However, we saw faults in the Platform. It is one of the most important statements by revolutionary anarchists, but it contains certain errors and has been superseded by, for example, the Manifesto of Libertarian Communism (An ACF pamphlet, available from national address). The AWG however treated the Platform as if it was a biblical text, to be worshipped without question. The Platform group learnt a lot from the defeat of anarchism during the Russian revolution, but they were to some extent in awe of the centralised efficiency of the Bolshevik victors.

Leadership of Ideas

The AWG came to many of the same conclusions as the ACF in their article on organisation in No.2 of their journal. They took on board the idea of 'leadership of ideas' developed inside the Organisation of Revolutionary Anarchists in the '70s and continued within the ACF. This idea calls for anarchism to become the leading concept of the revolution. This leadership is purely at the level of ideas and should not be confused with the political monopolisation of struggle advanced by Leninist vanguard parties. Like the ACF, the AWG recognised the contradiction between a politically advanced minority and the rest of the working class, and therefore of the danger of substituting the will of the minority for that of the whole class. Unlike the ACF however, it failed to realise that the best way to avoid these pitfalls was by as actively as possible empowering the class as a whole, by advocating the most libertarian forms of organisation and struggle (see our pamphlet The Role of the Revolutionary Organisation for a discussion of these problems). Instead they argued for a 'cadre organisation' of trained revolutionaries, skilled in public speaking, writing articles and leaflets etc. Now, the ACF would not deny that anarchist communist militants should develop these skills and that indeed a revolutionary organisation should help this come about. But the AWG actively froze the relation between the anarchist militant and the mass of the population by using concepts derived from Leninism, themselves derived from French military theory; the cadre as a permanent officer class ready to control the conscript mass. They did not talk half enough about the need to help the majority of the class to develop liberating skills. Indeed the AWG 'cadre' meant to withstand the harsh political climate was unable to survive more than four years.



Finally, on the question of national liberation the AWG steered a path that smashed them on the reefs. With the Gulf War the AWG stated in Socialism from Below 3 that it stood "alone on the libertarian left for concentrating our fire on Western imperialism. Most anarchist groups, inspired by either pacifist or left communist ideas, have refused to take sides and instead raised the slogan 'No War But the Class War!'... ". The AWG stated that this position (one adopted by the ACF) was "appropriate for an inter-imperialist conflict such as the First World War, but when applied to a conflict between the leading imperialist powers on the one hand and a bankrupt, debt-ridden Third World nation on the other, this position has reactionary implications.. The 'plague on both your houses' approach is based on an assessment that there is no essential difference between Iraq and the US-led imperialist forces". Now, this argument implied that Saddam was less of a threat to the working class than the Western powers. As we said at the time, "In the global league table of capitalist states, certain countries and alliances will always be stronger and more influential in particular periods than others...it is impossible to offer 'political support' to Hussein's force without also supporting the attacks on the Iraqi working class that must accompany the switch to a war footing".

Leninists

The AWG position was one that, not surprisingly, was shared by many Leninists, and indeed they began to work in a committee with small Leninist groups that argued for victory to Iraq. By now they had totally alienated themselves from the class struggle anarchist movement, despite some attempts at back-pedalling in the last issue of their mag. Demoralised and unable to grow they wasted away.

The AWG experience is one that should be looked at in finding out what not to do in developing anarchist communist theory. With the collapse of Stalinism, a new period has opened, with the reemergence of anarchist communism. However anarchist communism is still a weak current, and is still prone to the influences of on one hand Leninism (the examples of the AWG and the Anarchist Workers Association/Libertarian Communist Group in the '70s) and on the other hand the ivory tower irrelevance of the left communist milieu. The AWG sincerely hoped to make class struggle anarchism relevant, but failed to withstand the influences of Leninism. Those ex-AWGers and those influenced by AWG politics should seriously consider the lessons of the AWG collapse.

Intellectualism

THE 20th CENTURY has been the century of the intellectual — and nowhere more so than in the field of bourgeois politics. Intellectuals produced the two most horrendous totalitarian regimes of this century. The writings and sayings of dictators like Lenin and Hitler weren't a purely incidental part of their political careers. Such intellectual activities were key instruments in their rise to power, just as military prowess was the key to Napolean's. Hitler's Mein Kampf and Lenin's Imperialism, (amongst other writings) were what put them on the map. The quality of their writings, in terms of logic and evidence, may have been patchy. But these were masterpieces of propaganda, texts for frustrated like-minded egotists to grab hold of to make into a political agenda of their own.

Marxist-Leninist tracts like Imperialism gave dramatic, bitter and black and white explanations of capitalism's world practice. There was a vividly pictured world vision of international arch-villains versus Lenin's own followers as heroic agents of destiny. Knowledge of this text meant the reader could find within it the master keys to history, without the drudgery of having to cope with the complexities of reality.

Likewise, Hitler's Mein Kampf created another world vision, peopled by whole races assigned their disparate roles in the grand, megalomaniac scheme of history, and made titans or devils according to one man's imagination. Drivel? Yes. Effective? Also yes.

Revelation

Fascism and the so-called 'communism' of the Bolsheviks, both totalitarian systems, traced their genesis to an intellectual phenomenon. They appealed to the same prejudices and susceptibilities of intellectuals as other crusades and movements that have seized the imagination of the educated and the articulate — the so-called 'thinking people'. These movements have in common a sense of a revelation grasped only by the anointed, but a revelation that needs to be imposed on the benighted masses for their own good. Could anything be more of an ego trip, or more in keeping with the intellectuals' exalted view of themselves, or their resentment at seeing power in the hands of lesser beings?

To a certain extent it can be understood that working class people sucked into this maelstrom of bourgeois struggle were there through genuine conviction, a conviction that unfortunately cedes control over to social minorities, but nevertheless is burning with ardent desire to trash the capitalist system. Among the amazing stories of this century are the pilgrimages of intellectuals to the lands of the dictators, only to come back to gush over the 'progress' of tyrannies whose subjects were making desperate escapes whenever they could. When the facts of massacre and abuse were too blatant too deny, the explanation was that these were the 'growing pains' of a new society or 'local excesses', and we were reminded that "you can't make an omelette without breaking eggs". Much later the evidence was for all the world to see, that, yes, in the Ukraine the famine which killed millions had been deliberately engineered. This didn't matter to the intellectuals, eggs were broken and that was that. The fatal talent of the intelligentsia is facility with words — and a blindness to the fact that reality is not so malleable as language.

Anarchist-communists have no argument with the pursuit of knowledge. Intellectual pursuits, argument, philosophising, all these activities have their place in society.

But in the absence of a society which encourages in each individual that individual's full potential, we have to be on guard against privileged minorities who build political structures and weave sophistries upon the bedrock of specialised knowledge and elitism. There is no shortcut to the revolutionary solution, better that we make mistakes and learn from experience, rather than be taken in by any offers by intellectuals.

Whether those intellectuals be academics philosophising or pseudo-Marxist Trotskyists attempting to revitalise the creeds of Leninism, this much is certain. The past is irrevocable, but many of the factors behind its tragedies are still at work in the present, and a danger to the future. The issues change — but the dogmatism and the ego behind the dogmatism are the same.

a never-ceasing track transforming workers into assembling automatons brilliantly explodes the myth of the 'happy worker' in Japan.

Much has been made, in recent years, of the introduction of 'Japanese' techniques of management into the West (read exploitation). These techniques, so beloved of some British bosses, have ever-increasing productivity as their objective, use Taylorist, Fordist and Human Relations schools and have proved highly successful. Also important has been the role of the trade unions in Japan. Their total integration into capitalism is considerably more obvious even than in Britain where the unions at least have some appearance of independence from management.

Closed Shop

Before World War Two few Japanese workers were unionised. Many who were belonged to militant syndicalist unions (like those mentioned above) which were crushed in the general political reaction leading up to war. Japanese unionism re-emerged after the War and rapidly fell in with the ruling classes' programme of industrial reconstruction. Today one of the striking features of the trade unions is their operation in a closed shop environment encouraged (where it is not enforced) by the management of the Zaibatsu. The infamous company unions organise only Zaibatsu workers and indeed only 29% (1989) of that sector's employees. There have been few attempts at unionising the 'semi-unemployed' day labourers and small firm workers. Zaibatsu unions are viewed, rightly, by most workers as simply a part of management and a rubber-stamp for the bosses designs.

A particular area of discontent in Zaibatsu companies is around the extremely long hours. On average the Japanese worker slaves between 200 and 500 hours per year longer than their 'Western' counterpart. Less than 20% of full-time workers get two-day weekends. The truth is that Japan's relative economic health is reliant upon ultra-exploitation. But the world recession has also seen Japanese capitalism expand its industrial base to its Asian neighbours, such as South Korea and Malaysia, and even 'Communist' China, where lower wages and poorer working conditions are enforceable. Wherever workers manage better wages and conditions companies have moved to more exploitable areas.

The day-labourers in Japan itself have tended to bear the brunt of the recession, however, and it is these workers, many from the Burakumin (hamlet people) caste, who suffer minority discrimination and who are the most potentially combative of the Japanese working class. In the face of vicious exploitation they have developed a strong sense of community solidarity and a spirit of comradeship that is often lacking in the full-time Zaibatsu workers. Alongside the 'colonised' workforces this super-exploited layer of the Japanese proletariat may prove to be the catalyst for mass social struggle in the Far East.

REVIEWS

What is Anarchism? An Introduction. Freedom Press. £1.95. 74pp.

This pamphlet consists of an introductory three chapters from Donald Rouum, the Wildcat strip cartoonist, and a number of excerpts from anarchist writings, mainly from the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Some of these excerpts, particularly those from the well-known international activists like Bakunin, Kropotkin and Malatesta are well-argued exposés of revolutionary anarchism, based on reason and common sense. However, some of the later texts leave much to be desired. Take for example the text, 'The Relevance of Anarchism' by Bill Christopher, Jack Robinson, Philip Sansom and Peter Turner. They state that the heart of anarchism is "its opposition to government". Right, as far as it goes. But the historic anarchist movement grew from the development of working class organisation from the late 1860s on, and was a result of opposition to capitalism. It was and is, anti-state and anti-capitalist. To leave this vital ingredient out is to reduce anarchism to a vague humanist, liberal, individualist response to hierarchical society.

To compound this error, they go on to discuss the one big happy family of anarchism. "...Each anarchist will make his own moves and if we respect each other we will respect our own comrade's scale of priorities". So anarcho-syndicalists, individualists etc are meant to tolerate each other and co-exist in the same 'movement'. Any idea of collective decision-making and collective responsibility goes out of the window.

Similarly, in the section by Donald Rouum, various currents are described as anarchist. "There are anarchists who believe that wars and war preparations, penury, intolerance, oppression and other features of government are permanent features of society, and that therefore the only role for anarchists is permanent protest." He goes on to describe another 'current', those who believe that "the overall trend of social change has been in the direction of wider individual choices". What he is describing in the first place is a form of liberalism where if the wheels of democracy are oiled enough then capitalism can be tolerated. In the second place he is describing another form of liberalism where everything is getting better bit by bit. Neither of these ways of thinking have anything to do with revolutionary anarchism. And in fact there are very few now who call themselves anarchists either here or elsewhere in the world, who subscribe to these views.

The 'Movement'

Donald Rouum repeats this elsewhere in the book where he states that few anarchists are in the formally structured organisations. Now, the 'movement' has evolved over the last 15 years, to the point where British anarchism is re-affirming its class struggle base, and where most anarchist activists are in one of the national organisations. In fact what Donald Rouum describes as the movement in this country bears more resemblance to that of the '60s than to the '90s.

The end result of the pamphlet, despite some excellent excerpts from anarchist thinkers, is an impression of a confused and contradictory mish-mash of opposing ideas and currents all within one big happy family. This has been the political morass from which the ACF and other class struggle anarchists in this country have pulled themselves out. As such, the pamphlet will not go very far in answering the interested individual's question of 'What is Anarchism?'.

A Short History of Political Violence In Britain. Martyn Everett. 60p. 16 pages. Available from ACF London.

Our comrade Martyn states at the beginning of this absorbing little pamphlet that, "My purpose in writing this short history is to demonstrate that political violence is a tradition in Britain. It is a tradition of the British state, the British ruling class, and the institutional pillars of British society".

In this pamphlet he focusses on the use of physical violence as a weapon of state, excluding all out war, and in most cases the repression after major insurrections. As Martyn points out, the State has never been slow to resort to political violence to protect its interests, privilege and power. State violence from the time of the establishment of the Norman ruling class through the Peasants Revolt right up to the Great Miners' Strike and the Great Poll Tax Riot are documented. A grim account it is too.

As Martyn concludes, "The political representatives of the armed state, with their privileged access to mass-circulation newspapers, and nationally broadcast electronic media, are ready to denounce some kinds of violence at the drop of a hat. What they cannot, and will not denounce is the systematic violence that underpins the structure of power they benefit from".

Well worth a read!

Trotwatch. An Anarchist Commentary on the Life of the Left. Volume 1, No.1. £1, £5 to lefties.

This droll and well documented journal puts a variety of squirming Trotskyist and other Leninist specimens on the dissecting table.

Trotwatch's probing blade reveals a mess of ludicrous contradictions, scheming manipulation and outright opportunism. Analysed in detail are the recent split that severely crippled Militant, and a "frighteningly detailed" look at the "squalid spectacle of the Left and the General Election". Trotwatch says in its editorial that they believe that the continuing dominance of leftism, in all its guises, over most expressions of working class resistance to "things as they are", represents a serious bloc to the creation of a truly revolutionary anti-capitalist movement.

In an accompanying leaflet they point out that many of the problems afflicting British leftism are those that are affecting the real revolutionary movement, that is because notions of class structure and the revolutionary overthrow of capitalism have been under seige. As the class struggle intensifies again in the future, Leftism will once again attempt to dominate the newly emerging resistance. As they say, when that happens, it will be even more important to "know thine enemy". Loads of info, gossip and sectariana from an anarchist communist perspective.

Aufheben. No.1. £2. 46 pages.

Despite its ponderous and obscure title, a German word often used in Hegel's dialectics, this new magazine does contain some useful articles. They believe that many comrades, especially in Britain, are afflicted with a virulent anti-intellectualism that creates the ludicrous impression that the Trots are the ones with a grasp of theory. Useful and worth reading are the critique of Earth First!, the review of Barrot's essay on anti-fascism, the analysis of the Los Angeles uprising and above all the article on 'Lessons from the Struggle against the Gulf War'. This examines the reactions and activities of revolutionaries in the No War But The Class War committee in which the ACF participated. The NWBTCW is criticised, for among other things, the lack of decent communication between those involved, and because it seemed content to act in a purely ideological way, defending the 'historic class position' in all its purity. To be fair, lack of notification often ensured low turnouts at NWBTCW meetings, and the rapid ending of the war nipped ongoing activity in the bud. But some of Aufheben's criticisms are justified. The article is important reading and should be taken into account in any future anti-militarist, anti-war mobilisations.

Ireland: Nationalism and Imperialism — The Myths Exploded, £0.30 + p&p from Subversion, Dept 10, 1 Newton St., Piccadilly, Manchester M1 1HW.

Subversion are a group that holds similar communist, and therefore internationalist, positions, to ourselves, so it's no surprise that this pamphlet should contain much we would wholeheartedly agree with. Like the ACF, Subversion argue that all forms of nationalism offer nothing but defeat to the working class and that in the context of a totally intergrated world economy 'national self-determination' is a leftist fantasy.

The pamphlet successfully rubbishes the pro-IRA arguments put forward by the Revolutionary Communist Party et al. The 'myths' which Subversion wish to explode are predominantly those cherished by the various leftist outfits who claim to speak for the international working class. However these are not the only 'myths' which dominate today.

So anyone familiar with the struggles of the six counties, especially those of us who hold to an internationalist perspective, may however feel a certain dissatisfaction with this pamphlet. Throughout there is a distinct feeling of detachment and we could be forgiven for thinking that most of Subversion's hatred is reserved for the green variant of nationalism rather than its red, white and blue version. In this pamphlet's desire to attack republicanism we can be led to feel that it is the IRA which is the problem. It must be remembered that the reactionary ideology which holds sway amongst the majority of the workers in the 'north' is loyalism.

So, when Subversion talk about IRA racketeering netting around £10 million per year (according to The Guardian!), we need to ask where such a figure comes from. We should not be fooled by 'black propaganda' put out by the British state. We should also mention that all para-militaries are up to the same and that the provos are far from alone in the intimidation business. Quoting the dodgy 'Families Against Intimidation and Terror Group' is also dubious. This group has consistently failed similarly to attack the best organised terror groups of all — the Army and RIR! A genuine expression of workers' self-organisation they are most certainly not!

This criticism aside, we would recommend that all libertarian revolutionaries get a look at this pamphlet as it is a positive contribution to a debate which is ongoing in our movement.

Libertarian Education

LibEd has published a new book on libertarian education, No Master High or Low, by John Shotton in which he states that "Libertarian education...is a set of educational beliefs that seeks to break down the boundaries between teachers and learners, that is grounded in a desire to construct non-coercive and anti-authoritarian pedagogies, and that is not concerned with systems of reward and punishment".

He describes the various free schools that have been set up in this country. Whilst these free schools may act as an example of how learning could be in a different society, too often they end up as dumping grounds for the 'enlightened' rich (Summerhill) or dumping grounds of local authorities for the socially 'maladjusted'. Any concept of libertarian education will have to be harnessed to a mass movement of the working class, or will suffer all the problems of being in a vacuum. Nevertheless, Shotton's book makes interesting reading. Information on the book from Clive Baldwin, 48 Springfield Rd, Leicester LE2 3BA.

NEW BOOKSHOP

Our Aberystwyth comrades have started a bookshop. Open every day from 10am-5pm at Stall 9, New Mini-Market, St James Square, Aberystwyth.

Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class. Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process.

We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation.

We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

JOIN US!

THE LAST FEW months have highlighted the failure of capitalism to deliver the goods. The rise of nationalism, often in blackshirt and brownshirt garb, the Rostock riots, the slaughter in ex-Yugoslavia, the deepening recession — or is it a slump? — laying millions of workers off in the West, the drive to the market in Eastern Europe creating havoc for millions of other working class people, the sanctimonious twaddle at the Earth Summit which came to the conclusion to do nothing about the ecological crisis; all of these things show the terrible state the world is in.

The bosses are gloating about how the market is triumphant world-wide. The collapse of state-capitalism has bought a lot of headaches for the boss class, however. The penetration of the market into Eastern Europe is hindered by the bureaucratic nature of the economic and social set-up there. The quick dollar they were hoping to make will not be immediately guaranteed. The social collapse in Eastern Europe has brought its problems, with waves of refugees fleeing to Western Europe, something the boss class are not keen on.

Many people who think and care about social justice are beginning to see that the old solutions put forward, be they Labourist, Stalinist, Trotskyist, or Green are like so many hair-restorers sold by travelling medicine shows — "gauranteed to grow hair on a doorknob" and leading to instant hair loss! Just look at the Labour Party — doesn't it remind you of a Poodle pretending to be a Rotweiler? The so-called Labour 'left' is now seen as people like Gould and Livingstone! The Trades Union Congress can't even do to capitalism what it used to do feebly, that is negotiate a better price for wage labour. We're treated to the sight of the employers' organisation, the CBI, getting all palsy-walsy with Wibbly-Wobbly Willis and his chums at the TUC Congress. "Let's all pull together chaps!". That is, work more closely in keeping independent working class activity at bay.

Militant is thrashing around, with its membership falling by the thousands. In Scotland, it tailends the Scottish Nationalist front, Scotland United. As for the Socialist Workers Party, it aligns itself with Militant's call for a 'real' Labour Party, lurching further to the right.

So the crises of these different organisations, all in their way defending the whole rotten set-up, and the increasing difficulties of capitalism bring confusion and gloom to many. But at the same time, they reveal the real nature of the system of social control; they help people to come to a revolutionary understanding of society.

Decay

While these so called alternatives to capitalism start to decay, small but significant numbers of people are won to the revolutionary position.

We have been greatly encouraged in the last few months by the amount of interest in our ideas. Subscriptions to Organise! have shot up to their highest level, and we receive several requests for more info on the ACF every week. Membership of the ACF has soared, and we have gained a number of comrades, some with years of experience, some new to the movement, some radicalised by the anti-poll tax movement. We now feel that our ideas could take off. We appeal to all our readers to seriously think about joining the ACF and help create a dynamic organisation pledged to helping create a new, just, equal, and sane society.

LEADERS

MOST PEOPLE ON the left would argue that 'democracy' is infinitely preferable to fascism and many working class people died in what they saw as a fight against the tyranny of fascism. However, this supposed alternative also takes away our liberty in perhaps a more insidious manner because of the smokescreen it hides behind.

One of the main distinctions between the two is the use of naked force by fascism as opposed to the subtle brainwashing which is used in a democracy. One method is blatant and crude, the other, subtle and sophisticated but achieving the same goal: our passive acceptance of a system that oppresses us. A main part of this menacing strategy is the cult of leadership, a cult which is incompatible with the establishment of a society based on freedom and equality.

In any spectrum of human intelligence, there is a wide range of abilities with most people falling somewhere in the middle, with just a few 'geniuses' and 'idiots'. Therefore, when it comes to transforming society, the collective intelligence, knowledge and experience far outweighs the contribution of a few 'geniuses'.

Despite this wealth of abilities, human history has been marked by the usurpation of struggle and movements for social change by leaders who claim to 'know best'. It has been, and still is, a painful historical struggle of men and women to gain freedom from the political, economic and spiritual shackles which have bound them. But time and time again, having rid themselves of one tyranny, people have replaced it with another. Afraid to use their new found freedom, they hold up their wrists to some new jailer. If anarchist communism is to be achieved and capitalism overthrown, then we must do much more than get rid of the obvious sources of oppresssion. The working class must also transform itself as individuals so as to reject leaders and any new tyranny.

Passivity

It is not surprising that people are so willing to submit to leaders. Capitalist society is organised so as to bleed us of our capacity to think for ourselves and take control of our own lives. This learned passivity manifests itself on the most subtle psychological levels. Individuals have a need to indentify with something so as to gain some kind of recognition and importance. Subcultures within capitalist society such as the Skinheads fulfill this role. There is a dress and hair code that identifies the individual as a member of a group. All the individual has to do to become a part of the group is to conform to the accepted attitudes and behaviour. If the individual begins to question aspects of group behaviour or to challenge the informal leadership structure, then he/she is rejected and loses group membership, a traumatic experience for many. The same analysis could be applied to many political groups eg the Communist Party in the 1950s. Though groups may profess an antagonism to capitalist society, they actually incorporate and crystallise its values.

ARE YOU STRONG ENOUGH TO LIVE WITHOUT THE BLIND FOLD

The most prevalent manifestation of these latent tendencies is the universal demand for leadership. Schools and youth movements are urged to train children for the 'task of leadership'. Job references need to refer to the applicant's 'leadership qualities'. Workers are asked to chose their leaders in the form of union representatives. Political parties from the Conservatives to the extreme left select their leaders and then voters have to chose which among them is to make decisions for the mass of the population. Thus, the cult of leadership pervades the whole of society.

Initiative

Before we examine what is involved in this general desire for leadership, let us distinquish a quality which is often confused with leadership: individual initiative. This is fundamentally the impulse to originate, to construct and, in relation to others, to elicit their approval. It is a self-expressive impulse which has nothing in common with the will to power. This realisation of the self, the expression of the uniqueness of the individual is one of the most essential features of an anarchist communist society and must be preserved at all costs. However, the individual can only realise him/herself in the community and not in spite of this community. This distinction is important because in the first case the individual becomes part of the pattern of society but does not submerge his/her identity whereas in the second case the individual loses his or her individuality.

We are told we need leaders because there would be no discipline. It is assumed that without anyone telling us what to do, we would not know how to behave. But as anarchists we believe that human beings are naturally cooperative and that it is capitalist society and leaders who foster aggressivity and selfish competition.

We are often drawn to charismatic individuals who we allow to lead us. But we must be aware of the techniques that these individuals employ. Their claim to have the answers to our problems is a sham, the truth hidden behind demagogic rituals.

Another distraction is the claim by many parties on the left that what we need is better leaders. In other words, they would make better leaders. But this is another dangerous diversion, for what we need is no leaders, not better ones.

Unnatural

The social hierarchy that we accept as a natural order is just as unnatural and illogical as government. There are no 'natural' leaders only a ruling class which has grabbed power and uses this power to exploit and dominate the mass of the population. Social classes are not ordained by nature but the historic product of an exploitative society. Unfortunately this acceptance of hierarchy has filtered down to all levels of society and even exists in the organisations that workers create to challenge the system.

Collective responsibility is the alternative to leadership and the counterpart to equality. If we are to succeed in building an anarchist communist society, then the working class must learn to rely on itself. And, each individual in that class must be prepared to take responsibility and participate in the transforming of society. The revolution must therefore be not only against the ruling class but against leaders and hierarchy at all levels of society and most importantly, against our own passivity.

WORKERS
The Miners

PRESIDENT HESELTINE has seemingly backed down over the threatened closures of 31 pits. His announcement at the end of March was hailed as a famous victory for the mining communities by much of the ruling class press.

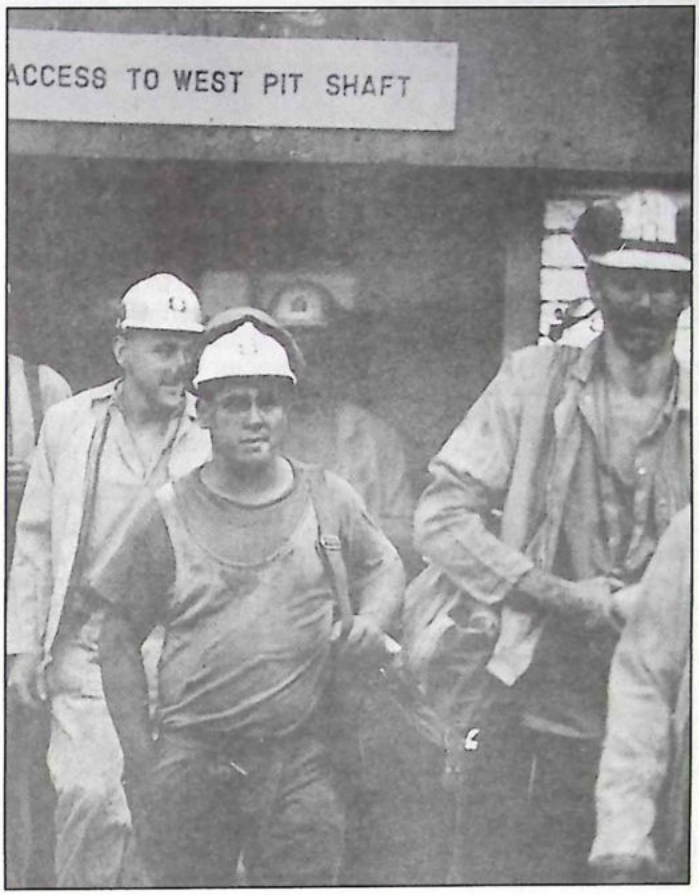
Gloomy picture

But a closer look at what was actually promised shows a much gloomier picture for the miners. Some 12 pits are still doomed, six are mothballed and one is 'in limbo'. What this means is that these pits are to be supposedly kept in running order, with no miners actually working in them! The 12 pits supposedly saved might not be open in a year's time. 5,800 miners are to lose their jobs, on top of the 8,000 who have left the industry since October. The pits will be privatised at the earliest possible opportunity and working practices will be tightened up, with more hours being spent underground. Since the end of the miners' strike of 1984-5, National Coal Board management have adopted increasingly aggressive attitudes towards the miners, and now this will worsen. The government and the boss class hope that pit closures can take place in a camouflaged way with the further quitting of the industry by many miners, fed up with the worsening work conditions.

These supposed 'concessions' have been hailed by the national press, in a campaign to defuse the situation. Alongside these manoeuvres by the boss class, are the actions of the trade unions, including the TUC and the NUM. As we pointed out in Organise! 29, the TUC called several days of action, supported by many thousands, to take the heat out of the situation. They were aware of the rising tide of working class anger, and made steps to let a little steam be let off. The anger is still there, and so they have been forced to take what at first sight seems like more radical forms of action.

Courts

The NUM has concentrated on mobilising 'public opinion' and going through the courts to stop the pit closures. As we pointed out, this was designed to head off any direct action amonst the miners and other sections of the working class. The NUM issued no appeals for solidarity action to those workers directly or indirectly threatened by the pit closures. Now, the NUM has developed other methods of containing the actions by miners. Seven pit camps have been set up by women of the mining communities outside threatened mines, along the lines of the Greeenham Common Camp. Women took an active role in the Great Miners' Strike, and now their activities have been harnessed by the NUM bureaucracy to their public relations' campaign. Unless the actions of the women of the mining communities break free of the stranglehold of NUM bureaucracy, the camps will be just a cover for NUM failure to actually take any action, including strikes and occupations and active solidarity from other workers. The pit camps could be transformed into active centres to galvanise action, but at the moment this seems far from the case.



On the face of it, the strike of April 2, involving miners, rail workers and London bus workers, was a positive step, with workers going from ineffectual demonstrations to strike action and united solidarity action with other workers. But the fact is that these one-day strike actions are an effort by the union leaders to limit action. They know that rising discontent must force them to call what appear to be more radical actions. But Scargill, and the rail union leaders like Knapp and Fullick, often decribed as 'lefts' by Leninist organisations, are politically tied to the rest of the union leaderships and are as much part of the apparatus of social control as the 'right-wing' leadership of the TUC.

Scargill called for strike action on both 19 January and 18 February. Both times he backed down, after conversations with the TUC leadership. Each time miners prepared for action, and each time they were left demoralised.

The Friends of Durruti

New pamphlet!

LONDON ACF have produced a pamphlet on the Friends of Durruti, a much misunderstood group that attempted to defend and extend the Spanish Revolution of 1936. In their criticisms of the leadership of the anarcho-syndicalist unions they represented an important moment in anarchist history. Included are an historical introduction written by an ACF member, and two political statements from the Friends themselves. This will be the first in a series of pamphlets in the Stormy Petrel series. Coming up will be a pamphlet on the Italian Factory Councils of 1920-21.

Copies of the Friends of Durruti pamphlet will be available from:

ACF (London) c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1 at 50p plus postage.

Railworkers

THE SLAUGHTER OF rail lines by British Rail will result in job losses of 40,000 with reductions to up to 40 services. Fares are set to rise by 10% and the unified national timetable is set to disappear under BR proposals.

The rail unions colluded with BR management on the forthcoming privatisations, and accepted the Organisation for Quality document that established business and profit centres.

The leader of the biggest rail union RMT, Jimmy Knapp, is famous for his fighting talk. In practice, however, he wholeheatedly agreed to the new structures of negotiation, giving management a freer hand to impose new rules and conditions.

Now the RMT and the white collar union TSSA are turning to the 'public opinion' tactic, lining up solidly behind the public relations tosh of the 'Better Rail Campaign'. Increasing anger from the railworkers forced them to call a ballot for the one-day strike on April 2.

Blame

The unions are attempting to get off the hook with workers by blaming each other. So the RMT blames the traindrivers' union ASLEF for lack of solidarity, whilst ASLEF turns round and does the same. In this way effective solidarity between railworkers is undermined.

More and more railworkers are seeing clearly what the role of the unions is. There is a growing awareness of their connivance with the Labour Party.

They remember how the RMT called off the strike last April so that it would not damage Labour's election chances. They look back to the days of the 'Left' GLC with their Fares Fair plans for London Transport, which resulted in productivity deals and speed-ups.

On the Buses

THE TEN COMPANIES which make up London Buses Ltd have demanded pay cuts of 20%, increase in the working week and job losses.

Sell off

They are justifying this by saying that if they do not cut operating costs, they will lose contracts to private operators in April. This is in line with plans to de-regulate and sell off London bus services by the end of 1993.

Four of the six garages in East London have already closed and the London Forest bus company has collapsed. These worsening conditions in London are reflected in other cities throughout Britain. Fares have shot up, and passenger use has dropped.

The private operators in cutthroat competition have aggravated traffic congestion in city centres whilst country services have been annihilated.

The working class of London can expect the same situation, with worsening traffic chaos, the axing of many routes, the end of concessions for pensioners and yet more fare rises.

Bus workers will face increasing workloads, longer hours and greater stress and pressure.

The principal busworkers' union, the TGWU, has resorted to the usual tactics. They organised a march and lobby of parliament, which they deliberately failed to adequately publicise.

Enquiry

They tried to head off strike action by calling for a select committee to launch an enquiry!

Mass meetings in the garages showed the strength of anger of busworkers and their willingness to fight, and the union was forced to organise a ballot, much as the RMT had done.

The Post

THE POST OFFICE plans to sack 16,000 workers by March 1996. Whilst the amount of mail has gone up 50% in ten years, nine workers are now expected to do the work of ten. These attacks are in line with Heseltine's review pointing to break-up of the postal services and privatisation.

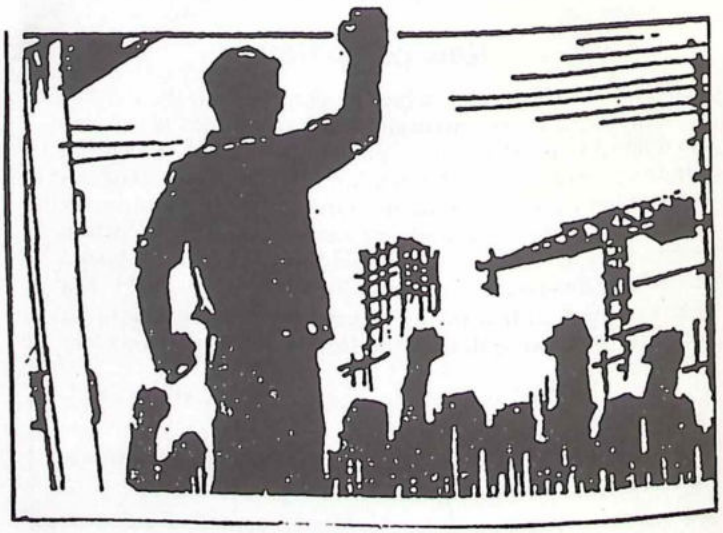
Disillusionment

In the face of this, the UCW, the posties' union, could only call for redundancies not to be compulsory and to express surprise at the number of projected job losses! All this, after the UCW had negotiated a pathetic 2.5% pay rise. Increasing disillusionment with the union has resulted.

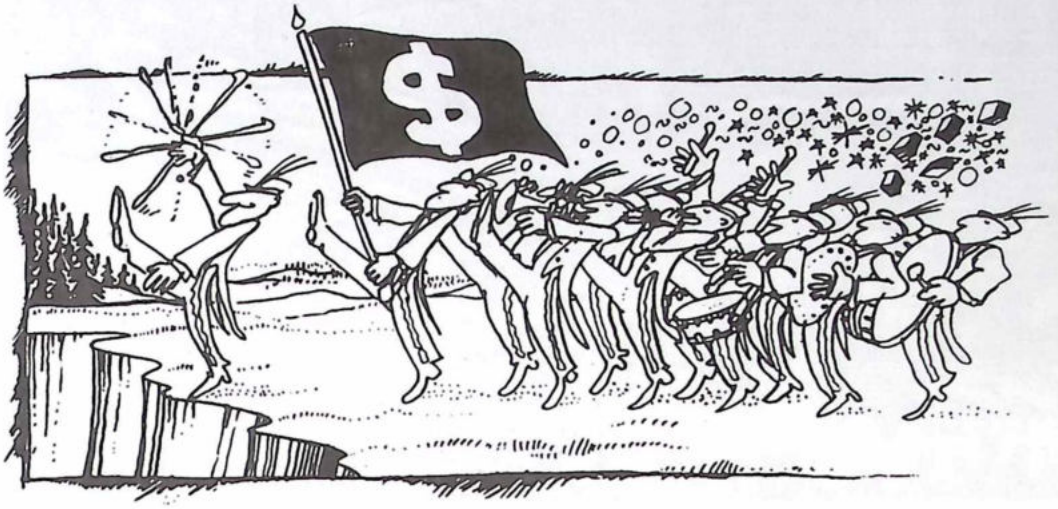
Back in 1988 postal workers went out in 12 days of unofficial action which terrified management and the union. This could happen again, indeed it must.

As can be seen by these brief reports on various industries, only united action, outside the control of the unions, can provide an effective way to fight.

Links have to be built between railworkers, bus and tube workers, and miners as a priority. Beyond this, united action must come with other workers under threat from the State and the bosses, like health workers and postal workers.



Beyond capitalism's core



CORE AND PERIPHERY are words used to describe a basic division in the map of the capitalist world between the so-called advanced capitalist countries and the developing countries.

We can all agree the whole world is dominated by capital, whether as a mode of production or by virtue of the capitalist world market which orders and controls forms of production which are not strictly capitalist Such words have been used to go beyond old terms such as 'Third World', which are derisory and lack any power of explanation. Important questions for revolutionaries in both the core and periphery concern their tasks as revolutionaries. In the hope of opening a debate between revolutionaries in capital's core and those in the periphery, I offer this article. Such debate will be important if there is to be convergence and co-operation of revolutionary groups internationally, which is prerequisite for a successful revolution.

A variety of Third Worldists, Trotskyists and Maoists have offered ideas about the importance of the working classes of the capitalist periphery in the revolutionary struggle. They have contrasted this with the tasks of revolutionaries in core countries, seeing the poor world as the tinder which will begin the transformation of the whole world. Such ideas began with Lenin who, following the failures of the industrial nations' working classes to make revolution, saw the revolutionary torch being passed to those areas which were less developed. This notion was particularly built upon by Mao and his followers. Unfortunately such rigid distinctions with working classes with vastly different forms of experience taking leading roles in the revolutionary struggle is idealistic and non-revolutionary. Keeping such struggles within national boundaries and only appealing to internationalism, not practising it, reasserts the capitalist world system by keeping alive the capitalist world market. I am of the opinion that a successful world revolution will only be built by unity or continuous convergence of revolutionary groups internationally and, consequently, a convergence of and co-operation in the class struggle.

The working classes (I use the plural to denote the fact that there are workers involved in both industrial and agricultural production) of the periphery suffer extremes of exploitation without any welfare state to fall back on. They are poorly paid, underemployed, they often have little chance of medical care, they suffer bad housing, poor education, poor food, and all manner of coercion and oppression. But this description can only be a gross generalisation. Each area of the periphery has its own relation to the capitalist global economy; consequently the working class in each area relates differently to the world class struggle. Despite these differences, though, there is only one enemy — capital — even if it is a hydra of many heads.

Let us look at a few examples to help us draw some conclusions.

Philippines

The Ramos regime has been in power now for nine months, having taken over democratically from the Aquino regime which followed the Marcos 'kleptocracy'. Marcos presided over the organised looting of the Philippine economy, amassing a fortune measured in billions of dollars and deposited all over the world. The Aquino 'yellow revolution' simply changed the faction of the bourgeoisie in power, but provided nothing for the long-suffering working class but fudge and indecision. Ramos now looks to be encouraging investment from the big Asian economies to replace dollars lost through the closing of US military bases. He hopes to solve a major problem of Filipino capital — power cuts — by a massive programme of generating expansion. Filipino workers are still faced with the same evils: a possible coup by the armed forces around General Honasau with 'promises' of clean government; a bourgeois élite which guards its political power and wealth; and continued poverty.

Brazil

Throughout March and April, from the south to the north east, the poor have taken direct action because of extreme needs. The landless peasants have marched to demand land. The landowners' response through their own organisation — the Ruralist Democratic Union — was that "invaders only respect bullets". The hungry have looted warehouses and supermarkets. The Workers' Party has simply talked about the urgent need for agrarian reform.

Last year President Collor was removed for widespread corruption. He was involved in the drugs trade and took huge kickbacks from industry for contracts. Much of this cash was funnelled through Florida. Through patronage the whole government became a 'kleptocracy' — a machine for theft. Known as the 'Alagoas Republic' after the province from where they all come, they managed to net over $1 billion.

All of this has come on top of a declining economy and a population which has doubled in 20 years. Its debt has tripled in that period to $118 billion. Urban income has fallen by 31% in ten years.

Brazilian workers face increasing poverty through a shrinking economy, a bankrupt public sector, massive national debt, continuing homelessness, unemployment and starvation. The boss class can only respond with the Bible, bullets or the ballot box to elect a new corps of kleptocrats or incompetents.

Egypt and Algeria

Both countries have deep problems. Corrupt and western-influenced ruling classes have only one interest: conspicuous consumption. Both bourgeois states have no capacity for pulling their countries out of economic decline. Egypt's liberal élite has more interest in internal squabbles and occasional brutal replies to fundamentalist atrocities. Similarly, the Algerian junta tect US oil and military interests in 'Operation Desert Storm', and go a long way towards explaining why, for example, on June 12th and 13th, US and other occupying troops, under the cover of the UN, launched a vicious bombing attack on the people of Mogadishu, massacring dozens of people who were peacefully marching to protest the occupation. This savage attack is described as the first phase of a long-term operation which will involve door-to-door searches, 4,000 US ground troops (supported by four warships, from the Persian Gulf) and continued air attacks by AC-130H 'Spectre' gunships and 'Cobra' attack helicopters. Large numbers of Somali citizens have now fled.

The guise of a 'humanitarian' mission has been revealed for what it is... colonial-type foreign occupation. The real goal of the US is to install a puppet government, supported by the brute force of invading troops, so the Pentagon can dominate the Horn of Africa and turn it into another strategic military base in the oil-rich Middle East.

Roots of occupation

Despite US influence over the economic, political and military policies of Somalia, the American media and the US government portray Somalia's ecological, political, ethical and economic crises as problems fuelled completely by Somali domestic policies, isolated from external influences. In reality, Somalia has a history of imperialist-imposed economic and political systems. Because European colonialism split ethnic Somalis into five states — French Somaliland (now Djibouti), Ethiopia, Kenya, Italian Somaliland and British Somaliland (which joined with Italian Somaliland to form Somalia in 1960 and which then seceded in 1991) — Somalia has been at the centre of most interstate conflicts as it tries to unite ethnic Somalis, especially in Kenya and Ethiopia, into one nation. Proceeding the Ethiopian Emperor Menelik's conquest of the Ogaden region (inhabited by ethnic Somalis) between 1887 and 1904, Britain and Italy established national borders separating Ethiopia and the area that is now Somalia without regard for ethnic or ecological divisions.

Somalia's present-day environmental and economic problems can be put down to colonialism. Throughout the 19th century, Britain and Italy imposed colonial systems of economic 'development' in Somalia. Britain commercialised Somalia's pastoral subsistence economy (based upon traditional nomadic herding) to produce surplus livestock to be exported to Aden, the capital of Yemen. Today, Somalia is still dependent on the export of livestock to sustain its economy: livestock consists of 46% of Somalia's Gross Domestic Production and 65% of its export earnings. The surplus of livestock production has resulted in overgrazing and desertification of Somali land, conditions which lead to conflicts between pastoralists over grazing and water rights and between pastoralists and farmers over access to rivers. Ecological degradation has also increased vulnerability to drought and famine.

Oil/military interests

The four American oil giants Conoco, Amoco, Chevron and Phillips (and for a brief period Shell) — their interest heightened by the discovery by Hunt Oil of an estimated 1 billion barrels in oil reserves in the underground rift — began to obtain 'oil exploration licences' from the government of the pro-US dictator President Mohammed Siad Barre in 1986, and by the time of his overthrow in January 1991, already held the 'rights' to oil concessions amounting to 2/3rds of Somalia's land, which allowed the oil companies to explore and exploit potential oil reserves, particularly in northern Somalia. Today, because of Operation Restore Hope, the US military presence in Somalia safeguards the multi-million dollar investments in the region.

The close ties between Conoco and the US military further attests to the US oil interests underlying Operation Restore Hope. Conoco allowed US government officials to transform its corporate compound in Mogadishu into an American HQ. And yet the restoration of a stable government in Somalia is essential not only for the purpose of safeguarding US oil interests, but also to secure Somalia as a strategic military location commanding the Red Sea and to maintain US political clout over governing regimes in the Horn of Africa, which includes Ethiopia, Djibouti, Somalia and Sudan.

For more than 30 years, the US poured military arms, worth approximately 1 billion dollars, into Ethiopia and Somalia. In the ten year period before the collapse of Barre's political authority in autumn 1989, the US government had given Barre's regime a total of $579 million in US arms transfers, consisting of military supplies. As one of the largest suppliers of weaponry to Barre, the US government helped to maintain Barre's political control in Mogadishu. Barre used the military arms provided by the US and other nations to suppress political dissent, both by directly suppressing clan-families which opposed his rule and by pitting rival clan-families against one another by supplying their militias with weapons. Through arms transfers and the 1990 'arms-for-bases agreement" between the US and Barre, the American government not only influenced the domestic politics of Somalia, but secured US political clout over Somalia and North-east Africa regions, as well as guaranteeing 'discretionary' rights over the use of Somali military facilities at Berbera and Mogadishu — locations from which the US government could serve as a 'watchdog' for the pro-West regimes in the Middle East and Northeast Africa, Western access to Middle Eastern oil, and commercial shipping routes from the West to the Indian Ocean. All of these US interests would be threatened by the takeover of the Horn of Africa by anti-US political/military powers.

A Somali writer in the New Internationalist a few months back wondered why all the key administrative and commercial posts in Somalia are held by foreigners and Somali ex-patriots, even when in many cases obviously less qualified and experienced than Somali citizens. Had she been able to see beyond that white-washing so spectacularly and hypocritically engineered by Western politicians and media, she might well have understood the reasons.

to have an empty, unused building and they challenge authority by finding a home for themselves without waiting for the council or housing association to find them one while paying extortionate rent, or biding time in grim Bed and Breakfasts. If you don't play by the rules of private property, you are depriving some bloodsucker of rent or interest payments. Property must be protected over the interests of the homeless.

No anarchist would deny the naivety of those among the travellers who believe they can run away to the hills and forget the state, because we know that the state hasn't forgotten them. Nor will their actions bring about the downfall of capitalism. However, we should realise that travellers and squatters represent an attempt at autonomous social organisation and are a thorn in the side of capitalism and the state and thus should be supported.

South Africa — Betrayal and compromise

THE COLUMNS OF both the establishment press and the left press were recently full of glowing testimonials to the murdered leader of the South African Communist Party and African National Congress, Chris Hani. We do not share their dismay. Hani prepared his own grave by the policies he and his party pursued. His murder shows the logical outcome of such policies.

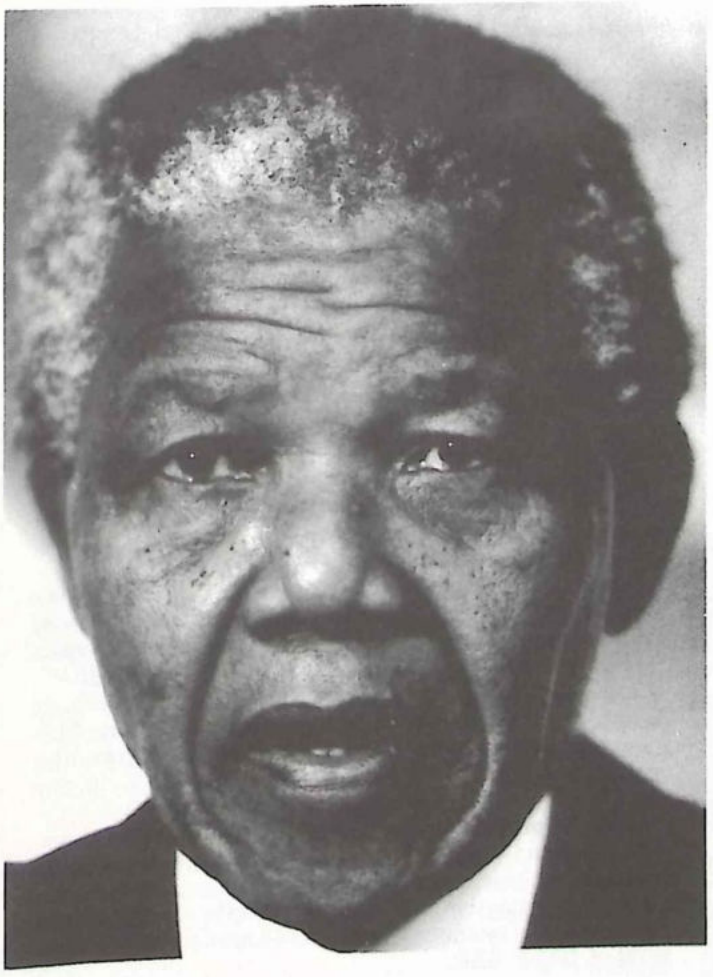
Hani was a son of a Transkei construction worker, becoming an active member of the ANC from 1957. He entered the military wing of the ANC, Umkhonto we Sizwe, in 1962. From then on he engaged in underground work, serving two years in prison. He became an active member of the South African Communist Party. In 1974 he was elected to the ANC executive, becoming Umkhonto chief of staff in 1982, and general secretary of the SACP in 1991.

As Umkhonto chief, he was responsible for the enforcement of the political line of the ANC and SACP leaderships.

In 1984, in the Umkhonto camps in Angola, a mutiny broke out. The rank and file were dissatisfied with the opulent lifestyles of the leadership, and the command that they be sent to East Germany to be trained, before being sent to help the MPLA regime in Angola against its UNITA rival.

The mutineers demanded that they stop fighting UNITA and transfer all their forces to fighting the South African regime. They also demanded an investigation of the ANC security apparatus, as well as an investigation of its activities and of the prison camp Quatro, which was nicknamed 'Buchenwald'.

Hani suggested that the mutineers form a committee to present their grievances to the ANC leadership. This committee negotiated a surrender of arms. After the surrender, Hani, along with one of the most corrupt Umkhonto leaders, Joe Modise, and an armed detachment, swept into the camp and began arresting mutineers, one of whom was shot in the back. He recovered and was sent to a labour camp, where he witnessed the torture and murder of hundreds of Umkhonto militants. Hani must at the very least have been aware of these atrocities, and, more likely, was directly involved in the crushing of dissent in the ANC ranks. He had become a brutal Stalinist thug, not the "lovely human being" described by Brian Bunting, another SACP leader (Morning Star, 20 April 1993). Come to think of it, remember the portrayal of Stalin as jovial Uncle Joe?



Left: Mandela has to make sure the struggle doesn't get out of control.

In 1989 Hani was confronted at ANC community meetings in Tanzania, which he himself had convened to explain the line of the leadership in relation to groups of people imprisoned by the ANC. He was challenged by the meetings and ex-mutineers. At one meeting at Dakawa he screamed from the platform that the decision on rehabilitation of mutineers could not be challenged: "The decision is unchallenged, it is an order from the National Executive Committee". He then ordered his security to arrest those who disagreed with the NEC decision, which was resisted by the mass of the meeting.

Assassination

It is likely that Hani was involved in the public assassination of Sipho Phungulwa in the Transkei in June 1990. This ANC militant had been involved in the 1984 mutiny and three weeks before his death had assisted at a press conference to anti-apartheid journalists, which revealed the suppression of the mutiny and the repression within the ANC. Former mutineers believed that Phungulwa was silenced because he knew too much, with his detailed knowledge of Umkhonto operations in the Transkei and his past job as Hani's bodyguard. He had also trespassed on Hani's territory, where he was setting up his own military fiefdom separate from that of Modise, the Umkhonto commander.

Hani had great ambitions. He hoped to inherit Mandela's mantle and become a future leader of South Africa. He had formed alliances with Winnie Mandela, in opposition to the Nelson Mandela group. Like all of the ANC and SACP leaders, he lived in a wealthy mansion. He had developed a reputation as a hero of the working class and of the armed struggle, a reputation which he had zealously cultivated himself. Since his election as general secretary of the Communist Party, he had pushed for rapprochement with the Afrikaaner regime and for national unity. According to him the "oppressors in the past are actually talking to us and are showing readiness to negotiate for democratic elections". So oppression was now in the past, and the destabilisation that the regime was pursuing via assassinations, and the fostering and financing of Buthelezi's Inkatha, could be ignored. He was instrumental in sabotaging the mass struggles of the black South African working class, by his promoting of a way forward through 'democratic elections'. What he failed to take into account was that large sections of the regime were not prepared to relinquish power so easily. Whilst some elements were prepared to negotiate a democratic fix, in particular the capitalists, others, particularly in the armed forces and the secret police, were ready to plot and to murder. Political personalities close to the ANC, like David Webster and Anton Lubowski, had already been murdered. After the murder of Hani, popular anger against the regime burst onto the streets once more. Nelson Mandela attempted to control the crowds and was shouted down, after his calls for 'peace'. In Capetown and other cities, widespread rioting took place.

The role of the ANC and the SACP is to control mass anger and unrest seething in South Africa. The interests of the capitalists and the Stalinists are in close convergence. The future profitability of South African capitalism depends on the working class being weakened and demoralised.

And in the unions...

One of the major planks in the platform of ANC/SACP determination to spike the guns of popular discontent has been through the unions. For a brief period, the unions that developed in South Africa in the '70s during a period of workplace upsurge, appeared to be developing syndicalist and independent characteristics. The ANC and SACP targeted the union leaderships for recruitment so that now the unions are under their control. One symptom of this, but also of trade unionism in general, is what COSATU is doing with its funds. COSATU is the major trade union federation, with a membership of 1,300,000. It invested its pension and other funds in the Johannesburg Stock Exchange! COSATU set up their own unit trust, the Community Growth Fund, arguing that not only would it bring them profits, but that they could influence the behaviour of the big firms! So shares would not be bought with companies with a record of union-bashing, support for the 'homelands' and apartheid, or manufacture or selling harmful products. Big gold companies like Driefontein and tobacco giants like Rembrandts, were excluded from the list of shares to be bought.

Unions invest

The capitalists in South Africa are falling over themselves to get this investment. The world slump has affected South Africa's economy and made it stagnant. At the moment COSATU's fund is less than £10 million. But the capitalists know that this will increase considerably, and that black workers' money power is the most dynamic factor in an otherwise sluggish economy. We predicted in Organise! 23 that the unions would be vital in engineering a 'new deal' for the sake of capitalist profitability. We did not foresee that this would directly involve money from workers' pockets. As Tommy Olifant, chairman of the unit trust said recently: "Our aim is not to punish the companies but to change them". The aim of the ANC/SACP and their union adjuncts is not to overthrow capitalism, but to run it more efficiently. This will mean an all-out attack on any workplace and township self-organisation that has not been integrated into their apparatuses. Far from liberation for the great mass of black working people of town and country, what is in store is business as usual, that is continuing exploitation. They will have to continue to struggle, and this struggle will mean that they will have to break with the ANC and the ANC unions. The fall of apartheid will mean that the black working class will see that its so-called friends are in fact its enemies.

SOMALIA — colonialism by other means?

The sham of 'Operation Restore Hope'

SOMALIA IS AN occupied country. It is occupied by United Nations forces — in other words, by forces under the de facto command of the imperialist countries, particularly Washington. When, late last year, George Bush launched 'Operation Restore Hope' — sending more than 20,000 US troops to Somalia under the guise of a 'humanitarian' effort to relieve a country ridden by famine, drought, and political strife — the politicians and media had, of course, dressed it up as a rescue operation: Somalis had been going hungry, UN forces would protect those who fed the Somalis.

Yet both the media and the then-President failed to mention that earlier US intervention had destabilised Somalia in the first place — that the US had pushed Somalia to make war on Ethiopia, and that this war had undermined the Somali regime and finally led to the break-up of the country. They also omitted to mention the vital economic and geopolitical 'interests' fuelling Bush's decision to send in US forces: that the 'pacification' of the East African nation protects the interests of four major American petroleum corporations with oil stakes in Somalia, as well as US global interests in Somalia as a strategic location providing military access to the Middle East and the Persian Gulf. No, the media just said that Somalia was hungry and in chaos... and the US military, disguised as UN forces, would set it straight. Right now — even after the 'withdrawal' of American troops — there are 18,0000 foreign troops occupying Somalia in the strategic and oil rich Horn of Africa.

These underlying foundations for US military intervention in Somalia render 'Operation Restore Hope' indistinguishable from the 1991 US invasion of Kuwait to pro-

Twyford Down and the State

TWYFORD DOWN IS a beautiful area of high ground lying SE of Winchester in Hampshire.

It is rich in historical features such as the site of an Iron Age village, pre-Roman field systems, and ancient trackways known as the Dongas, which a group of protestors have named themselves after. They have been camped on the site to defend it since at least last summer and constant actions have been going on with locals, Friends of the Earth supporters (who soon dropped out) and above all Earth Firsters who have been consistently in action against the proposed M3 eight-lane motorway beside the already existing four-lane bypass near Winchester College. Their tactics include sabotage against the main construction company slowing down work and a national Day of Action last November in which they stopped some destruction of landscape.

Then on 9 December Winchester College got an eviction order from their land which they had sold to the Department of Transport. Group 4 Security guards were hired and physically fought with the protesters and brought in bulldozers. There was considerable violence on this day, including some alleged sexual assaults on women protesters. Now the earthmovers have moved in as of 23 February to start the destruction of the Down.

The fight to save the Down lasted a week, with the protestors finally being evicted with great brutality. In one opinion poll only five per cent of Winchester's population wanted the Twyford Down cutting. 'Green celebrities' like Porritt and Bellamy as well as the Friends of the Earth lent their support to the campaign and direct action to save the Down was even mooted by the thoroughly respectable Residents' Association and Twyford Down Association. But this was all rhetoric and was, unsuprisingly, never put into practice when the DOT with the hired security men ruthlessly evicted the Dongas protestors.

Class Struggle

To many, Twyford Down may seem like another Not in My Backyard (NIMBY) of little relevance to class struggle activists. But the Twyford Down affair, like the planned destruction of Oxleas Wood for similar reasons, is part of an international attack on the countryside and the environment for the needs of capitalism. The British State will tolerate no opposition to its plans, and will use State violence if it feels it to be necessary. The government has the powerful backing of the road lobby, and has need of a road infrastructure geared to compete with the high-speed rail link to the Channel Tunnel. Besides Twyford Down, there are over 15 new road schemes in preparation or under construction.

Government expenditure on road schemes has gone up phenomenally since 1979. A vast number of historic and environmental sites are under threat. And this is just in Britain. The road scheme here is part of an international plan to provide Europe with a modernised road system geared to the free trade principles of the Single Market. France plans to double its road system by the year 2000, including driving a road through the Massif Central mountains. The European Commission plans a 50% growth of the road infrastructure.

This is not all. The European Community is providing funds for several environmentally damaging hydro-electric projects. These include the diversion of the Aeheloos River in Greece, which will threaten many species of bird and ruin the livelihood of hundreds of fishing families; the funding of 250 dams in Spain, which will destroy more than 100 ecological sites; the funding of a large bridge over the Tagus in Portugal, where the most environmentally damaging of three routes was chosen.

The fight against the Twyford Down cutting has relevance to the fightbacks against roads in the rest of Britain. A nationwide fightback against roads would include mobilisations against the Oxleas Wood development and the M11 link road through Hackney Marshes. It would need to link up with the developing opposition to road schemes and other forms of ecological damage throughout Europe.

The fight at Twyford Down was bogged down in legalistic appeals to the European Court, and a letter-writing campaign to the Government and the Queen! The Dongas Tribe, to their credit did attempt to use direct action to stop the development. What was lacking however, was a mass mobilisation, so that the cutting could be physically stopped due to weight of numbers. There is an urgent need to link up the fight against road schemes to the fight of railworkers and bus workers. The car economy promoted by capitalism has to be directly related to the attacks on public transport, and the vision of a new society which would be geared to environmental harmony and the expansion of a free public transport system. The fight in the countryside has to go in tandem with inner-city actions against road schemes, such as Carmageddon mass blockages of roads that are beginning to develop.

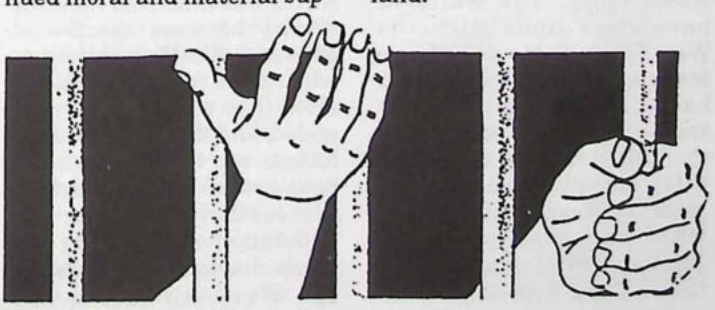
Nigerian comrades freed

IN OUR LAST issue we had an article on the repression and imprisonment of the libertarian socialists of the Awareness League of Nigeria.

Legal costs

On 29 January the four comrades were released after eight long hard months. According to the Awareness League, the comrades looked "badly emaciated, weak and sick". The four were released on bail but have to report weekly to the secret poice. It is feared they may be re-arrested any time. The Awareness League asks for continued moral and material support. They have legal costs of about US$12,000. Send contributions — either International Money Orders or UK bank cheques by express to: Awareness League c/o Samuel Mbah, PO BOX 28, Agbani, Enugu State, Nigeria.

London ACF mounted a picket and handed out leaflets about the imprisonment outside Nigerian Airlines office. Pickets and demonstrations also took place in Dublin, Hamburg and New York. Letters of protest and petitions were sent from Germany, S. Africa, S. Korea, Turkey, India, Brasil, Italy, Canada, USA, Russia, Bulgaria, Norway, Spain, Estonia and Poland.



Warlords or US troops — what's the difference?

THE MEDIA HAS functioned well in both Europe and the United States in putting the joint US-European intervention in Somalia over as a humanitarian act. The 36,000 troops who landed in Somalia weren't there to protect the Somali population against the ravages of the local warlords. They were there to protect the interests of their own ruling classes.

For example in France there was a massive exposure of photogenic Somali babies dying of hunger in silence. Public opinion was manipulated to allow the French participation in the adventure. Since the landing there has been little footage of children and women dead from hunger but plenty of well armed military supermen.

Inevitable

The wave of sympathy and solidarity with the starving of Somalia was cynically exploited by the boss classes and the State apparatuses of the US and the West, so that military intervention could be accepted as the inevitable logic by many ordinary people faced with the feeling of powerlessness.

Alongside the images of emaciated children were those of a country delivered over to chaos, where the chiefs of military clans let loose their Mad Max men at arms on a population that they starved and crushed beneath the wheels of their armoured Toyotas.

This picture was partly true, but did not reveal the whole story. The warlords have close links with the West. The National Movement of Somaliland (NMS) has a provisional government seated in Paris and accuses the United Nations of making them submit to the central power of Mogadishu S Barre, who was overthrown in January 1991, but who maintained links with the Pentagon and the CIA, who allowed him to re-establish himself in Somalia. M Abchir, leader of the Somalian Democratic Socialist Front was armed by the West via their allies in the Middle East (Egypt, the Gulf monarchies). The interim President, Ali Mahdi, was supported by Italy, who delivered 10 tonnes of arms and three tonnes of bank notes to him via Kenya in exchange for letting him use Somalia as a dumping ground for toxic waste.

Behind the warlords are their Western godfathers. If the famine in Somalia has been aggravated by the war between the different clans, it remains above all the work of the Great Powers whose 'humanitarian' intervention disguises objectives that are less openly admittable. It should be remembered that the legacy of civil war throughout Africa was inherited from the rivalry between the Soviet Bloc and the Western allies, who armed different factions. Now that the cold war has ended, and the Soviet bloc has foundered, these armed factions are left without funding, increasingly pillaging the population and robbing the humanitarian aid provided by the West. Ali Mahdi and General Aydid, who broke with Mahdi and heads his own faction, are two of the richest men in Somalia, thanks to their control of food distribution and traffic in drugs.

The US government, after its demonstration of military might with Operation Desert Storm in Kuwait and Iraq, did not want to rest on its laurels. It wanted to confirm its role of world leader by digging in in this part of the world. The Somalian operation allowed this to take place. Somalia is now the base camp and aircraft carrier for the defence of the interests of American big business. It overlooks the searoads of the petrol tankers, it is close to the Gulf and the Middle East, and is situated in the zone of influence of French interests coveted by Washington.

Intervene

This forward camp for the USA on the East African coast can allow it to intervene in this zone against the interests of the French (or European) ruling class. It could intervene in Chad, in Zaire, throughout North Africa where French interests are under threat, in particular in Algeria. It could attack Libya or the Sudan and could control the Middle East which it regards as its patch. It can now better support its faithful ally Moubarak in Egypt, increasingly under internal threat. The USA is worried that the stability of Egypt is in jeopardy as a pro-Western state in the Arab world.

Added to this is the determination to get over the humiliation of the Vietnam war, a process that started with the intervention in the Gulf. In this way the 'Vietnam syndrome' that shackled any American military intervention abroad can be countered. The Somalian operation will also help on an international level, with people getting used to US invasions.

Under cover of humanitarianism, the arrival of Western troops is to counter the chaotic political situation due to the collapse of the central government in Mogadishu. This is seen as a dangerous example for the neighbouring countries of Egypt to the north and Kenya to the south. On 18 May 1992 the tribal chiefs of the north proclaimed the independence of Somaliland and the division of Somalia. A little later, on 28 May, on the other side of the border, Eritrea proclaimed its independence from Ethiopia, fol-

Operation Restore Oil

The US petrol companies actively pushed Bush to mount the Operation Restore Hope in Somalia.

Concessions

Four major American companies (Conoco, Amoco, Chevron and Phillips) obtained concessions for prospecting nearly two thirds of Somalia just before the pro-US president Siad Barre was overthrown in January 1991. The chaos that followed interrupted profitable investigations for oil in a country classed by the World Bank as one of the two most promising African countries in terms of petrol resources.

The head offices of Conoco in Mogadishu were transformed into a base of operations for the US forces several days before the arrival of the Marines. Operation Restore Hope? More like Operation Restore Oil!

lowed by attempts by Ogaden and Tigre to break away from the central government. Alongside these secessionist movements is the menace of Islamic fundamentalism. In Somalia, this is well organised in the Al Ittihad movement, which has recruited throughout all the clans and factions. In Egypt, the Muslim Brotherhood is an increasing threat to the government. In Sudan, the Koranic Law has been adopted as a constitution and Khartoum has become the refuge and the base for Algerian and Tunisian fundamentalists.

Humanitarianism

An intervention by Western troops, under the cover of humanitarianism, is designed to limit and counter these menaces. This precious alibi has been useful for hoodwinking public opinion at home by saying: "For the first time, the United Nations is intervening for purely humanitarian reasons, to do good, to feed the starving, protect the defenceless and open the way to political, economic and social reconstruction in Somalia".

The US intervention in Somalia points to a clash between the Western powers, in particular between France and the USA, over their interests in this part of Africa. After having lost its zones of influence in the Lebanon and Iraq without any replacements, France sees the areas that it has regarded as its own for a long time as under threat: Algeria, Chad, and Djibouti where the government is now backed by the US whilst France gives its support to a pro-French opposition.

This rivalry between the Western powers and the increasing domination of the USA points to the growing 'everyone for himself' attitude among the different fractions of the international ruling class.

In attempting supremacy in what were the economic and political reserves of France, the USA is attempting to weaken and destabilise the European bloc, of which France along with Germany are the most important elements.

Whilst they are aware of this, the French ruling class has no choice but to range themselves behind the banner of Uncle Sam. They have to associate themselves with the US operation to defend their own interests and attempt to reinforce their own influence over the new Somali leaders that the USA will impose. They are conscious of US supremacy in Somalia. Out of 36,000 men deployed by the Western powers, 28-30,000 are American against 2,000 French troops.

The Somali masses, comprising a small urban working class and a vast number of poor peasants, have already scented the real reason for Western intervention. The fleeting joy amongst some that the West would deliver them from the warlords has now disappeared. There is growing hostility to the occupation forces, sometimes breaking out in outbursts of violence.

GOD

YOU CAN USUALLY find some saving grace in any religion. Islam for example stresses community solidarity, Christianity love of our fellow (sic) human beings, whilst Buddhism has concern for every living creature, and so on. On the basis of religious inspiration some of the world's greatest art has been produced from the beautiful Mosques of Isfahan to the wall paintings of Ajanta to the frescos on the Sistine Chapel. However, the damage caused by religions both as philosophical systems and in their practical application makes them a serious enemy of human freedom.

It is dangerous to generalise about religions since they vary enormously in very many respects, but from an anarchist viewpoint they must all be seen as obstacles at best, or more usually as enemy belief systems. Bakunin in his work God and the State has some interesting criticisms to make, but it is almost entirely devoted to a discussion of Christianity and is mainly concerned with its application in Europe. Marx in characterising religion as the "opium of the people" is half right, in respect of national or state religions. The idea of the 'divine right of Kings' and the sickening sight of priests blessing troops before they go off to face death at the front are obvious examples of this.

His view that religion is "the fantastic reflection in men's minds" (sic) of the material world is an interesting starting point which has some validity. He made the point that in the so-called religions of the 'Book', Judaism, Christianity and Islam, god is seen as the great father in the sky, reflecting the earthly reality of male domination. Engels too, in his article on the Book of Revelation offers an intriguing analysis of that mystical work in terms of language analysis, proving it to be a coded description of Christianity in the Roman world.

The difficulty with materialist analyses of religions is that they usually ignore or reject psychological and cultural factors and in doing so underestimate their power. The Marxist, August Bebel, proposed a crude evolutionary theory of religion in which he believed it would disappear as science and society develop. In our present world where science and technology have been used to dominate the planet and its people, religion remains as strong as ever. In fact we are seeing a religious resurgence on a world scale. For example, the resurgence of Islam in the Middle East may in part be due to the effects of international capitalism, but equally is surely an expression of the despair felt by many of all classes in the face of decaying culture. Fundamentalist Islam is an attempt to reclaim feelings of self-worth. How else can the widespread Islamic militancy by women in Iran and elsewhere be explained? Why else do they embrace a belief system which enslaves them?

Conflicting

Religions are not reducible to pseudo-scientific analyses as touted by Marxists. Religions often contain conflicting qualities which can either reinforce or undermine the status-quo. Christianity has been the most successful religion in terms of numbers. It is supposed to be a source of salvation for the poor and oppressed, yet historically the picture is more complex. On the one hand it was embraced by slaves during the Roman Empire, but when it became the Empire's official religion it was used to justify slavery. For the last 2000 years Christianity has been both a justification for class society and the state and a reason for their overthrow. Christianity as rebellion has a long history including the Levellers, Diggers etc., during the English Civil War. Islam has had a similar dual quality. For example the Wahabbi sect of Islam was the most communitarian and egalitarian example of Islam, but when it was successful in Arabia it became transformed under the Saud family into an ideology of hypocrisy and repression. Islam (as an ideas system) barely tolerates government — we need only submit to God. Yet in all of the Islamic worlds, the most repressive states prevail. On the other hand such states are extremely unstable, being essentially illegitimate since none of them fulfil the requirements of the Koran.

Most religions are opposed to the interests of women. On a trivial level the Church of England is split over the ordination of women. The Catholic Church has turned the hatred of women into a fine art. Through the glorification of womanhood which is unattainable it justifies their slavery. The cult of the Virgin Mary as a central element of Catholicism has aided the spread of a male dominated religion. The Catholic bureaucracy is led by old men. The Pope and the cardinals etc., pontificate on matters which are of life and death proportions. By banning abortion and contraception the Church forces millions of women to continually wear out their bodies through repeated child bearing. Islam clearly oppresses women. The role of women is to run the household and raise children whilst it is the responsibility for men to provide for them. Islam accepts the superiority of husbands over their wives and proscribes clear rules of behaviour. For example the Koran proscribes a system of beatings which husbands can apply to their wives (this is clearly spelt out in the Penguin edition whilst the 'official' translation aimed at a western audience interprets the Arabic text in milder terms). Hinduism is a very conservative religion in terms of the role of women. An aspect of its practice actually involves the murder of women. The so-called voluntary suicide of widows who burn themselves to death on their husband's funeral pyre is illegal in India, but cases still occur, especially in rural areas of India. How many women have been forced to choose this particularly disgusting form of death will never be known.

Hinduism, with its caste system, is also well known for its sanctioning of rigid social inequality. From the Bhramins downwards every Hindu has a pre-ordained role eg, soldier, carpenter, farmer etc., which can only change on death and re-birth. What is less well known is that many Christians and Muslims in India also preserve the caste differences. In Tamil Nadu, for example, untouchables are prevented from entering churches which are run by high caste Christians. This is an interesting example of ignoring religious doctrine for social and economic ends. The idea of social inequality is an essential feature of Islam. It accepts slavery as a perfectly reasonable system of ownership and enshrined in the notion of 'zakat' (ie., charity to the poor) is the acceptance of wealth and poverty, though the poor shouldn't be too poor! Christianity in its semi-official form in Britain is deeply attached to the state. The Queen is head of the Church of England and the bishops sit in the House of Lords. Although the divine right to rule is no longer accepted, a cosy relationship between the monarchy and the Church ensures their mutual benefit. Pity the royal brats with their marital problems, divorce etc., have somewhat undermined the 'sanctity of marriage'.

State Religion

What is interesting is how an ostensibly atheistic belief system should have become transformed into something like a state religion. Marxism-Leninism in Russia and China both granted semi-divine status to its saints. Lenin, Stalin and Mao were all preserved by so-called revolutionaries for the masses to worship. So far, only Stalin has been buried. The other two lie frozen in their tombs in Moscow and Beijing.

Many religions claim universal status in that they are meant to be applicable to all of humanity. There are plenty of exceptions to this rule, Judaism is meant for Jews and Hinduism is for the people of India. Christianity and its warring factions, Islam and Buddhism (insofar as this is a true religion) all claim to have the message for all of us. Accordingly, there is little room for compromise between them, especially when these religions are taken in the fundamentalist sense of divinely inspired truth. To an extent this explains religious wars such as the Crusades, though the prospect of loot and power also played a part. When religious intolerance is allied to nationalism, then violence is the likely outcome. The long term animosity between Protestantism and Catholicism has a strong measure of national-religionism in it, accepting the imperialist involvement as well. In the former Yugoslavia, Catholic-nationalism confronts Islam and Orthodox Christianity. In India a growing nationalism combined with a resurgence of Hinduism has caused thousands of deaths and extreme intolerance for other religions. Nationalism and fundamentalist Islam has led to the repression of the Bahai faith, and so on.

Health warning

In the end we have to conclude that religions are highly dangerous and deserve an anti-government health warning. When we come to the issue of sex, religions become especially intolerant. Though Hinduism has its temple women for the use of the 'priests', like the three main monotheistic religions Judaism, Christianity and Islam, any sex carried on outside marriage is banned. Homosexuality, incest, masturbation, you name it, it's wrong if not okayed by the religious texts...and that usually means lifetime heterosexuality between the dominant man and his wife (wives). The result has been untold misery and repression for millions.

Religion needs to be fought vigorously. The psychological comfort it gives has to be weighed against the damage it does. It is not enough to state as Lenin did, hypocritically, that religion is a private matter. Religions are not private if they seek world conversion to their particular and exclusive creed.

Ecology and Enlightenment

WITHIN THE ACF the article 'Ecology and Class' has initiated an ongoing series of articles in Organise! which has attempted to give a class struggle anarchist analysis to the issue of ecology. So far we have examined the related roles of the IMF, World Bank, transnational corporations and the State within capitalism, with its logic of profits, growth and competition, and how this works to produce the current ecological crisis. We have also been developing a critique of the responses to this crisis such as lifestylism, green consumerism, pressure groups and the Green Party.

In concentrating our analysis on the way capitalism is responsible for our environmental degradation and, therefore, the necessity of overthrowing capitalism, are we assuming that the exploitation of the environment would end automatically in a post-revolutionary society? We don't believe that this would necessarily be the case.

It is important to recognise that capitalism is able to function because it uses ideas within our culture which are shared throughout the social structure. Like racism and sexism, ideas of nature as a threat to be controlled and exploited are deeply ingrained in our attitudes and culture, often unconsciously. These ideas need to be challenged and changed if we are not to reproduce the same antagonisms and power relations in a post- capitalist society. So we need to look at how these ideas have developed historically, whose interests they serve and how we can move beyond them.

Antagonistic

Although the antagonistic relationship between culture and nature can be traced back at least as far as the establishment of patriarchal christianity in Western Europe, the idea of this relationship takes on its greatest significance in the philosophy of the 18th century Enlightenment. The ideas of the Enlightenment, which were crucial for the development of modern capitalist society, focus on the importance of rational, scientific analysis as a means of liberating 'man' from the constraints of superstition, irrationality and nature. Enlightenment thought held that a strange and dangerous world should be analysed, classified and brought within the control of rational, western man. This is the era that saw the first encyclopedia compiled in which nature was described as 'red in tooth and claw'. It was also the era which produced the French Revolution and saw the historic rise of bourgeois capitalism.

Within the world-view of bourgeois, educated western man, oppositions were established between his own internal world of culture and the menacing 'other' of nature which must be tamed and brought within the comprehension and service of his interests. So, for example, the colonised people of Africa, America and Asia were represented as being 'other', savages, closer to nature, less evolved, irrational and thus incapable of running their own affairs. This served to justify their exploitation by the rational, cultured man of the West. The working and peasant classes were also seen to be 'other' and their behaviour and customs was a threat and hindrance to their use by capital. Football, originally played by huge numbers in the streets, was removed to a specified rectangle of grass surrounded by stands and seats at which huge numbers of working class people could now only watch and pay to see just 22 men playing the game. The production of alcohol was concentrated in the hands of profit-making concerns and its sale limited to licensed premises at particular hours. Measures such as these were intended to make a wild, hedonistic and irresponsible class into a controlled, sober, consumerist workforce.

Women, who had been 'others' for centuries, found this view strongly reinforced by the new bourgeois ideology. Victorian values portrayed women as evil and irrational and as needing to be locked up within the prison of the bourgeois family. Their purpose was to reproduce a willing, happy-to-be-exploited workforce.

The great 'other' to Western culture, Nature, was similarily seen as a force to be tamed, reined in and subjugated in the service of the developing urban and industrial needs of a commodity-based society.

Consolidation

This entire process develops and increases its grip on every aspect of life as capitalism consolidated itself in the late 19th and 20th century. More and more sophisticated techniques of control and surveillance are produced. Military powers and capabilities increase as the nation states of the West exert their control over the rest of the world and fight each other over the plunder. The commodity market becomes globalised through developments in transport and communications. Huge cities emerge while the countryside is turned over to the farming of vast monocultures. All this bears witness to the efforts of bourgeois ideology to establish itself as the single method of social organisation and the single way of understanding the world — as 'civilisation' itself.

However, there are voices, including those of the marginalised 'others' in society, who argue that since World War II we live in an era in which there is a fundamental crisis in this world-view. How sane and rational is a society that produced the genocide of the holocaust and the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki or that tolerates the mutually assured destruction of the arms race while millions starve? What about the continuing world recession, homelessness and poverty which is provoking social unrest, most recently in the LA riots? Most significantly, don't the ecological threats of deforestation, acid rain, depletion of the ozone layer and the poisoning of our air and water call into question the whole idea of growth and 'progress'? All these factors symbolise a society which is ill at ease with itself, whose claims to have tamed nature for the benefit of all and whose vision of the never-ending march of progress of Western civilisation have been seriously undermined.

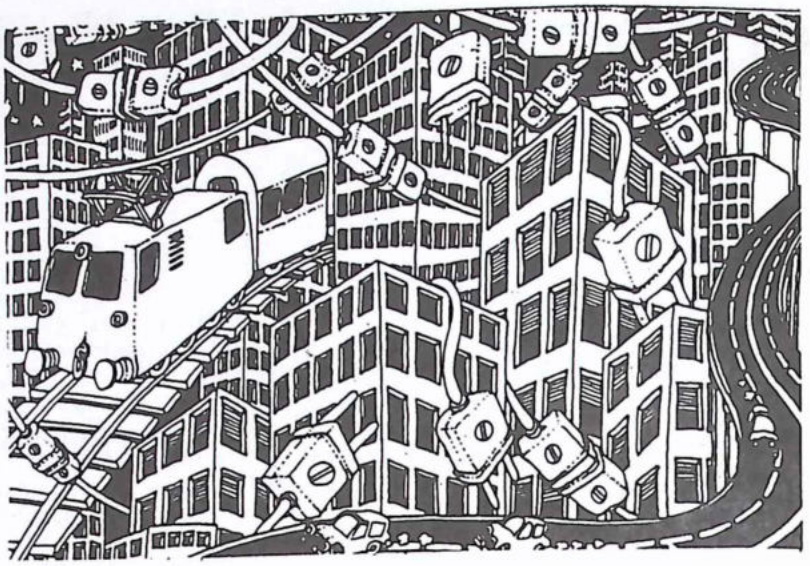
Symptoms of the loss of confidence in a bright future are in evidence all throughout our culture. The Terminator films show a vision of the future in which the world and its population have been half-destroyed in a war between humanity and a military technology which has taken on a life of its own, believing itself to be superior to humanity. While the future looks bleak, people turn to the past and the countryside for comfort and reassurance. Home owners 'personalise' their '60s council flats with plastic 'oak beams' and leaded windows. The number of museums has doubled in the last two decades with one opening every two weeks. We even have a minister of 'heritage'.



Autopilot

On the other hand there is capitalism, ever more dependent on fictitious capital. Independent of nation states, it is running on autopilot, oblivious to our human crisis or the threats to the planet and all its life, except, of course, when they can be used as a marketing tool for increasing profits.

How do we, as anarchists, respond to this situation? Obviously proclaiming "the end is nigh!" and thus further encouraging people's pessimism and cynicism about the possibility of real change won't help. We must continue to call for resistance and ultimately a class uprising to overthrow capitalism and then to create a free communist society. But how can we ensure that the same dangerous values and power relationships are not carried over into the new society? How can we persuade others that things won't turn out just the same or worse than before?

We believe the answer lies in listening to the voices of those 'others' that have been marginalised and suppressed by Western civilisation. One of the most useful critiques for this purpose is that developed by some elements of feminism. Many of the ideas already referred to are taken from such feminist thought, some of which has simultaneously developed a critique of the exploitation of women and nature since both are treated in our society as irrational, threatening, in need of taming and objects of exploitation.

As Ynestra King has written, "The hatred of women and the hatred of nature are intimately connected and mutually reinforcing". And as Peggy Kornegger in her essay, Anarchism: the Feminist Connection says, "What feminists are dealing with is a mind-fucking process — the male domineering attitude towards the external world, allowing only subject/object relationships. Traditional male politics reduces humans to object status and then dominates and manipulates them for abstract 'goals'. Women, on the other hand, are trying to develop a consciousness of 'other' in all areas. We see subject to subject relationships as not only desirable but necessary. Together we are working to expand our empathy and understanding of living things and to identify with entities outside ourselves, rather than objectifying and manipulating them. At this point, a respect for all life is a prerequisite for our survival".

King, in Toward an Ecological Feminism and a Feminist Ecology goes on to explain how the lack of diversity in patriarchal capitalist society is mirrored in the threat to diversity in nature. She writes, "A healthy balanced ecosystem, including human and non-human inhabitants, must maintain diversity...wiping out of whole species corresponds to reducing human diversity into faceless workers or to homogenisation of tastes and culture through mass consumer markets. Social life and natural life are literally simplified to the inorganic for the convenience of the market society. Therefore we need a decentralised global movement founded on common interests but celebrating diversity and opposing all forms of domination and violence".

What we can take from this analysis is a critique of all power relation and of the urge to control and dominate. We can also begin to recognise the importance of diversity and of a harmonious relationship between culture and nature rather than seeing nature as an 'outside' threat to be controlled. These ideas, as well as those from marginalised and suppressed voices, such as those of native peoples, hopefully tell us there is no single unproblematic way of comprehending the world and that a post-revolutionary society would need to respect difference and diversity in culture and nature, encountering and relating, not dominating and exploiting.

This is not simplistically to dismiss every single aspect of Enlightenment thought or to romanticise non-Western cultures and 'woman' as having special access to wisdom and being 'closer to nature'. The point is to have a critical awareness of Enlightenment thought which enables us to see how capitalism makes use of its emphasis on rationality and science to oppress and exploit. But we must not, consequently, leap in an anti-rational or anti-science direction. Neither would we wish to abandon Enlightenment ideas of the desirability of active human struggle, based upon the criticism and analysis of existing conditions, to bring aboout change.

However, what this analysis of Enlightenment thought and its use by capitalism helps us to do is to focus on how various hierarchical exploitations of class, gender, race and nature are related in the concept of 'other' in Western bourgeois ideology. Consequently, we can see that the idea of exploiting nature is not a neutral concept that can be employed by capitalists and revolutionaries alike, but one which can, and will, be used as a model for the exploitation of others by a ruling elite (capitalist or other) which uses claims to rationality and science to maintain and universalise its hierarchical power.

When the Sound of the Music Changes, the Walls of the City Shake

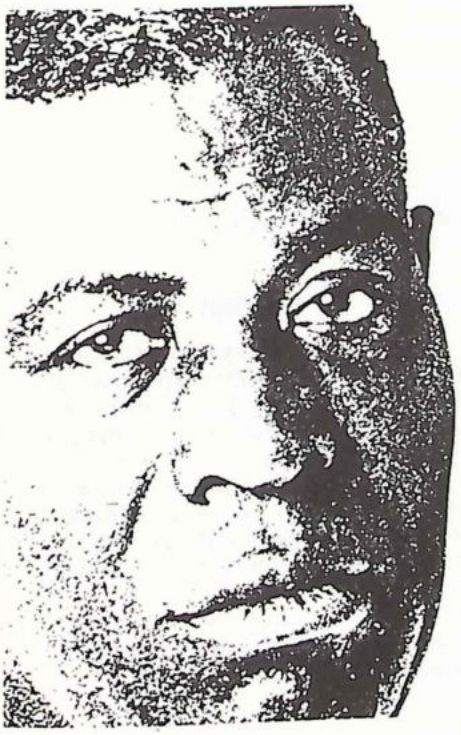
CLASS STRUGGLE PERMEATES every area of social life. It affects what we eat, how we live and determines who we are. It also shapes the music we make and the music we listen to.

In 'natural' society music is created to express emotions, to celebrate, to mourn or to revel in the sheer joy of being alive. In the more 'advanced' societies, music developed different forms — a formalised music which reflected the concerns of the ruling class — the glorification of the monarch and the glorification of the god of the ruling class. Music became formalised, codified and identified with single composers. Performance became ritualised, in contrast to the popular music of ordinary people, which dovetailed with everyday life and events in the lives of ordinary people — festivals, weddings, harvest, births and deaths.

This music drew on the music of previous generations, was not written down, was changed by each person who played it. It evolved anarchically and was played spontaneously in contrast to the formalised rituals that accompanied ruling class music.

Parallel

The two forms of music existed and developed in parallel, each influencing the other. However, their purposes and trajectories were different. Indeed, they could never be similar because they grew from different social forms.



In Britain this divide was sharpened in several ways: by the use of Latin for religious song and by a division of language on a class basis after the Norman Conquest. The division was also highlighted by the kinds of instruments available to the rich as opposed to the simple folk instruments of ordinary people.

Because it wasn't written down and because it didn't glorify people with power, much of this early people's music hasn't survived. From the fragments that remain, we can see that one aspect of popular music was resistance. The early ballads about Robin Hood are an example and the song, 'The Cutty Wren', another.

From the later music of the English Civil War period (the 17th century, when ordinary people thrust their political ideas onto the political stage), we can see that music was used to confirm and celebrate resistance and revolution. Diggers like Gerard Winstanley composed songs of defiance:

Your houses they pull down.
Stand up now.
As your houses they pull down so the gentry must come down.
Stand up now.
And the poor shall wear the crown.
Stand up now.

The growth in literature and changes in printing technology have resulted in the survival of more songs of resistance from the 18th and 19th centuries than from earlier periods: songs like the 'Colliers' March', 'General Ludd's Triumph' and the 'Chartist Anthem'. If you're interested in hearing them, listen to Chumbawamba's record English Rebel Songs 1381-1914.

What about our own century and our own music? Does a culture of resistance still exist?

Music has certainly been changed by capitalism, transformed into just another commodity.

Its accessibility as a commodity, through records, CDs, tapes, television and radio has generated a spurious and superficial democracy. Music seems available to all, but even so there remain hierarchies of consumption with people on low incomes given restricted access (varying prices of concert tickets and even if CDs are available in libraries, the equipment costs more).

Technological capitalism has also alienated many people from the production of music and transformed them into consumers of a centrally produced product. Like everything else, entry into the system, making music, requires access to capital.

Of course, people develop strategies to get round the worst effects of capitalism, share and swap instruments, rehearse in garages and so on, but increasing technological sophistication continues to push home-made music into the margins.

The production of music as a commodity has replaced and destroyed much of the music that was based on folk community. The destruction of music has been accelerated by the destruction of community that results from capitalism's transformation of human relationships.

As capitalism causes class struggle by dividing society into classes, and because people are not the passive economic categories that economists would like them to be, they resist, and music reflects and strengthens that resistance. This is why there is a history of songs of resistance, and why every struggle leaves its own legacy of music and songs to inspire.

The vicious class repression that followed the crushing of the Paris Commune in 1871 saw strikers and demonstrators shot down in the streets, but also generated an active and assertive anarchist movement. The movement left an arsenal of anarchist songs with titles like 'The Breakers of Images', 'No More Government', 'I don't like the Police' and 'Ravachol's Hymn'.

This was the period when Eugene Pottier, a French woodworker from Lille wrote the 'International'. "We have been naught, we shall be all", those were the sentiments that echoed down the years and appealed to the Chinese students and young workers in Tiananmen Square who made the chorus of the 'International' their anthem:

'Tis the final conflict
Let each stand in his place
The international party
Shall be the human race.

Resistance

Resistance isn't just expressed in the sentiments of song lyrics, but also in the form of the music. Jazz, for example, grew out of an underclass, its free forms and breaking of musical conventions expressing the desire for freedom. Little wonder that jazz was banned in Nazi Germany, its spontaneity an anathema to the totalitarian impulse and its creativity a challenge to the dead hand of fascism and a vibrant refutation of Nazi theories of the cultural inferiority of other races. Hardly suprising that teenage rebels in Germany's anti-fascist resistance identified with jazz and saw it as a symbol of their own rebellion. Nor is it suprising that Czech Stalinists arrested and imprisoned members of the underground 'Jazz Section' or that 'Township Jazz' is one of the most potent forms of cultural opposition to South African apartheid.

What the State cannot successfully ban and forbid, capitalism transforms into a commodity — takes the form, drains it of its rebellious elements, repackages it and sells it back to the people. George Melly has written a perceptive account of this process Revolt into Style, a book title that neatly summarises the social mechanism that enables capitalism to rejuvenate itself by being parasitical on the creative activity of us all.

Because of this process of recuperation, the transformation of revolt into style, musical radicals need to constantly push back the boundaries of acceptable art, to go outside the experience of capitalism in order to gain the creative space necessary to sustain rebellion.

Frontiers

In our own time the anarchist composer John Cage has extended the frontiers of music, by taking the sounds of everyday life and allowing them to intrude into music, as in 'Finnegan's Wake'. Later Cage transformed random everyday sounds into music. In the mistakenly derided (by capitalist hacks and critics) 4'33" of 1952 he structured silence so that inadvertent sounds within the listener's hearing range are experienced as music. As an anarchist Cage never composed works that required an authoritarian conductor, or even a lead instrumentalist who functions apart from a back-up group.

Avant-garde music like Cage operates on the fringes of daily experience, so although it can extend and transform ideas about music it is difficult for it to reflect the joys and miseries of everyday life. The musical forms that do so most effectively are produced collectively. Folk music and punk are two obvious examples. Punk music grew out of the desperation experienced by young people during the early years of Thatcherism, and reflects the anger and determination to fight back. Punk's emphasis on raw raucous energy overrode musical niceties. Musical form and structure became subservient to the political message:

We're knocking on your door
We're taking no more
For this is class war.
(The Apostles)

Folk music appears on the surface to be the complete opposite to punk — quiet, reflective and avoiding confrontational posturing, but it shares with punk a dislike of complexity and musical artifice. Like punk, folk requires no expertise. Anyone can get up and do it, but folk music goes beyond punk in the range of emotions it can express and in spite of the fossilised cat crap about nut gathering and the like that is frequently presented as folk music, is far more politicised.

Alex Glasgow's powerful songs explore the suffering that forms the basis of capitalism.

Close the coal-house door, lad, there's blood inside.
Blood from broken hands and feet
Blood that's dried on pit-black meat
Blood from hearts that know no beat
Close the coal-house door, lad, there's blood inside.

While Pete Seeger says straight out:
I hate the capitalist system.

Love

Folk also allows the expression of other revolutionary emotions, like love. English folk singer, Ewan McColl wrote the classic 'The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face' and also the ever popular 'Dirty Old Town' which describes how love transforms our perception of our environment, heightens our experience and strengthens us in our daily fight for survival in the teeth of capitalism.

This isn't a Moon/June love song which sells make-up and yoghurt; this is a revolutionary song which empowers people and inspires them to change the world.

The revolution in music takes place on a daily basis as individuals and groups of music-makers take what they like from other musical traditions, add to it, change it, and play it. So the Kronos Quartet breaks out of the confines of classical music, playing pieces by Terry Riley, Jimi Hendrix and fuses with African music as in 'Pieces of Africa'. Rural blues transform into urban blues. Big Bill Broonzy, Howlin' Wolf, the crackling sounds of old Leadbelly recordings and the songs of Blind Lemon Jefferson speak across the years, across continents, and across generations, talking about a shared desire for change. What can their national anthems, their 'Blood and Honour' drivel say that matches that?

Stop the City

Speaking personally, one of the most profound moments I've experienced was during a Stop the City demonstration during the early '80s, when in the middle of London, outside the Stock Exchange, hundreds of anarchists under siege from the police suddenly burst into song — a short four-line song which had been distributed at some of the planning meetings:

We're gonna Stop the City
We're gonna Change the World.

And we will, because, as was said of the murdered Chilean singer Victor Jara: "You can kill the man but not his song when it's sung the whole world round".

DEAR ORGANISE!

Wrong again, I am not a full time official of the Yorkshire Area of the NUM nor ever have been. The Yorkshire Area has only three full time officials. I am none of these. The S. Yorkshire NUM Panel of which I am the Vice CHAIR is an unofficial assembly of NUM branches, and meets once a month, it is not in any way 'fulltime'. It just happens, although I am an elected, part time official of my local branch (the Delegate), I am a rank and file worker. I work on the coal face, and do the normal days, evenings, afters and midnights shift cycle. This is the normal situation for all NUM branch delegates.

Secondly "Having my own column" is not like having your own Rolls you know, it doesn't mark me off as not being a rank and file worker as you seem to imply. In fact I am a supporter of Class War. I was offered a column in Daily Worker, paper of the reformed CPGB because they have made a heavy focus on the developing pit struggle, and wanted the grass roots information as it happened. This was and is done on a non-sectarian basis — it in no way compromises my political views, or theirs for that matter. Their paper is circulated to every pit in Britain, the support groups and throughout the labour movement. It has been a good way of informing the 'movement', my fellow miners and our supporters of what is going on in this area. It is after all a news column. I am not engaging in a polemic or theoretic discussion on the value or non value of the 'party'. If your Organise! was published on a daily basis with a similar wide circulation and you unconditionally offered me a column to keep people informed of the rapidly changing and tactically unfolding nature of the pit struggle, I should take it without hesitation.

That would not however mean I had become one of your supporters; neither does it with the CPGB. My view of Leninism and Trotskyism is well known.

If you describe yourself as 'anti union', not anti union bureaucrat, but anti union, and if you were to act on that within the class i.e. trying to break the union, getting people to leave the union, or not join the union, sorry comrades whichever way you put it that it would be scabbing, and most certainly be a sign that you were on the wrong side of the class line. I think you do need to radically rethink your position on unions, as you are confusing its progressive, defensive and strategic role in the working class, with its negative, parasitic and often reactionary bureaucracy.

Declining membership in the unions is not some progressive symptom or far from the indication of growing class consciousness you say it is. Declining union membership is almost entirely due to the fact that the industries in which mass 100% membership was a tradition, have been decimated. Heavy industry, coal mining, shipyards, engineering factories, docks, merchant shipping etc. Mass unemployment in areas where unions were a way of life, has almost on its own accounted for the drop in membership. Such new work that has come along has been low paid, part time, in non union services or in get rich quick greenfield sites in areas with no industrial tradition or experience with unions. To some extent, the spread of Thatcherite, individualist, consumerist 'values' has blocked communal, solidarist, collectivist sentiments necessary for the forming of unions or establishment of membership. Add to this the wickedly anti union laws, and employers ever ready to sack you and blacklist you for the rest of your life, and a decline in union membership is hardly surprising is it? This is however neither a sign that workers in general have abandoned unions because they have all embraced Tory values (which is what the Tories say) or that they are becoming more class conscious (which is what you said).

I concede that right wing and moderate unions do piss people off. Single union, no strike deals such as those signed with the Japanese car firms on Wearside and elsewhere produce very small union memberships even in areas of high union traditions. This undoubtedly is because workers can see no point in joining and engage in other forms of struggle at work instead. However this is only a very marginal factor, the main reason is because unions and the working class have been bashed to bits and bashed out of unions, this is not a progressive fact, and is the reason why I reacted so angrily to your 'anti union' advocacy.

By the way on the subject of blacklists. I know my name appears on the lists circulated by Freedom Association and Aims of Industry etc, but I didn't know Trotwatch provided a similar service to the Anarchist left, especially when they get my job, position and politics wrong,

revolutionary greetings,
David Douglass,
National Union of Mineworkers
..and still bloody proud of it.
(Letter slightly edited)

ORGANISE!* Editors' reply:

Yes, we were wrong about your position in the union. We based our information on the Wildcat pamphlet (reviewed in this issue). However, this does not drastically alter our criticisms of your role within anarchist circles, that is, to defend trade unionism, at a time when some, perhaps many anarchists are breaking with it. Nor does your espousal of libertarian politics and indeed a public denunciation of Leninism excuse your writing a column in the Daily Worker. If anything it makes it doubly damning. The Communist Party of Great Britain proudly defends Bolshevism. No conscious libertarian revolutionary can contribute a column to its paper without seriously compromising themselves. The CPGB will use people like you to gain credibility in miners' circles and recruit among them. So on one hand you lambast Leninism, whilst on the other you give them succour by writing in their publications.

No, we never said that the decline in union membership was due to rising class consciousness. Read our reply to your last letter again. Of course some of the falling membership is due to rising unemployment. But as we said, many are not joining unions or failing to renew membership because they see that the unions are not defending their interests and indeed are opposed to their interests. No, we are not scabs. In our book that means any one who betrays class solidarity. We have never done this. Cut out the abuse and the crap about being on the wrong side of the class line. The unions are betraying the workers, even the sacred NUM, and as events unfold over the next period of struggle, we will soon see who is on the wrong side of the class line.

TROTWATCH* adds:

It would have been better if the 'credit' published at the end of the article in the last Organise! had been the one we suggested — "Thanks to Trotwatch for information on the Leninist/Daily Worker" rather than the one that got printed — "Thanks to Trotwatch for information on Dave Douglass". When we heard Organise! was publishing a debate between the ACF and DD on the union question, we sent in a copy of one of DD's regular columns from the Daily Worker with some comments of our own about the issues raised by DD's support for Class War, his role as contact for 'Class War Colliers' and his role as columnist for a Leninist party newspaper. We sent no other information about DD's job or his position in the NUM.

The suggestion that Trotwatch helps in some way in the compiling of 'blacklists' of socialists is complete nonsense. Trotwatch is an "anarchist commentary on the life of the left", our purpose is to publish critiques of contemporary leftist ideas and practice, from a revolutionary communist perspective. Sometimes our jokes are quite funny as well. We have not publicised any information about the political affiliations of individuals involved with leftist organisations that was not already in the 'public arena'. We never offer any information to anyone, other than anarchist-communist comrades we already know and trust. Our only sources of information about the activities of the left (thus far) have come from the pages of the published left press.

What 'confidential' information does DD believe Trotwatch has disclosed via Organise!? DD has written signed pieces in the Heavy Stuff, and his column in the Daily Worker includes both his name — and a photograph. If DD and Trotwatch decide to pursue the issues raised here, we will publish our debate in the next edition of Trotwatch out in the autumn.

DEAR COMRADES,

Unfortunately I have not seen the recent articles upon the recession which may or may not have similar perspectives as mine. The articles upon the 'New World Disorder' left much unsaid. What was not absolutely explicit was that it appears that capital has no way out of its current crisis. Capital needs to grow, to accumulate, but it seems that all its avenues of growth have now been explored and exhausted. It has created and filled its markets world-wide for its commodities, its means of producing these commodities, and finally its credit (its fictional capital). It has reaped profit from its welfare society, its deficit spending, its exploitation of cheap raw materials, by dumping commodities in the poor world, by exploiting cheap labour there, by selling arms the world over (even to the poorest and most vulnerable) by creating new technologies and so new toys for consumers, by hawking credit, financial services and investment to the poor world.

But where is capital continuing to grow now? Unemployment is rising world-wide — not only in the sick areas of Europe and America, in the previously cast-iron economy of Japan, but in the poor world, particularly Africa, we are witnessing levels of poverty and degradation which are indescribable. The attempts to restart the world economy by reviving world trade through the GATT talks are becoming ever more drawn out. Indeed there is continuing talk of trade war as three new capitalist blocs crystallise — Bush began it, Clinton seems to be continuing it, over steel, aircraft, cars and more. We must wait and see particularly how the two most intransigent players in this dangerous game, France and the USA continue the brinkmanship. Even though Clinton has taken the helm, American capital continues to sink further into its own degeneration — the Rust Belt is still rusting, the Sun Belt continues to undermine the previous centres of US capital. The only area of US strength though is its military — but US capital cannot cure its ills by simply policing or bullying the rest of the world.

After the passing of the Russian bloc and the spectre of so-called communism, the Western world has turned to a variety of ideologies to motivate and explain its actions. We have witnessed both the promotion and death of democracy — in Russia and Italy respectively. We are seeing the rise of a variety of nationalisms: the extreme right in Germany; Serbian, Croatian and others in what was Yugoslavia; America First in the USA; the various nationalisms of the breakup of the USSR. A variety of humanitarianisms are being promoted, for instance the Somalia adventure of the USA, whereas Angola and Mozambique are being treated to US/South African sponsored insurgents.

Here in Britain we are promised national recovery and we are given a budget supposedly to provide it. Our beloved 'man in grey' even has to promote the idea on TV to help us swallow the idea even though we have the inkling that all is not well: rising unemployment, in reality over four million; wages held down, public sector wages pegged to 1.5%; continued attacks on the poor, VAT extended to fuel, to be only 50% compensated. Capital can only increase its exploitation of the working clas as it scrambles for answers to the crisis of the boss class. I can see no answer to the crisis, nor can anyone else — a new Keynesianism won't work, as has been mooted even by Japanese economists, nor will a new and improved monetarism. The other classical route out of such crises is war. Both world wars and various 'police actions' have come to the aid of capitalism in the past but this seems not to be an option now — the level of destruction required would be too great. Barbarism, of one form or the other, seems the only future.

Barbarism or the revolutionary transformation of society are usually counterposed as alternatives. I believe this to be the case now, although these alternatives are not being voiced generally or even in part by working class. I do feel that the class struggle will necessarily intensify over the coming years as capital continues to fail to deal with its own degeneration.

This may seem to be an odd perspective to be held by a libertarian communist, but this seems to be the only logical analysis of current trends. But there is one task which must be undertaken, framing means by which revolutionaries can usefully engage in what must be a coming expansion of the class struggle. In this engagement we will have to negate all of those tendencies towards social democracy which have infested the working class — the unions, the Labour Party, the pseudo-revolutionary Trotskyists who are ready to bury class consciousness and class struggle in dogma and substitutionism. It will be our task to aid the class as it struggles, hopefully moving from class consciousness to revolutionary consciousness.

We face considerable obstacles, though, the working class is hardly at its most combative. It will not simply be a question of turning up wherever we can but of carefully considered action, intervention, which will raise the profile of the revolutionary idea and give the class confidence in its own capacity to act and create. We will have to relate ourselves to the interests of the working class as they develop, to aid and inform as much as we can. More than anything else we will have to negate every possible destructive influence we can — nationalism, social democracy etc.

It may not be apparent to everyone, but the time is coming,

yours, libertarian communist greetings,
J.C. (Sheffield)

DEAR ORGANISE!

Ta for Organise! 28. A good issue. I especially liked 'Reading the Detectives'. Not so sure about 'Against Exploitation' article. In particular the sentence.."anarchist-communists find no room for such objectivity". To base our politics instead on morality puts us on very shaky ground. We have to explain ourselves when we use 'morally unjust' otherwise we come across as liberals.

BLACK MASK & UP AGAINST THE WALL MOTHERFUCKER. 144 pages. Unpopular Books and Sabotage Editions. (No price given on review copy). Box 15, 138 Kingsland High Rd, London E8 2NS.

This book is a collection of articles published in the two magazines mentioned in the title. Black Mask was created by the New York Surrealist Group and the New York Anarchist Group and appeared from 1966 to 1968. As such, it was a portent of the revolutionary storm to come in 1968, plugging in equally to the riots of poor blacks in Watts, the anti-Vietnam War resistance, and the flowering hippy counter-culture. It was aware of other developments throughout the world like the French Situationists and the English Heatwave group. Indeed in many ways it echoed the development of the French Situationists in that a revolutionary critique of Art developed into a revolutionary critique of society as a whole.

Up Against the Wall Motherfucker was a continuation of the Black Mask, with a mixing of the most combative of the counter-culture with the previous political developments. Unfortunately the concentration on dope and acid, a symptom of the times, seems to have affected the form and content of the Motherfuckers' political statements. Long, shapeless rants praise the 'Hip Community' and Ying-Yang symbols are dotted throughout. We have such statements as the "hip tribal nation forms as the eventual replacement of amerikan all-goverment". Illusions in the counter-culture as a means to both fight and replace the capitalist set-up marginalise the Motherfuckers. The earlier Black Mask articles about the Newark and Detroit riots, the discussions on art, sexuality, the youth revolt are far more interesting and coherent. The book lets the two groups speak for themselves through their articles and leaflets. However, a little more information about how the groups formed, and what happened to them would have been appreciated.

REFRACTED PERSPECTIVE. The Left, Working Class Trade Unionism and The Miners. Dave Douglass. 60p. 12 pages.
OUTSIDE AND AGAINST THE UNIONS. A communist response to Dave Douglass' text. Wildcat. 40p. 15 pages.

The first pamphlet was a text delivered to Class War's International Conference in 1991. It claims to address the Socialist Workers Party, orthodox Trotskyists, and "elements of the situationists". As the Wildcat pamphlet points out, its purpose was to "stifle criticism of trade unionism in and around the anarchist movement". Much of Douglass's pamphlet is taken up with justified criticisms of the Leninist vanguards, and he does criticise the NUM bureaucrats including King Arthur. He defends mass pickets and hitsquads against the criticisms of the Left. However he tries to amalgamate Leninists with 'situationists', that is, as Wildcat says "a code word for class struggle militants who are against the unions from a communist point of view". He makes out Leninists are anti-union, when they are great supporters of unionism. Many Leninist militants keep union branches going, as Wildcat wittily remarks: "the Leninist intellectuals of and by themselves can only achieve a trade union consciousness".

Douglass implies trade unions are somehow the property of workers: "Can you wonder that industrial and unionised workers identify more with their Trade Union branch, lodge, shop stewards committee or whatever than they do with the revolutionary donkey constructed out of somebody's Book of Revolutionary Organisation". Douglass uses a valid attack on vanguardism to disguise his defence of unions. The unions he cites appear to lack union bureaucracies, operating as networks of independent local branches. Using the classic line spouted by any trade union leftist, he says that if members were to mobilise they could determine policies. Wildcat points out that the 1977 productivity deal, which divided miners between regions, engineered by 'workers' friend' Tony Benn, was pushed through by the NUM executive despite a national ballot rejecting it. In 1983 NUM leaders ignored an 80% strike vote in South Wales. In April 1984 Lancashire leaders held an area delegate meeting to send Lancashire miners back to work. 30 miners then occupied Bolton HQ.

Douglass makes out that support of the unions is better than support of the Leninist parties because the latter has more loyalty from the class. If we followed this logic, then support for the Labour Party or a love of royalty should also be uncritically supported.

As Wildcat point out, unions are not workers' self-defence organisations but structures to negotiate the rate of exploitation by the bosses of the workers. Negotiation is not just an economic activity, it is a political one — is a form of political representation. Representing people is not about fighting for their interests. It is about maintaining the loyalty of a passive 'constituency' Wildcat point out the NUM differs from other British trade unions in being radical and left-wing. This is because of the existence of a militant rank and file. The rhetoric of officials protects them and helps them keep control. But many of the most important strikes among miners were unofficial, or started out as such.

The debate on the unions will continue, of this we are sure. Revolutionary anarchists need to take a long hard look at the hand of trade unionism with its weakening grip on both the class and revolutionary militants. So read these two pamphlets and see whether the struggle should be inside the unions or 'outside and against' them.

Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class. Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.

3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people, as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process.

We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

Why we still need a national revolutionary organisation

THE ANARCHIST Communist Federation has consistently argued the need for a national revolutionary organisation in this country. We continue to stand by this argument.

We have always opposed the localist and parochial ideas that have been argued for within anarchist circles. We know that attempts to set up local and regional networks, if they are not tied to the need for national organisation and consistent revolutionary theory, are doomed to failure. We are all for the establishment of local coordinations that enable revolutionaries to pool their efforts and resources. However, if these are put forward as the solution to the present lack of progress of libertarian revolutionaries, and indeed if these are actively counterposed to the establishment of a national revolutionary anarchist organisation, we must argue that they are no substitute for the building of such a body. The Class Struggle Anarchist Network and many local Solidarity Groups have all collapsed. The attempt to establish borough-wide coordinations in London in 1992 was more or less still-born.

All round Britain revolutionaries share similar positions to ours. We urge them to consider joining the ACF. We have survived the present bad times because of our devotion to the need for a revolutionary organisation and because we have valued the development of theory alongside an outgoing practice. Now there are possibilities in the coming few years if the signs of increased militancy in the working class (at Fords, the firefighters, the railworkers and the miners) herald a new willingness to struggle. We need to be there to put over our ideas of self-organisation, and the more of us united in one body the better.

The war in ex-Yugoslavia, the strife in Russia, the millions of unemployed in the West, the famine and wars in Africa, the deepening ecological problems, are all signs that a world social system, capitalism, cannot deliver the goods and endangers us all. Unlike many, we are not prepared to give in to pessimism and nihilism. We know that things can and will change for the better if new social movements can be galvanised into action. If you feel the same, then have a good think about joining the ACF and help create a new society based on social justice, ecological harmony and equality.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT

THE WHOLE DEBATE about crime is hopelessly confused and confusing. One thing is certain, in the population at large, there is a fear of crime which politicians, especially the Tories but increasingly Labour, are exploiting for political gain. There is an ever growing demand by reactionaries of all kinds to "get tough with crime". It is an easy slogan to make which guarantees attention but, despite a dozen years of authoritarian Tory control, crime is nowhere near to being defeated. Why is this?

In capitalist society, what crimes actually are is determined by the state. They may, or may not, coincide with what working class people think is wrong behaviour. People 'living' on social security benefits cannot survive on what is available to them. They have either to get involved with some form of 'criminal' behaviour, whether this means social security fraud, shoplifting or worse. And most working class people who have jobs ask few questions when offered goods which have 'fallen off the back of a lorry'.

Their attitudes change when they become the victims of crime. It is an unfortunate fact that some working class people are quite happy to steal from or abuse their own kind. Stealing television sets and videos on council estates or racial or sexual attacks are examples of criminal behaviour which is not acceptable to the working class.

Does this mean that there is a double standard operating here? Not at all. The point about crime is that it must be seen in class terms. Crime is defined and combatted largely by the state acting in the interests of maintaining their order and protecting property. The maintenance of order is presented as being in the interests of all classes but in reality provides stability for the promotion of capitalism. Capitalism itself is based upon a form of robbery: exploitation. But this is not defined by the state as crime. Similarily, we all have personal property to protect but the state is mainly concerned with the protection of private property, ie the instruments of legal robbery — the banks, factories, shops etc. Working class people are generally aware of this. It is a commonplace to hear that there exists "one law for the rich and another for the poor".

So far, from an anarchist communist standpoint, we must be skeptical, to say the least, about the whole debate about crime. We are clear about one thing; anti-social crime, meaning anything which oppresses, robs or does violence to the working class, must be opposed. We cannot wait until 'after the revolution' to fight the active enemies of the people. Racist attacks, sexual assaults, muggings are not acceptable and we have to find solutions to these problems here and now. This will mean vigilence and self-defense by the affected communities. Middle class crimes and assaults on the working class by asset strippers and speculators, though often invisible, are also insidious and must be opposed collectively, where possible, in this long dark night of capitalism. Interestingly, their activities are not often seen by the state as crimes at all, or if they are, they carry relatively light punishments.

Anti-social acts are a direct expression of predatory capitalism. Selfishness, bullying, violence and legalised robbery are all inherent in the system. The tentacles of class society and its ethics have entered into every part of life. It is not accidental that men are responsible for most crimes and that women hardly figure in the crime statistics. Men are socialised from birth to be aggressive, violent, hard and tough, whilst women are socialised to be submissive and caring. This sort of upbringing does untold psychological violence to boys as they are shaped by their parents and society to struggle and fight.

Add to this a strict and regimenting school system, a future of unemployment or dead-end jobs together with boredom and you have a mixture which invites trouble. This is not to excuse macho behaviour but is an attempt to place it in perspective. Crime and capitalism are inseparable.

If crime is a part of capitalist society, what will happen in an anarchist communist society? Anarchist communism is based upon the principles of a classless society in which freedom arises out of community solidarity and an enlightened system of socialisation and education. Private property will be abolished and the goal of production will be for the fulfilment of human need, not the accumulation of private wealth. Goods and services will be planned by the active communities working with similar communities elsewhere. The individual will be encouraged to take part in decision-making. In this way, goods and services will be provided to meet everyone's needs, so far as this is possible. Also, many services will be provided by the community just as public libraries are today, so that entertainment, transport etc will be on the basis of free access.

Moneyless

Communism requires the abolition of money and exploitation. With a moneyless society there will be no possibility to accumulate wealth beyond that which a person can possibly hold on to. Since goods are free, there will be little point in stealing and therefore most, if not all, crimes against property will disappear.

In a caring society which will do away with the desperate struggle for everyday survival, many of the material bases of want will disappear. The revolution will consciously want to eliminate anti-social behaviour and so education and the socialisation of children will be directed towards tolerance, equality and sharing. Violence, which is an ever present undercurrent of life today, will be discouraged through the development of cooperative play and education. The current obsession with aggressive individualism combined with glorification of male assertiveness probably accounts for much of male violence, especially among younger people. Whilst individualism as a means of achieving personal fullfilment is to be encouraged, it must be done so in a positive way. Gain for the individual is a gain for society as a whole. The point of anarchist communism is not to stifle individual effort but to channel it in constructive directions.

In present day society, most people are cut off from their neighbours. Very few real communities survive and those that do are deeply imbued with the values of capitalist society. In an anarchist communist society, community and solidarity will bind society together.

Despite education and other means of socialisation there will be isolated acts of violence, sexual assaults and other anti-social behaviour. Many of these will be carried out by people who are emotionally disturbed. The community has a right to protect itself and steps will have to be taken to eliminate violent and other destructive behaviour. Such people should be cared for as far as possible within the community. This approach has nothing in common with the current dumping of the mentally disturbed onto the streets. In 'face to face' communities everyone will recognise their neighbours and take on a collective and individual responsibility for social care and control. Psychiatric and medical help will be aimed at the integration of disturbed individuals and the promotion of their welfare. There are no easy solutions to some disturbed and obsessive behaviour such as sexual assaults, arson etc. But the approach to such problems will have to be approached in an enlightened, not a punitive way.

This leads us to a discussion of punishment. Punishment, the infliction of violence for so-called crimes, has been a feature of virtually every society from the earliest recorded history. The Old Testament approach to punishment in which not only the 'guilty' are harmed but also their relatives and descendents is to be found in many societies. Aspects of this approach have come down to us today in Islamic law and in the Tory government's initiative in blaming and punishing parents for their children's crimes.

There are several justifications given for punishment, all of which are seriously flawed. Revenge is the most primitive, being based on the desire to 'get even' with the criminal. The 'retributive' approach starts from the assumption that individual crimes deserve punishment; murderers deserve to be executed, rapists deserve castration. Apart from the problem of gauging what is an appropriate punishment for each and every crime in a whole range of circumstances, this approach assumes that one act of inflicting pain (robbery, assault etc) is to be condemned whilst another, that of punishment (which might be equally brutal eg stoning of adulterers) is fine. It also accepts that a higher authority, ie the state, has the right alone to inflict punishment.

Linked to the vengeance justification for punishment is the idea of deterrence. Indeed, the two are usually cited together in determining a 'suitable' punishment in the courts. The idea that criminal behaviour will be reduced by the threat of punishment on being caught does not stand up. Firstly, many serious crimes take place on the spur of the moment when people lose self-control through anger, jealousy or drugs. There is no thought of the consequences of such acts.

Secondly, premeditated criminal acts are not deterred by the thought of an eventual punishment. What concerns criminals is the likelihood of getting caught. If such an event seems on balance to be possible, the proposed crime is aborted. A few hundred years ago pick-pockets were executed at public hangings. Active among the enthralled crowds were professional pick-pockets! So much for deterrence.

The idea that society will be better off by carrying out punishments misses the point. An unequal, unfair society creates its own criminality. What needs to be eliminated is the social and economic base for crime. Similarily, the idea of reforming criminals within the prison system is a sick joke. There is precious little enlightenment in Britain's repressive prison regime. In modern Britain, it is not the criminals that need to be 'reformed' but society itself, which needs to be changed, lock, stock and barrel.

Tower Hamlets: The Electoral Charade

AGAINST A background of ever more brazen and brutal racial attacks combined with far-right electoral success in an increasingly xenophobic "Fortress Europe", fears are mounting in the UK that at the forthcoming May elections the British National Party will be able to repeat its success of last year in winning its first council seat on the Isle of Dogs in the Tower Hamlets borough of London.

The three main parties blamed each other for the BNP's first electoral victory (while at the same time virtually everyone scapegoated white working class voters, as though the mainstream parties could abnegate their own responsibilities for the social mess at both local and national levels). Jack Straw of the Labour Party, in particular, unhesitantly blamed the ruling Liberal Democrats for stoking up racism in their election run-up campaign. Meanwhile, Labour councillors in the borough and the candidate, James Hunt, lost no time in spouting forth sanctimonious drivel about their own "Mr Clean" record.

In fact racism, institutionalised by the British political system, has a long history in Tower Hamlets, and did not mysteriously evaporate away when the Liberal Democrats took control of the council in 1986 — if anything they carried on the tradition of discrimination previously perpetuated by Labour. At the time the BNP won its council seat last year, for example, one of the Liberal Democrats' campaign leaflets was shamelessly proclaiming a "Bangladeshi shocker", urging voters not to vote Labour which had apparently squandered money on aid to victims of the Bangladeshi flood. There is a frequent emphasis on the rights of local people to have a council house in their "own community", local people first, and so on. It may sound benign, but it adds to the already poisonous atmosphere created by Labour, Liberal Democrats and the Tories.

Counterbalance

As a counterbalance to all the vacuous rhetoric, particularly from Labour, we reproduce below some extracts from an independent report commissioned by the Labour-run Greater London Council after complaints of racism in housing allocation from the community group, Spitalfields Housing and Planning Rights Services (SHPRS). The report was researched by Deborah Phillips who as "an independent researcher was able to observe GLC housing management practices at close hand and to make daily contact with housing staff".

During the investigation, the researcher found: "OVERT RACISM; a disturbing level of racist comment and joking was witnessed by the researcher. Bengalis in particular were stereotyped as dirty, troublemakers and causing problems on estates, although social security tenants were often characterised in similar ways. Several officers who independently expressed personal views on Tower Hamlets' racial and housing problems offered remarkably similar solutions, that is, to put all Bengalis together in E1 and allocate them to poorer estates, their view was that they would turn them into slums anyway." (p43).

"The overall effect of the allocation process has been to direct Asians towards some of the more popular and newer white estates. . ." (p15).

"SHPRS's criticisms over 1982-1984 period have focussed on the GLC's management of Bengali access to and distribution in E1. In particular the group alleged that Bengalis were not getting their fair share on the "better" estates in the area. The pattern (ie distribution of offers etc) supports the findings reported in the preceding paragraphs and confirms SHPRS's allegations that Bengalis were more likely to be given a narrow range of offers on poorer estates. . . In particular it seems remarkable none of the 12, three bedroom vacancies on Exmouth was offered to Asians, especially given their very high demand for this size of accommodation."

An internal memo justified the council's role: "difficulties which result from housing families who enjoy a different social and culinary style in blocks with internal access where the aroma of more savoury cooking tends to permeate the immediate areas."

It should also be noted that the idea for an independent report was first considered and rejected in 1982.

It was Labour who laid the foundations for racism to thrive in Tower Hamlets, until the Liberal Democrats took control of the council in 1986. In that light, the self-righteous bleating of the borough's Labour councillors — "we joined the party because of its anti-racist policies" — must seem pathetically hollow.

So whom should you be voting for in the May elections? Perhaps it looks like a choice between the least of three evils? There must, after all, be some decent people in the Labour Party, musn't there? There may be, but they're not going to change anything. And they're certainly not going to change the way that people — the electorate — think. Vacuous rhetoric from politicians, inconsistent with their actual practices, is clearly recognised for what it is. We need positive grass roots action, starting with a clear recognition of the charade of "democracy" and an abstention from the May elections, and in the second place, a concerted campaign of getting across to people a clear understanding of who is responsible for poor and scarce housing, failing social services, a deteriorating education system and the grinding poverty of the most vulnerable sections of the working class.

It's not the Bangladeshis to blame, nor the Somalis, nor any group identified along racial lines. The "us" and "them" must be clearly identified for who they are: as the working class people of this country, irrespective of race, and the politicians of all parties who, in seeking to divide us from each other, hope to draw attention away from their own self-seeking and socially reprehensible policies in the service of capitalism.

NATFHE sabotage

THE LOCAL FURTHER Education (FE) colleges provide post-16 education, often mainly vocational, for large numbers of working class people.

There are next to no jobs for school-leavers and to avoid the prospect of gangs of bored, penniless youths on the streets, the government has been using FE colleges to mop them up. By and large, it is a cynical exercise as there are few jobs, even after training. It is seen by the State as a partial solution, keeping otherwise dangerous youth under institutional control.

Being set up for mainly working class students, the FE colleges aren't too concerned with the quality of what is provided, though their propaganda argues the contrary. Cost effectiveness, meaning squeezing more and more people into fewer colleges is presented as the inevitable way forward. Colleges are required to increase student numbers by 25% in three years and compete vigorously with each other for "bums on seats". Those who don't attract the students will go under as colleges are now more or less in a state of open warfare with each other.

To survive, college managements have been restructured and confrontational tactics are being employed to cower the workforce. Part of this bullying process, aimed at achieving total submissiveness by college lecturers, is the imposition of new employment conditions. Collective bargaining has been abandoned, and there will be a large increase in lecturers' hours, bigger classes and a cut in holidays of seven weeks per year. As if this wasn't enough, colleges are busy replacing full-time lecturers with much cheaper part-timers.

So, given all of this, you might have expected the main lecturers' union NATFHE to put up a vigorous fight — after all, a major attack has been launched against their members. In fact, the union response could be described as treacherous, if we accepted that it had ever actually been on the lecturers' side in the first place, which we do not. A one day strike took place last year which was successful, as far as it went. Then, following further negotiations with employers, NATFHE heroically offered to meet them halfway. They decided, without consulting members, to give up several weeks holidays and lengthen the working week!

A second strike was called for March 1st this year, as the employers, scenting blood, demanded total surrender. Under the stirring slogan "No Substandard Contracts Here" the union negotiators got a favourable result for strike action in a postal ballot.

Unfortunately for NATFHE, the management of Blackpool College challenged the legality of the proposed strike. The court ruled that the strike was indeed unlawful, since NATFHE had failed to give the employers the names of every member participating in the ballot. The judge said that for the result to be lawful, the union should have provided the employers with impossibly accurate membership lists. In effect, this judgement virtually bans all official union strikes.

Given this judgement, you might have expected an intensification of the struggle, or the ignoring of the judge's decision. Not so. Immediate and desperate capitulation was the order of the day. A union letter demanded that under no circumstances should NATFHE assets be threatened, and no one should place the union at risk.

Only three FE colleges disobeyed the union's directive and went on strike on March 1st. Would-be strikers in other colleges were stunned into paralysis by the court's decision, though misplaced loyalty to the union was another factor. Tower Hamlets College, which did strike, was rewarded a week or so later by students who struck for the day in support of lecturers.

Distressing

Loyal NATFHE members are now somewhat demoralised and unsure of the way forward. Union representatives have been busy trying to draw up accurate membership lists, indicating complete compliance by the leadership with legalism at all costs.

A further distressing feature of the dispute is the way various Marxist-Leninist groups have been using the union to increase their influence in the working class. The Maoist Communist Party of Britain (Marxist-Leninist) controls the leadership and the Socialist Workers Party is intent on displacing it. The Maoists have been pursuing a long-term policy of extreme moderation to maintain their grip. This is reminiscent of the Communist Party of Great Britain's strategy of capturing top union positions. In the end, the infiltrators are captured by the unions. The SWP, in the meantime, is making militant sounding noises to unseat their Maoist rivals.

The situation is a complete mess. The dispute will probably end up for the lecturers as the biggest massacre since Little Big Horn. It is clear to save the situation, lecturers will have to embark on a course of wildcat strikes, outside and against the union. Three colleges have already shown the way forward and their example has to be followed if the lecturers want to maintain their conditions.

Squat! Don't Rot!

ARTILLERY MANSIONS is a good example of what we anarchists call propaganda by the deed. That is through direct action showing how people can start gaining control of their lives. We hope that more and more homeless people will take action and occupy the large numbers of empty buildings, offices, flats and hotels, that have lain empty for many years. The homeless problem could be solved at one fell swoop. There is enough property to house the homeless many times over. The estate agents and property developers prefer to put profit before people.

Anarchist militants have consistently advocated and taken part in occupations of empty property.

Georges Cochon, anarchist and upholstery worker organised the Union syndicale des locataires (Union of lodgers) in 1911 in Paris. He was to initiate the first mass urban squatting movement. Up to 15,000 people took part in the occupations of large buildings. Even the model homes put up during an Ideal Home style exhibition, the Salon de l'habitat, were squatted!

In 1945 in Britain large numbers of homeless people occupied empty properties, and in 1969 a group of anarchists and libertarian socialists initiated a squatting movement in East London that spread throughout Britain.

As a result many people took over empty property over the last 25 years. The movement needs to be re-activated accompanied by mass propaganda pointing out the obscenity of the vast number of properties lying empty.

Artillery Mansions Fires off a Broadside for the Homeless!

ARTILLERY MANSIONS IS a huge Victorian building on the main thoroughfare of Victoria Street in London. It has recently been occupied by homeless people. Organise! interviewed one of the activists in the occupation.

Organise!:* How long has the squat been here at Artillery Mansions?
AM: Three weeks.

Organise!:* And how many people are installed here now?
AM: Over 100.

Organise!:* It's all people off the streets, isn't it?
AM: Mostly people off the streets, rough sleepers and some people evicted from other squats.

Organise!:* The squat was instigated by the Freedom Network. Who are they?
AM: It's made up of the activist members of SQUASH (Squatters Action for Secure Homes), Green Committee 100 and some Earth First! people.

Organise!:* How long do you hope to be in here?
AM: We're going to court on the 17th. We're pretty certain that it's going to be a possession forthwith, it's just a matter of how long it takes the bailiffs to come round. We have sent letters to the solicitors saying that we know that most of the building is to be left empty because they intend to turn it into offices and the property market is not good enough to support that at the moment, so they intend to leave it empty as they have done for the last eighteen years. A few of the flats here were occupied right up to 1990, but the majority have remained empty for eighteen years or more.

Organise!:* In the media it said that this was being done specifically against the Criminal Justice Bill. Is that correct?
AM: There are three things. Firstly, it was a protest against the Criminal Justice Bill. Secondly, it was a protest against Westminster City Council's jerrymandering — unlawful and improper use of their powers. Thirdly, it was to run an alternative rough sleepers initiative, which is to get people off the streets and put them into a flat.

Organise!:* Are more and more rough sleepers coming off the street when they hear about it?
AM: Yes. It's starting to fill up a bit more.

Organise!:* When protesters first started, were many rough sleepers ready to move in straight away?
AM: Yes, we invited a few in and then we decided to have fliers to hand out to rough sleepers. What actually happened was that the influx was enough for what we could cope with, so we didn't end up giving out the fliers. We were taking in about five rough sleepers a day.

Grapevine

Organise!:* You mean that people heard about it through the grapevine?
AM: Yes and people on their way to the building to see people.

Organise!:* If you are evicted from here, do you hope to carry out similar actions in other large buildings to highlight what is going on?
AM: Yes. This is taking a hell of a lot of work. There is a responsibility here not only to the rough sleepers who come in. We've got under age people coming in, we've got people with mental health problems coming in and people with alcoholic problems. Then we've got kids coming in and make a mess, like the chimney pots being broken, so we have to make sure that they keep out. We have a responsibility to the five tenants in the back block who are old people waiting to be moved for the last eleven years, with braces hanging off and their pants undone, not knowing what is going on. They are littered throughout the back block, each one on a floor where every other flat on their floor is boarded up and it stinks of pigeon shit as well. They are still stuck in there waiting to be moved on because they have secure tenancies, which means that they have a right to another place. So we have a responsibility to them and we have a responsibility to the locality.

Organise!:* Is the building owned by Westminster City Council?
AM: No, it is owned by Great Bear N.V. who are a big multinational company.

Organise!:* And they are taking you to court?
AM: Yes, their solicitors are on their behalf.

Organise!:* How is the squat run? Is it run by meetings of all the people who live there?
AM: There was the original group that lived here and kicked it all off. Some of those have already left and there is a core group of people that remain in order to make sure that the place carries on and is responsible. A lot of rough sleepers have got involved in the organisation of the place, holding the door together, making sure there are candles, food, a bucket, donations, leaflets and talking to the media. So now it's not as though there is one committee of people, although the few people that have remained from the original group that got in have tried to keep it steered in the right direction.

Organise!:* So there is quite a lot of active participation?
AM: Yes, there is a lot. It's quite magical really to see some people come in off the street when they have been on the street for ten months. Some of them are quite brewed up, but they get into the way it is run. For example there is Bill who is a rough sleeper and has just booked out of his hostel, which is due to close in two weeks and moved in here. He makes a great big tub of soup every day and that is his place and his pride.

Organise!:* So is it the first time he has been under a roof in a while? Has it really changed him a lot?
AM: Yes. They have respect and dignity when they have got their own room and their own lock on the door. They can build their own fire, they have sofas, pictures they have picked up in skips hung up on walls. They have turned it into a home straight away. They don't want to go back onto the streets after this because it is the first bit of dignity they have had for a long while.

Organise!:* They might try to move into other places after this?
AM: Yes. Quite a lot of them are saying they were not aware of the fact that you could squat and having talked to people and got clued up on how to do it, I think that there will be a whole group of people that won't wish to return to sleeping in the doorway of Victoria Street after this place. They will go and try and squat in an empty property.

Organise!:* What relationship does it have to the old squatting movement that started in 1969? Are there any veterans from that movement who were involved in taking over the flats?
AM: No. I don't think that you can view it as an organised movement that evolves in a structured way. There aren't any veterans that are involved in it. Advisory Service for Squatters are involved in preparing a court case and I guess that there are a few veterans there, but not in the running of the place.

Organise!:* What sort of support are you looking for? Can people who are not rough sleepers or homeless give their support apart from donations of food and blankets?
AM: They can get down here and help man the place. There is constantly lots of cleaning up to be done. There is constantly lots of running around to be done with the small group that is trying to keep it centred along the line and are well stretched. So if anyone wants to get down here and help, there is a vacuum for them to step into.

Organise!:* Is there any friction between people in the place? Do people fall out?
AM: It's peaceful.

Organise!:* So if the court issues a possession order, you will stay until the bailiffs come?
AM: Yes.

Organise!:* Will people have to be taken out of the building?
AM: Yes.

Organise!:* Do you think it will inspire the homeless to start squatting?
AM: Yes, as I said earlier, they didn't even know about squatting until this happened.

Organise!:* Is there any way that the homeless can be reached and told about this?
AM: This is really the best instruction to it. It's hard to go up to people in the street and tell them that they can get in if they find an empty window. Here they are exposed to the reality that they have a room of their own for the first time in over a year. Having said that, the Bill will be coming out between Easter and June.

Organise!:* The Bill at the moment refers to some new court orders which haven't yet been defined?
AM: There are two things with regard to squatting. There is delegated legislation, which is going to be handed down from the Lord Chancellor's Department. That is the teeth of which the Bill is the drawback. They are going to have two consultation processes about that. They are going to float the idea, have a consultation process. They are going to formulate the idea and then have another consultation process. The first consultation process is already underway; they published it last week. There have been three new clauses about squatting since the publication of the Bill and they are worse than the original Bill itself. They extend the definition of PIO's and DRO's to include private tenants and leasehold owners of anything more than two years. It used to be anything more than 21 years, or anyone acting on their behalf. It gives those people or anyone acting on their behalf the right to gain violent entry, which means it removes the security of the front door and gives license to vigilante bailiffs.

Organise!:* So instead of having to get a court order first, you can be asleep in bed and find that someone is axing the door down?
AM: That's right. It says you have to let the people know first. These were passed through the standing committee two weeks ago. The next stage is the report stage when it goes back to the House of Commons. It seems likely that it will be passed.

If Fred West had been a hunt sabber . . ?

Every year, when councils are working out their budgets, the police put in a bid to increase their funding to help them "investigate" crime. Well, the police in Gloucester would need to increase their detective work a hundredfold judging by their recent piece of gardening.

A man's wife, daughters and lodger disappear and the police don't notice this may be more than coincidence. Presumably if they had sent a policewoman round to ask about the missing lodger her colleagues might still be scratching their heads about why such a good officer disappeared without even resigning!

But the police budget has very little to do with detective work.

What the budget is really about is funding the control of dissent, riots, demos, strikes and occupations and Gloucester police's budgetary demands this year have rather more to do with harassing travellers, hunts sabs and working class youth than with looking for the next multiple murderer.

Cross Channel Links

An interview with a militant of the Organisation Communiste Libertaire

THE ACF has always considered international relations as a key area of our activity. We believe that the social revolution must and will be international, therefore it is vital that revolutionary anarchists and libertarian communists begin now to extend international contacts. We have long been in contact with the Organisation Communiste Libertaire in France. Until recently this has largely been confined to an exchange of publications.

Then, last summer, we attended the OCL Summer Camp in Southern France where we held lengthy discussions on a number of important issues. This has led us to seek closer contacts with this organisation which in many ways is similar to the ACF. This proved easier than expected as the OCL has a group in Boulogne — easier to get to than most of Britain for the London comrades of the ACF! So, in October a number of us decided to pay them a visit where we conducted an interview that we thought would be informative for anyone interested in what libertarian communists are doing across the channel.

Above: Against militarism and nationalism! Three thousand plus anarchists march in Paris.

The interview

ACF: How are you organised in Boulogne?
OCL: The group has been around since 1989. For the first two years we stayed independent of any national structure because we had different areas of interest, eg SCALP (anti-fascist group), links with the Federation Anarchiste. Some comrades had never been active before. However, soon we felt the need to become integrated into a national structure in order to overcome our isolation. We needed to do this because our region, the Pas de Calais, has no libertarian organisation and the extreme left in general is very weak. This is because the Pas de Calais has been a bastion of the socialist and communist left for many decades.

ACF: What are your practical activities?
OCL: Since 1989 we have been involved in a variety of struggles depending on our capabilities. We were able to organise a bus to go to the demonstration of anti-fascists in Lille as a response to the attacks on SCALP by the neo-Nazis. The same year we organised a concert/discussion evening against the agreement signed by the socialist government to link the schools more closely to the army. One member of the group participated in the demonstrations against the poll tax in London. Following that we published a pamphlet of which we distributed 300 copies in order to popularise that struggle.
During the Gulf war we participated in the Anti-War Collective which was formed in Boulogne. However, the dominant role played by the Communist Party in that group meant that we had to keep our distance.

Alternative

Since then we have been publishing a local paper called La Mouette Enragée (The Angry Seagull) which is sold in newsagents around the town. This gives us the opportunity to offer an alternative analysis of what's going on in the locality. We sell between 50 and 75 copies.
For the past year and a half we have been supporting the campaign of a comrade who was sacked by a Socialist council in a town near Boulogne. We have succeeded in involving the two alternative unions: the SUD, which was created by militants who were thrown out of the CFDT (the union close to the Socialist Party) and the CNT, an anarcho-syndicalist union.

ACF: Relations with other groups?
OCL: We are the only revolutionary group in our town. The Communist Party remains relatively well implanted, but we don't really have much to do with them. We have good relations with the Federation Anarchiste which is well represented in Lille. For three years we have had a stand beside the FA's at the Braderie de Lille which is a big popular festival in that town.

ACF: The Front National in France?
OCL: The Front National developed when the Left was in power. In fact, it was a manoeuvre by the Socialist Party (PS) that was never admitted. In allowing the FN to develop the PS put a spoke in the wheel of the right, splitting its vote and making it more or less weakend and divided. In the course of ten years the PS led attacks against the working class that the right would not have been allowed to make. The workers "betrayed" by those they voted in in 1981 were left without any strategies. The parties of the left and the unions were disempowered and the FN had the way open to develop.
It was evident that on the basis of the economic crisis and crisis of the traditional political groupings that the FN appears as an alternative grouping. The FN developed in the absence of offensive workers' struggles, thanks to the development of unemployment, poverty and above all the splintering of the old solidarities and the old social lines. The workers' vote for the FN has not been negligible. This has had the effect of seeing all the traditional political groupings adopt a language of national security that is openly racist. All the same, the FN remains a party financed by the bourgeoisie, whose cadres are in the majority members of the middle classes: lawyers, doctors, managers.

ACF: Your successes and your problems?
OCL: It is difficult for us to speak of successes. We try to get our voice heard with all our feeble means. Our weakness is still the too ideological character of our approach.

ACF: International relations?
OCL: This is a key strategy that all the revolutionary organisations must develop. The example of the Libertarian Communist International Coordination (CICL) that the Organisation Revolutionnaire Anarchiste started up in the '70s seems a good example of the type of relations to develop. For example, putting in contact activists in the same line of work, like railway workers and bank workers ... the bourgeoisie is organised internationally, what are we waiting for? Never have we been possessed of so many means of communication, let's profit from them!

ACF: Relations between the local group and the national organisation?

OCL: We have organised two magazine commissions in Boulogne. These commissions are held every month in a different town and are responsible for preparing the next issue of our journal Courant Alternatif. This arrangement allows the functioning of all the groups and democratic control. The OCL is interesting because it is not centralised in Paris, unlike the FA which has a bookshop and a radio station in the capital. Parisian centralisation is an historic phenomenon which has the disagreeable advantage of creating a divide between Paris and the provinces. This often creates a noticeable separation in the press. We do not think this is the case with the OCL.

The Friends of Durruti — New pamphlet!

LONDON ACF have produced a pamphlet on the Friends of Durruti, a much misunderstood group that attempted to defend and extend the Spanish Revolution of 1936. In their criticisms of the leadership of the anarcho-syndicalist unions they represented an important moment in anarchist history. Included are an historical introduction written by an ACF member, and two political statements from the Friends themselves. This will be the first in a series of pamphlets in the Stormy Petrel series. Coming up is a pamphlet on the Italian Factory Councils of 1920-21.

Copies of the Friends of Durruti pamphlet available from ACF (London) c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, E1 at 75p inc. postage.

Demonstration and Festival

AT THE DEMONSTRATION and festival against militarism and nationalism on 11th November 1993 in the Place de la Republique in Paris over 3000 militants from the libertarian organisations assembled to voice their opposition to militarism and nationalism. Present were the OCL, Alternative Libertaire, Federation Anarchiste, Union des Anarchistes and Confederation National de Travail. There was music and stalls from 11am-4.30pm. Also present were contingents from Apache (SCALP), a militant anti-fascist grouping and the anti-fascist skinheads of SHARP. The day chosen was Remembrance Day for the First World War, and the main slogans of the rally were "States, Poverty, Racism and Arms Trade Foster the Wars"; "Against the Racist, Nationalist, Capitalist, Militarist Order"; "Action, Insubordination, Solidarity!" There was a contingent from Belgian and Italian comrades. This event received little coverage in the media (surprise, surprise!).

International Round-up

THE ACF SEES the need for an international unification of revolutionary anarchists and libertarian communists. Capitalism is international, so is the working class. Our assault upon Capitalism must be international and we need an international organisation to co-ordinate this.

Unfortunately, such a co-ordination does not, for the moment, exist and a great deal of work, both political and organisational, needs to be done in order to create it. The ACF is in contact with similar political groups and tendencies in various countries and we regularly exchange publications. We thought our readers would be interested to know about libertarian revolutionaries and publications which hold similar positions to our own. We are, therefore, reviewing some of the journals which we have recently recieved.

Courant Alternatif no. 36. Published monthly, Courant Alternatif is the magazine of the Organisation Communiste Libertaire, a national co-ordination of libertarian revolutionaries in France. Issue 36 contains articles on the Zapatista uprising in Mexico: 'Against The New World Order, Viva Zapata!', on the role of education under capitalism: 'School, Knowledge and Training' and on the recent state repression against Kurdish organisations in France amongst its 36 pages. This edition also has a supplement tabloid on the state of the class struggle in France.

COMUNISMO LIBERTARIO

Comunismo Libertario no. 7/8. A bi-monthly journal of anti- authoritarian theory and practice, Comunismo Libertario is produced by the Federazione di Comunisti Anarchici but acts as a discussion journal for much of the libertarian left in Italy. This edition carries articles on the manoeuvring of the two "communist" parties, PDS (Part of the Democratic Left) and the Rifondazione Comunista. Also of interest is an article on the School COBAS (Committees of the Base) in which anarchist communists have been active.

Confrontations no. 24. Confrontations is the quarterly review of the Organisation Socialiste Libertaire in Switzerland. Originally confined to French speaking Switzerland, the OSL now has sections in German speaking areas. In common with much of the libertarian communist press there is a focus on the Zapatistas. Also included is an article on the Spanish general strike in January and a report of the events from the perspective of the CGT, an anarcho-syndicalist union in Spain. Like much of Europe's libertarian left the OSL has an ambiguous attitude towards syndicalist methods of organisation.

Workers Solidarity no. 41. Quarterly magazine of the Workers Solidarity Movement in Ireland. Originally a monthly, Workers Solidarity has been coming out for 10 years now. From no. 42 it will changing from a magazine to a tabloid format and will be supplemented by a new journal called Libertarian Socialism. The central article in issue 41 is 'What Sort of Ireland Do We Want?' but there's also stuff on various struggles happening over there. And of course . . . an article on Zapata! Despite our real differences with the WSM, particularly over the trade union and national questions, Workers Solidarity remains an impressive example of committed libertarian journalism.

WORKERS SOLIDARITY
MAGAZINE OF THE WORKERS SOLIDARITY MOVEMENT
ISSUE NO. 41 SPRING 1994

Lonnsslaven no. 4. Lonnsslaven, meaning "The Wage Slave", describes itself as a "Paper for the Abolition of Wage Slavery and for Anti-Statist Socialism". A 36-page magazine, it is produced by an editorial group in Oslo, Norway. No. 4 contains articles on science and technology, on the Autonome movement in northern Europe: 'Autonomy or Brutal Reformism?' and an analysis of the Timex Strike in Dundee, amongst others. Probably the most clear-sighted libertarian communist journal in Scandinavia.

Alternative Libertaire no. 21. Lots of stuff on the Zapatistas in this 16-page monthly journal of the organisation of the same name. The French group Alternative Libertaire used to be known as the Union of Libertarian Communist Workers but is now "broader" politically/organisationally.

Alternative Libertaire

The Revolt no. 2. "A Magazine of Revolutionary Anarchism" from the South African based Anarchist Revolutionary Movement, is the only non-European journal in this review. Includes articles on New World Order in Africa, the South African Police: "SAP— To Serve and Protect... To Torture and Kill' and on the violence in the black community amongst other stuff. The ARM also distribute our pamphlet The Role of the Revolutionary Organisation!

In the next Organise! we hope to be able to review libertarian communist journals which we haven't had space for here.

VIVA ZAPATA!

"REVOLT IS LIFE, submission is death." — Ricardo Flores Magon, Mexican anarchist, murdered by US authorities in 1922.

The armed uprising of 1st January 1994 launched by the EZLN (Ejercito Zapatista de Liberacion Nacional) in the southern state of Chiapas surprised all of Mexican society, even though this movement was totally forseeable. After its initial surprise, the government admitted its knowledge of the movement of armed groups in Chiapas during 1993, during which several soldiers were killed.

Over the next few days the Mexican media published a list of actions taken against the peasants, the great majority of whom are Indians. Armed repression was the immediate reply of the authorities to the demands for better conditions, followed by arrests and mass imprisonment. The attacks on the peasants led by the landowners, big farmers and the Army contributed to the radicalisation of the peasant organisations, which linked peasant demands to respect for individual rights, and which took up the call for radical agrarian reform. The EZLN sprang out of these organisations.

Chiapas state is the home to the descendants of the Mayas, who hang on to the mountain slopes, cultivating tiny patches of land that produce just enough to survive. The earth here is volcanic and very fertile, but it gets easily washed away in the first rainstorms. Growing maize allows for survival, and just that, and mortality, above all infant mortality, is very high. The men hire themselves out for work on a regular basis, for three-six consecutive months during the coffee harvest. The small towns of the valleys are occupied by mestizos (mixed blood) and whites who have ferocious racist attitudes towards the Indians.

The Indians were driven from the more fertile valleys to the wooded slopes to make room for the big plantations. Now they are not even safe there, as the Mexican airforce carries out bombing raids.

Chiapas state is 80% Indian, yet not one Indian is in a responsible post. There is an almost complete lack of education among the Indians. The owners of the fincas, the great coffee plantations, see them only as a source of labour, and the government regard them as invisible, with no rights and no voice.

But the Indians of the region have always put up a fierce and courageous resistance to the system of exploitation put into place by the Spanish colonialists and by their successors. In 1847 the Mayan rebellion broke out against the plantation owners and resistance lasted for fifty years. The Mexican authorities exacted a terrible revenge.

The Trans-American Highway has opened up the region to the tourists from the USA, and locals are used as guides and to provide ethnic flavour to the visits to the important Maya ruins. Because of the historic tradition of struggle of the Indians, they are closely watched by the authorities. This has not stopped them creating alternative structures operating in semi-secrecy or complete secrecy. It is quite common to find in a village an official administration run by mestizos and a secret structure operated by Indians. A lot rarer, and more tolerated than accepted is the example of villages like Chamula. This village on the heights over San Cristobal de las Casas has a council of elders which runs the village. It supplies the town with all its fruit and vegetables and quickly became swamped by tourists. The council decided to close the village to tourists and not to supply food until an amenable solution was reached.

Despite this, the attack on traditional culture, deculturation, is enormous. The Indians' ancestors were celebrated for the production of wool items, but now one finds most clothes made out of imported synthetic materials, which are much less effective against the mountain cold.

The Mexican authorities, and their counterparts in the rest of the world, tried to make out that the self-organisation of the Indians in the EZLN was impossible, and must be the work of Marxist-Leninist guerilla groups infiltrating from Guatamala. The British left, tied as it is to the ruling class, was sometimes to be found guilty of this. One paper, which likes to denounce Trotskyists and anarchists equally and which situates itself on the "communist left" came out with the following moronic statement that the Zapatistas "may have been manipulated by Mexican or other Latin American leftist guerilla groups".

The uprising was chosen specifically to coincide with the signing by President Salinas of the North American Free Trade Agreement, which started operating on 1 January 1994. The United States itself now feels implicated, and under pressure at home, has to tell the Mexican State to back off from full scale repression. Strategically, the date was also well-chosen because many soldiers were drunk in the barracks and police stations because of the New Year celebrations. The Zapatistas were thus able to occupy five towns smoothly and efficiently. To capture the town hall of a large town with a large barracks only eight kilometres away is a considerable achievement. On 2 January they voluntarily left the towns to undertake a two-day march to the forest of Lacandon, where they created a zone of liberation which is well-nigh impregnable. The armed detachments are formed of 90% young men and women. The local villages are supplying them with food.

The Catholic Church has been thrown into disarray by the uprising. When the Mexican Revolution took place, the property of the Church was confiscated by the State. But two years ago, the Church reached a deal with the Federal government in Chiapas that it could have its churches and cathedrals back if it laid off making noises about human rights and the situation of the Indians. So now there is open conflict between the supporters of liberation theology who have links with the Indian communities, and those who want to make sure they keep their property. This explains the abortive attempt of the Vatican to have the Bishop of San Cristobal, Samuel Ruiz, removed from office. The Mexican government put pressure on the Pope to carry this out then backed off when the uprising broke out.

Refusal

The development of the struggle in Chiapas, combining armed action with mass direct action, the occupation of the land and the official buildings points to the existence of a strong social movement. The refusal of the EZLN to talk about capturing power, the understanding that workers of the land and town must unite, the radical and sometimes anti-hierarchical sensibility of its pronouncements and the references to Emiliano Zapata, the most libertarian of the leading lights of the Mexican Revolution, who had many close contacts with the Mexican anarchist movement, makes us view the EZLN in a favourable light.

Against this, we have to note the gap between the vast mass of the movement, the peasants in arms, and the EZLN committee. The peasants want the land to be held in common and they want better roads, medical services and schools. If you ask them about the NAFTA they don't say that this isn't important, that it doesn't interest them, but they refer you to the committee. The committee is able to fax its messages to the principal papers and is very aware of the international situation. Whilst putting the Indian problem at the head of the agenda, they demand that the workers in foreign-owned factories receive the same wages as those workers in the workplaces at home. This is OK as far as it goes, but it shows a gap between the mass and the "leading militants" which the ACF has always recognised as a problem. There is no talk about the big Western corporations which own up to 30,000 hectares of land in the region, whilst Mexican law permits a ceiling of 2,500 hectares. These corporations have got around this by making each 2,500 hectares out to mum, dad, kids and the dog!

Another major problem is that the EZLN has not broken with the illusion of democracy. They talk about "The formation of a free and democratic government in our country" and "the liberated populations freely and democratically electing their own administrative authorities" (from the Declaration of the Forest of Lacandon). The second statement is ambiguous. Does it mean the creation of revolutionary bodies controlled by mass assemblies of working people or does it mean participating in the democratic farce? All this alongside statements like "We use the colours red and black in our uniform, because they are symbols of working people in their strikes". The committee itself may well be dominated by partisans of liberation theology, drawn from among the Catholic lay preachers.

The Zapatista revolt has been driven by hunger and desperation and represents the first attempts by peasants to organise. Because it is still developing its ideas its politics are ambiguous and there are real possibilities of the struggles of the Indians and poor Mexican peasants being hijacked. Some of the political parties are already making out they support the cause of the Indians. Amongst these are the PRD (Party of Democratic Revolution) of Cuauhtemoc Gardenas and certain sections of the ruling Institutional Party of Revolution who were in disagreement with Luis Donaldo Colosio being made official candidate for the forthcoming presidential elections. As well as these mainstream parties, there are the little parties which represent "the real proletarian spirit of the people" like the Revolutionary Worker-Peasant Party Union of the People (PROCUP) and the Party of the Poor (PDLP) who claimed responsibility for the bomb attacks carried out a few weeks after the outbreak of the rising.

The peasants of Chiapas cannot win on their own. There need to be active links made with peasants of other regions of Mexico and the workers of the towns. Real and effective international solidarity has to be built up, both in the rest of Latin America and in North America and the rest of the world. If this does not happen then they risk a long and frightful guerilla war where they may suffer terrible casualties and where they remain trapped in the false ideas of liberation theology, democracy and national liberation.

Postscript

The assassination of Colosio, the official candidate of the ruling party further destabilises the situation in Mexico. There are possibilities that he may have been killed by rival factions in the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or by elements within the Army. The militarists wanted to smash the Zapatistas brutally, but were restrained by the government, themselves under pressure from the USA. Whatever the answers, the Mexican situation can only be further aggravated, bringing the period of tight control by the ruling clique to an end.

Anarchism in Arabic!

AIDED BY international contributions, the comrades of Al Badil al taharouri (Libertarian Alternative) in Lebanon have completed the translation into Arabic of Anarchism.

This is considered by many to be the best introduction to class struggle anarchism, and was written by the veteran French libertarian communist Daniel Guerin.

Now the comrades need the money to print it. IMOs etc, made payable to Agora 2000, to finance and to aid Al Badil al taharouri can be sent via BP 177, 75967 Paris cedex 20, France.

Appeal of the comrades active in Yugoslavia

FOLLOWING THE issue of the bulletin Preko Zidova Nacionalizma i Rata (Beyond the Walls of Nationalism and War), the Italian anarchist group Germinal in Trieste, on the border with ex-Yugoslavia, have received the following appeal from a number of small anarchist groups in Yugoslavia (Serbia).

They say: "We need help. We have neither anarchist books nor pamphlets nor papers. We have no experience of struggle. We need support in several ways. Whatever you decide to send us will be useful for our development, to defend our ideas and reach out to others. Remember: solidarity is a revolutionary action".

Anyone who wants to help these comrades active in this part of the Balkans, particularly isolated because of the embargo which favours the government and speculation, can send material written in English to Germinal at: GRUPPO GERMINAL, 11 via Mazzini, 34124 Italy.

You can also get copies of the bulletin written in Serbo-Croat from them to distribute here.

The Mythology of Nationalism

THE MYTH OF the golden age before the invader came has been a potent force in modern Irish republican politics.

The shining vision of the pure Gaelic race, rich in culture and learning, ruled by noble kings and defended by superhuman heroes, has become so fixed in the nationalist psyche that ancient legends are more often seen as historical fact than as stories that have grown in the telling. To the exploited and demoralised worker in Belfast and the Bogside the dream of finally ousting the invader and recreating this golden age has had a powerful appeal. The cruel lie that everything would be wonderful if we could get the Brits out is central to nationalist mobilisation.

On the other side of the fence the loyalists have also cottoned on to the racial purity con, realising that the British label, which they have so desperately clung to and so tragically died for in their thousands, may be plucked from their patriotic breasts by an ungrateful master. They too have burrowed deep into the misty past to find their own set of dubious roots in the fertile soil of Irish (sorry . . . Ulster) mythology. This has furnished them with an historical basis for their Ulster Nationhood.

The real history of the Irish people (in the sense of inhabitants of a geographical area rather than of some rhetorical abstraction called "The People") is a buried beneath the crushing weight of the mythology, romanticism, power struggles, political manoeuvring and carefully fostered lies of the "Great Men" who shaped and wrote the official versions.

But who are the "Irish/Ulster people"? What is the common root of "Irishness/Ulsterness" which nationalists proclaim? Any attempt at establishing racial purity in Ireland is doomed to failure, even a cursory glance at an Irish telephone directory or even at the surnames of Irish republican leaders, from Tone to De Valera and Adams, will reveal the varied ingredients that serve to make up the modern Irish population. The list of those that invaded/cultivated the island and were subsequently assimilated into the population is long and diverse. Amongst the ingredients that make up the "Irish stew" can be included such names as Firbolg, Pict, Cruthin, Celt, Viking, Anglo-Norman and finally Scottish and English "planters".

Contrary to Irish nationalist mythology, it can be stated with certainty that, prior to the 12th century Anglo-Norman conquest, there is no suggestion that the geographical landmass known as Ireland was a united nation under a single political administration. Ancient Ireland was a tribal society, each tribe had its chieftain who defended the communal land while trying to grab a bit of some other tribe's territory and/or livestock. Although there may have existed some loose confederations of tribes from time to time, there seems to be no evidence of any "national" unity. The existence of a "High King" is something of a red herring in this matter. The "High King" was not, as the title tends to suggest, the overall leader of any "nation" but rather the ruler of one tribe who, in the event of a confederation of chieftains being formed, could assume an overall command. This should offer no great solace to Ulster nationalists either.

The fact that no High King based at Tara would have exercised any permanent authority over the tribes of Ulster, as the likes of the UDA enjoy claiming, is no more relevant to today than the fact that a tribe in ancient Munster would have felt little in common with a tribe in ancient Leinster, or that the Gaelic speakers of Ulster would have had difficulty in understanding the Gaelic spoken in Connaught or the Scottish highlands for that matter! And, despite the obvious cross-fertilization, ethnic and cultural, owing to the close proximity of Scotland to the North East of Ireland, this factor cannot be legitimately utilised as an explanation for the present divisions.

The coming of the Anglo-Normans to Ireland in 1169 saw the first stages of their eventual conquest of the island. A divided and militarily inferior Irish people proved to be no match for the might of the Norman fighting machine that had conquered a far more homogenous England and Wales. The Normans did however become quickly assimilated into "the locals", often becoming more Irish than the Irish themselves. The Norman leaders made good use of the divisions which existed between the various peoples of the island, forming alliances with whichever of them could best advance their objectives. Ironically, it was the armies of Ulster which held out longest against the forces of the crown. Eventually, however, the island of Ireland was "united" under the Anglo-Norman yoke. It was not until the 1790s that Irish resistance took a consciously national form in line with the emergence of modern nationalist ideology. After the defeat of the United Irishmen's 1798 aborted revolution the "union" would not again be seriously challenged until the "Gaelic Revival" of the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

The real roots of this movement lay of course in the soil of economics. The legitimate discontent of the Irish working class was easily manipulated by groups such as Arthur Griffith's Sinn Fein whose motives were far removed from altruistic concern for the common people (see Organise! 23 for a discussion of this period).

The religious factor in Irish politics became prominent from the time of the Plantation onwards. The Gaelic Irish were predominantly Catholic whilst the Gaelic Scottish and English planters and their aristocratic landlords were predominantly Protestant. This religious factor was to increase in prominence despite widespread intermarriage and "conversions" on both sides. Those involved in the struggle for power, which continues to this day, have never been slow to accentuate and capitalise upon the religious factor, utilising it as an effective tool for control and manipulation. From the genocidal antics of Oliver Cromwell to the struggle for the English throne, through various sectarian revolts and ecclesiastical power struggles, the religious divide has been carefully fostered. The history of Ireland has been so distorted and manipulated to suit the power hungry, that the Irish melting pot that assimilated peoples as diverse as Vikings, Picts and Celts has been reduced, in many minds, to the crude lie of "Catholic" Ireland fighting to regain its ancient "nation" from the imperialist "Protestant" invaders.

Leftists, and some "anarchists" have not been blameless in perpetuating the myths and lies which fuel divisions amongst the working class of this island. Much of the left has acted as cheerleader for the reactionary and often racist nationalism espoused by the pseudo-socialist IRA. This attitude has further alienated working class Protestants and driven them towards the Orange right and political neanderthals of loyalism.

The Provos like to portray the conflict here as a colonial war but, whatever it may have been in the past, it is certainly not a colonial war today. The British government does not want Northern Ireland, the Irish government does not want Northern Ireland. Neither want a civil war, however, and their tactics, despite some fairly superficial differences, are concentrated upon neutralizing the "extremists" on both sides, whether by incorporation or by oppression; sometimes by both methods. The choice for the working class remains the same: continued manipulation by nationalists and capitalists of all hues or self-organised struggle against all of them. Only when the latter road is taken will the Irish working class make their own history rather than be the subject of ruling class self-interest.

Transport or Traffic?

IN THIS ARTICLE we look at the origins of the motor traffic system and the huge malign influence of the Road Lobby. In the next issue we will look at the Human and Environmental consequences and alternatives/resistance to road traffic.

Origins of Traffic System

Nikoli Kondriatev, a Marxist writing in the 1920s posited the Kondriatev cycle which argued that the industrial economy expanded and contracted in waves of about 50 years: peaks in 1817, 1870 and 1914 and troughs around 1745, 1790, 1844 and 1890. Andrew Tylecote suggested that each boom period is associated with the successful emergence of a "new technological style" characterised by a new form of transportation. The end of the 18th century in Britain saw the development of the canal system, the rising boom of 1844-70 the emerging rail network, with the steel and electrical style before the First World War developing in the boom decade after 1918 into Fordism. After the 1930s slump and World War Two, Fordism — the Transnational Oil based economy of cars and motorways, super tankers and aeroplanes — came into its own. These theories suggest that the economy expands until it reaches the limits of its distribution system. Slumps tend to be caused by glut — the inability to shift (rather than produce) goods. One promising way out of recession is therefore to reach a larger market by developing new transport systems.

Whatever the validity of this theory, the ruling class are often ruthless in their elimination of old transport systems in order to introduce new ones. No sooner had the British canal system been introduced, at great expense, than it was judged obsolete. The new rail companies, flush with investors' money, bought up canals and took them down; within a few decades the canal system was moribund and Britain was covered in railways.

Road Lobby

The Road Lobby is made up of companies who profit from cars, lorries and the raw materials, fuel and infrastructure they need. Worldwide they are responsible for destroying more human-scale, environmentally friendly forms of transport with huge consequences for community, health and environment. Why? Because they are less profitable: one bus does the work of 35 cars, a tram that of 60, a train that of 1000 cars or 150 lorries.

In 1925, the General Motors Corporation set about systematically destroying non-motor transport systems in America. They bought up the largest manufacturer of urban and inter-urban buses in America. In 1926 they helped set up the Motor Transit Corporation (Greyhound) which agreed to purchase all its equipment from GM. General Motors then bought up all possible competitors for production of buses, destroying the commuter services of Pennsylvania, NY Central, NY, New Haren and Hartford. Southern Pacific, Great Northern and St Louis South Western railroads were also badly affected. In similar vein in 1936 they set up a company, together with Standard Oil and Fines the Tyres, which bought up US train companies and closed them down. By 1956 over 100 electric surface rail systems in 45 cities had been acquired and closed down. In cities, the only way that a new market for the buses could be created was for GM to finance the conversion of its electrical tramway systems to motor buses. This was done by setting up the United Cities Motor Transit Company in 1932. Tramways were bought, converted to buses and then sold off to local companies which were compelled to buy General Motors equipment exclusively. This continued rapidly until 1935 when the American Transit Association exposed GM's chicanery. Company executives and employees "independently" set up another holding company with other car and oil companies, National City Lines, in 1936. Local companies now had to agree to buy only new equipment which used fuel oil and GM/Standard Oil products and Firestone Tyres exclusively.

Before the motorisation of California by GM, Los Angeles was a beautiful city of lush palm trees, fragrant orange groves and ocean air. Now it is a wasteland. Trees are dying in a petrochemical smog. The orange groves, polluted by lead from petrol fumes were paved over for 300 miles of freeways. The air is a cesspit into which four million cars daily pump 13,000 tons of pollutants. Fifty years after the American road lobby started work, the US transport system is a nightmare. Pedestrians and cyclists have been bullied off the streets, railways have almost vanished and half the lead area of most cities consists of roads and parking lots. The road lobby bankrolls many politicians to vote against clean air and fuel efficiency, making American cars the most wasteful in the western world.

In Britain, the road lobby is represented by the British Road Federation, founded in the 1930s to "combat the sinister and distorted propaganda of the railways to enslave British Industry". It is a coalition of car makers such as Ford, motor organisations (AA, RAC), roadbuilders (Taylor Woodrow, McAlpine), oil companies (BP, Texacxo), lorry operators (TIT, Freight Transport Association) and diverse others (eg Tate & Lyle Sugars, Bulmers Cider Ltd, National Farmers Union). They are all united by the prospect of economic growth, which they maintain is linked to the health of the motor industry and "reducing transport costs" (Department of Transport). In Britain the (Labour) government started the demolition of the railway system. It was bought and nationalised after the Second World War. Some 46% of the track was torn up and much of the rest run down. The road lobby is now in the vanguard of privatising the railways, which will decimate what remains of a once comprehensive transport system. Member firms of the RTF are presently planning bids for rail privatisation which will be an asset-stripping bonanza to dwarf that of the buses. There will be prime development sites in city centres, "weird" rural services will probably be made the responsibility of local government, then councils will be starved of cash so they have to cut services (and take the flack). The strategy of the road lobby is to continually up their demands. If the road is a single lane, dual it. If dualled give it three lanes. If somewhere doesn't have a by-pass, give it one. If there is one to the south, give it one to the north. If it has an M25, build another. If it already has a north-south motorway (as in East Anglia), add another.

Traffic lobbyists and planners now talk of the need for "infrastructure" rather than roads, a co-ordinated distribution system using different technologies: "a single network, lined by markets, technology and organisation, which produce a single output: mobility for the citizen and the economy". (The European Round Table of Industrialists (ERT) which includes Fiat, Volvo, Daimler-Benz, MAN, Petrofina, Total, Shell, BP, Pirelli and Plessey).

Railways are now back in favour — if they are high speed, such as TGV/part of Cultural Identity: An Anarchist Perspective

MANY OF THE examples used here are taken from an Irish context. This is because I am familiar with Irish culture and would rather use it exclusively in this article than make errors by using examples from, say, North America. Readers can make comparisons with their own culture and hopefully the uniqueness of Irish culture will not distort the theory incorporated in this piece.

Culture is a glib word these days. It is a subject for the arrogant intelligensia to idly chat about at fashionable gatherings. It is a source of profit for parasitical industries. It's true meaning of belonging and identity has been forgotten. But how does anarchist communism fit into all of this and secondly, why?

Firstly, I would like to point out the advantages of a form of identity that is common to us all: cultural identity. This phrase is often linked with right-wing hate groups, patriotic warmongers and articles written by upper middle class journalists in the Sunday Mail. However, one of the purposes of this article is to show that culture can be of advantage to groups and individuals.

The idea of "belonging" comes easily to human beings. We are naturally sociable animals with complex social structures and a high degree of intelligence. It was inevitable that a series of dress codes, music forms, art forms, languages, dances, stories etc would develop from such an advancing species. It is obvious that the above would unite people into tribes, clans and "peoples".

The emotion of "being part of the group" is a major part of the human psyche. When a person feels part of their chosen group, they feel the solidarity and strength of the group supporting them. The aforementioned expressions of culture (language, music etc) reinforce this feeling, which is all too often looked down on by middle-class leftists as being mindless, animalistic conformity. They fail to see that it is an intrinsic part of human nature and an emotion that is hard to resist. They fail to see that cultural identity can give people a degree of self-respect, dignity and a sense of belonging.

Culture reinforces the idea of community. When people feel that they have something in common, ie their language, their traditions, they feel a bond that encourages fraternity and comradeship.

Culture has been a weapon against imperialism and colonialism. Native Americans, Africans and other oppressed peoples had their language and customs suppressed and eradicated because the imperialists correctly recognised that they were an obstacle in their path towards domination and exploitation. The oppressors knew their victims drew solidarity from their traditions and that to make any "progress" then these traditions would have to be removed. Admittedly, some Europeans believed that they were acting in their victims' best interests but this is a lame excuse for the cultural (and sometimes physical) genocides that took place.

Culture has been seen to be subversive in its opposition to uniformity and passivity. Taking Ireland as an example, during the years of the Stormont government there was no funding for Irish language groups and Gaelic games were not permitted at one council's playing grounds. Television pictures and news in general sent out from Ulster gave the impression of a serene little corner of the UK which could have been Cornwall or Yorkshire. Royal visits were carried out to show "the people's" aversion to Irish culture.

Cultural suppression is still carried out today. Wales has a Welsh TV channel, education in Welsh and road signs and town names in Welsh. Northern Ireland has little of this. Any form of Celtism is immediately connected with An Poblacht, Sinn Fein, the IRA and Tiocfaidh ar la. So in the British government's terms, Irish culture is subversive. Comparisons with the above example can be made with many other colonial countries.

To round up on culture's advantages: culture is a means of encouraging community. It is a means of giving identity to the individual. Its expressions (music, art, etc) are there for the creative mind to enjoy. Culture can be a way of resisting uniformity and imperialism.

However, cultural identity has a darker side. Its universal attraction has been used by ambitious national leaders to enslave the working class. Nationalism rears its ugly head wherever culture is used aggressively. It is used as an excuse for war and even genocide. The myth of national unity is an engineered result of people's enthusiasm for cultural identity. When the idea that the English/Irish/X working class has something in common with the English/Irish/X capitalist class gains influence it should be obvious that culture has been used to form an unequal inter-class relationship. When "all Irish together" means "all Irish together (as long as you work for me)" we should be able to see that culture has been used as a weapon against the working class.

Culture is used for militaristic purposes. "For Queen and Country" is a familiar saying and comes easily to the lips of the older generation. The horrific example of the World Wars show us how the "us and them" attitude was used against the working class. National service is welcomed in many countries as a patriotic duty. Culture's expressions can be restrictive. Dress codes, skin colour must meet the standard norm of the majority. Dissent is not encouraged. The non-conformist is "funny" or a "crank" and is inevitably shunned.

Indeed, "our" culture has been exploited by capitalism to a degree that is now detrimental to our lives. The tourist industry uses "native tradition" as a major marketing ploy to sell us holidays and souvenirs. Money is made from putting on displays of staged folk dancing and the like. The immorality of the profit motive is obvious from this perversion of culture. To have what is rightfully ours sold back to us is ethically wrong.

The old idea of culture is quickly being changed by the media-orientated version of culture. The despicable fashion industry is a particularly nauseating example. New clothes are produced every season which are useless, expensive and divert the mind from anything remotely cerebal or meaningful. This constant up-dating of "ideas" makes people disregard their hereditary culture and any of the advantages that come with it. The war cry of the new culture is, "To usher out the old and buy in the new". TV culture, car culture, fashion culture, dollar culture: all ways to make us more adaptable to capitalism and its needs. People once identified "culture" as a set of traditions and customs that were characteristic to themselves. Now the word is synonymous with the rat-race, global lifestyle we all "enjoy".

As anarchist communists we want to create a new world in which people are not under the yoke of consumerism. To do so we will have to destroy this new breed of culture which has infected our lives with its grasping desire for profit. If this is achieved people may rediscover what they have lost. Our real culture may return and for once it will be entirely determined by us. In places where it has been used to create divisions we will have to tread carefully. Do we support it or oppose it? The line between diversity and division can be a thin one. But to quote from Active Resistance: "Capitalism's greatest fear and threat is a non-consumerist, non-conformist, cultured society".

Hopefully this article will cause you, the reader, to think carefully about this issue which could be of great importance when capitalism is lifted from the shoulders of the working class. Within the early stages of a revolutionary upheaval a period of disorientation may occur. This uncertainty may cause old, forgotten rivalries to surface. We should be equipped with the arguments to counter this.

Dear Organise!
Class strugglists used reformist eco-crats promoting themselves through oxymoronic "green consumerism" to dismiss the post-1990 Euro election Green boom as "the salvation of capitalism". Your 'Monkey Wrenchers' article (Organise! No. 33, pp7-8) shows progress from the ostrich position, although disinterring Chris "Miss Anthropy" Manes and other conservationist/conservative Wild Earth marginals just sets up new "straw men".

Redwood Summer isn't "unique". Since Judi Bari first advanced the arguments for worker solidarity that Foreman's "humanoids" found so unpalatable in 1990, Earth First! has consistently argued that without a sustainable alternative to corporate pillage, primary resource workers are destroying their own job security as well as the environment. It's not about "preaching at the proles" either — it's their employers that are responsible, capitalists like MacMillan Bloedel who'll continue clear-cutting Canada's rainforest to feed the US junk bond market until it's all gone at the end of the decade and then dump its tens of thousands of employees thereafter.

Until such workers have enough power to determine their own future, the environment in/on which they work has no future either — which is where the IWW come in, whatever reservations you may have about their syndicalism. We can debate whether all this will actually bring about the (green) revolution — but all involved think themselves revolutionaries.

Given your prominent M11 coverage (Organise! No. 33 p3), your failure to analyse EF! UK was particularly disappointing. Since its 1991 foundation, the UK movement has grown distinct from that in the US. Lacking indigenous wilderness, UK campaigns have orientated around opposing community to consumption infrastructure development — Golden Hill being as strong an example of this as George Green — and in this they more closely resemble German resistance to the nuclear state or the Japanese against Tokyo airport than US efforts.

Assuming current campaigning conditions continue, it will be impossible for EF! UKers to evade coherent social analysis — and thus the realisation that capitalism must be destroyed, not reformed. However, the tactics eco-activists see as appropriate to this end and the form of post-revolutionary society they envisage are unlikely to appeal to anarchist communists — whether that denies them validity is, perhaps, also for future debate.

Yours, for peoples' power and personal autonomy,
Oxford Green Anarchists

Eds reply: Point taken about EF! UK. The 'Monkey Wrenchers' article was written by an ACF member currently in the USA and was referring to his experiences and knowledge of the US outfit. We're not so sure that EF! UK will "spontaneously" develop an anti-capitalist position, as you seem to suggest. Rather we feel that there must be a dynamic exchange of ideas between revolutionary Green militants and libertarian communist militants in order to develop a coherent, green (for want of a better term) libertarian communist analysis of capitalist society.

The Rape of Eastern Europe

Dear Organise!
As seen from my own experiences in Romania and meeting and living with the people there, I see extreme exploitation and hardship for a comparatively underdeveloped (in the capitalist bosses' eyes) region of Europe — the Balkans. The authoritarian regime of State Capitalism (stalinists) under President Nicolae Ceaucescu and his dynasty produced an extreme police state and total control of the masses. This was done through the Securitate (secret police) of which there were thousands who were orphans of Ceaucescu's austere laws and policies of no abortion or contraception to produce more workers; these were brought up and "educated" (read brainwashed) by the State that Ceaucescu was their father. They then had a network of informers so that people literally lived in a state of fear. They had to carry identity cards wherever they went, or risk a fine or imprisonment, and needed permission or a visa to visit anyone outside their home town.

There were many other forms of control and in the latter days of the eighties for the so-called "national good" there was rationing of all commodities, the rest being exported to pay off the debts incurred to Russia and the West in the '70s. Life was worse than under the previous outright fascist government, monarchy and feudalism, which the people had not long left.

Under a programme known as "systemisation" the majority of self-sufficent rural peasant villages (especially those that were Hungarian and German) were starting to be destroyed both to produce an urban working class for industrialism (capitalism), to control the people better and to destroy the ethnic minorities (fascism). Much of what I have seen in Romania I can see happening subtly and slowly in Britain by a government totally out of touch with the people with a police to control the people and keep them in poverty and hardship so hopefully they won't fight back. The reorganising of the police into zones, for example (to the Romanian sectors) and the clamping down on benefits, austerity measures and increasing restriction on people's freedom and on what they can afford. Is the future of Britain to be another Romania or Albania — an extreme police state? Not if ourselves and comrades throughout the world can help it!

Now Romania has Democracy and nothing has changed — just a new boss Ion Iliescu (ex-Communist Party). After the so-called "revolution" (for which the state has even made commemoration coins), all they have is a little more freedom to meet people from other countries and to live in less fear. But for most, things have got even worse: massive inflation means that much of the miserly wage (about 50% a month) is spent on just surviving on extremely expensive food, with very little savings. Only an elite minority (mostly ex-communists) can afford to travel outside their own country. This is why thousands of people are fleeing in droves into "prosperous" Hungary and the West seeking a better life. The EC now wants to clampdown on immigration from this region and create a new Iron Curtain, to cut of the Balkans, an area of great poverty and unrest.

What Romania and the unrest of Eastern Europe needs — and there are signs of this starting to evolve in Romania — is to build a national, and then International Working Class revolution to overthrow all bosses and governments, and help create a real future for all, a classless Anarchist Communist society. We look forward to this evolving in Eastern Europe and the rest of the world: forward to the International Revolution.

Letter from South Africa

Dear comrades,
It's great to hear from you. We hope all is well with your organisation. Firstly, we must congratulate you on an excellent publication. We've not had the time to read through it all but what we've seen has really impressed us. Secondly, as you've more than likely guessed we feel that your articles concerning South Africa are superb. Unlike most "revolutionary anarchist" publications you've researched your topic and published well informed articles. Congrats. Now to update you on local anarchist activity. We are currently involved in the formation of Anarchist Student Action on the campus of Witwatersrand. It's very much a Catch 22 situation. We can't be constituted as a "legal" movement unless we have 25 members yet as an "illegal" movement we cannot get people to join as we may not advertise. Anyway to date we have 12 members.

R. and E. Anarchist
Revolutionary Movement, South Africa

Eds reply: We wish the South African comrades all the best. They will need much courage and determination in the struggle ahead. The comrades have reproduced the ACF pamphlet Role of the Revolutionary Organisation and are distributing it throughout S.Africa.

Review

On the Border of a Police State. £2 54pp. Hackney Community Defence Association, Trade Union Support Unit, 1993.

This booklet is well worth reading despite certain aspects which I will comment on later from an anarchist communist perspective. It recognises police crime and the fact that it is not even recognised as such. It then details the increasing powers being given to the police for political purposes with regards to industrial disputes, strikes, travellers, squatters, football crowds, workplace militants and political activists. It examines the three new reports on the police, the White Paper on Police Reform, the Sheeehy Report, and the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice Report.

The government is looking at ways of cutting costs in line with its general austerity programme. Sheehy's report was opposed by the police for undermining their powers and for attacking the permanency of the job, in line with world-wide strategies of temporary contracts and casualisation. The State wants a strong police force, but at the same time it wants to increase its control of it, and to undermine any autonomous power it may develop. This is rather a dilemma for them, because if the proposals of the reports were actually implemented, senior police officers will become some of the most powerful individuals in Britain.

The pamphlet details ways in which the police force can be resisted through legal support, victim support, investigating the police, seeking redress and publicity positing (surprise! surprise!) a role for the trade unions. The authors of the pamphlet understand that in an unequal society the police are there to maintain law and order for the rich and powerful against the poor and powerless, but go on to argue that the police are necessary because of anti-social elements. We disagree. We think that a self organised working class could look after its own communities. For us, all States are Police States. Nevertheless the pamphlet is useful for showing how the police are steadily increasing their powers.

Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.
2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class. Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.
3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.
4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.
5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.
6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.
7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.
8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.
9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation.
We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

Join us!

THE 20-YEAR economic depression/recession continues with large scale long term unemployment (four to five million plus) a permanent fixture.

This is the political truth that none of the established Parties will admit to. It is a "sign of the times" that although the Conservative government is riven by crisis and scandal (Back to Basics, Health Service cuts, Irangate, arms-for-aid sweeteners) there is no credible opposition which will bring the government down (not that genuine revolutionaries care who administers capitalism). The La-Bore Party has long since dropped any pretence of socialism and vainly tries to out-Tory the Tories ("critically supported" of course by the Left). The racist policies and electioneering of the ruling Social Democrats in Tower Hamlets has shown the nature of their "radicalism". The Green Party remains wedded to capitalism, parliament and legality with their pathetic bleatings about "our" government and the notion that "we're all (equally) responsible for pollution" — thank you, Union Carbide.

The triumph of private capitalism globally, preceded by the fall of the "Communist" regimes of Eastern Europe, has caused the collapse of many British left-wing groups. The Socialist Workers Party has taken advantage of this implosion in their dash for growth, aka never-mind-the-politics, look at the membership figures. The left's main pre-occupation is anti-fascism. They use their various front organisations (ANL, ARA, YRE) to recruit, and plug their counter-revolutionary politics, defending democracy and nationalism. So what real alternative is there? What alternative for those sickened by this rotting society, whose highest cultural forms seem to be Mr Blobby and Blind Date?

The anarchist movement in this country has failed to take advantage of the most favourable conditions for many years and remains trapped in its ghettos. Consistent and untiring propaganda and development of theory are required, as well as the need to break with the politics of the stunt and of localism. A national revolutionary organisation is needed. We in the ACF are working towards this. If you agree with these perspectives, then think seriously of joining us.

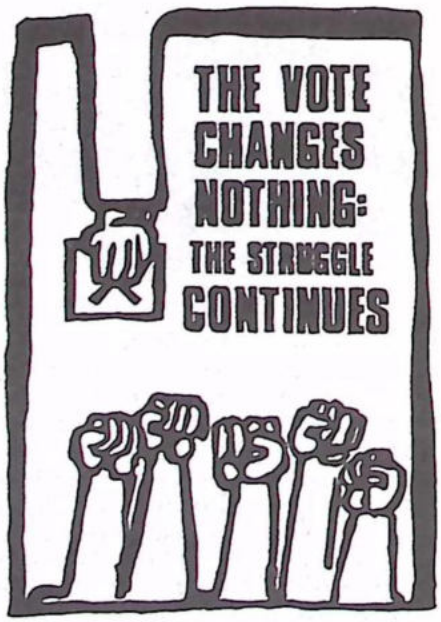
COLLECTIVE ACTION

CONTRARY TO POPULAR prejudice, fostered by both media caricatures and by the antics of a small number of self-proclaimed "anarchists", anarchism is neither "rugged individualism" nor individualistic rebellion.

Whilst anarchists argue that the realisation of individual freedom is central to any authentically revolutionary politics we don't equate this fundamental freedom with the right of individuals to manifest their ego without regard for the social totality. But, more importantly, it is our belief that it is collective action which creates change and is essential to anarchism rather the activity of isolated and atomised individuals.

Obviously this is such commonsense that it should not require comment, but so often individualism is regarded as the bedrock of anarchism, rather than its actual opposite. That, of course, is not to say that anarchists are opposed to individuality — far from it — but that in capitalist society individual*ism* is at best an excuse by some to selfishly indulge themselves and at worst an ideology which encourages the most horrendous competitivness and exploitation. Capitalism loves (and sings the highest praises of) individualism whilst crushing real individuality. Capitalism, however, fears collective action. A Trade Union's strength is founded upon the potential, on the partof its membership, for collective action. Its ability to mobilize and control this action is crucial in maintaining its credibility and position as labour broker. Once the threat of collective action is removed, however,the Trade Unions tend to be no longer taken seriously by employers nor members.

The individual can be compared to the finger of a hand. On its own it's not particularly strong or effective but in unison with the other fingers it can become a fist.



The working class, in whatever context, be it the community or the workplace, is more easily dominated and exploited when it is divided and impotent. When organised collectively it has the potential to act in a concerted manner against capital. Although, particularly in the workplace, the individual can engage in sabotage, absenteeism and "theft", even these activities organised collectively (even clandestinely) can be more effective.

Collective action also creates a spirit of combativeness as people realise that, far from being powerless, they in fact have power which can bring about change. Probably the most outstanding example in recent years was the anti-Poll Tax movement. If resistance to that tax had been in terms of purely individual non-payment, of individuals separated from others refusing to pay, rather than in the form of a community of collective struggle, then it would have rapidly collapsed as individuals were isolated and picked off by the state.

Similarly the individual anarchist can only do so much on their own. The feeling of isolation which capitalism imposes on the individual rebel can often lead to disillusionment and despair. But, collective action in the shape of an anarchist group can accomplish far more whilst a national network constantly keeping militants informed and motivated . . . well who knows what we could achieve? Why not take the individual decision to take some collective action with the Anarchist Communist Federation?

Transport or Traffic

"multi-modal integration". Governments agree about the "need" for infrastructure. Clinton has promised to spend $80 billion on renovating America's roads, creating a new high speed rail network linking US cities and developing new technology to expand capacity. Similarly the European Commission is pledged to "the establishment and development of trans-European networks, in particular in the sectors of transport."

The forecast is for the doubling of most forms of transport. In the EC nearly five times as much freight is carried by road as by rail, 12 times as many passengers as by rail. The bulk will therefore be roads. "Intra-modal integration" consequently means different forms of transport will act more efficiently as tributaries and distributors for each other.

Infrastructure is not confined to the industrialised world. In order to meet the demands of International Capital, many governments are pumping borrowed money into infrastructure schemes. Most are centred on roads eg Amazonia (which has the most extensive national water transport network in the world) is being rapidly covered by roads, as is the Congo basin. The Pan American highway, stretching from Patagonaia to Alaska is nearly complete. There are plans to link Alaska to Siberia. If these schemes are completed, the majority of the earth's land mass will have become one continent, with motorists able to drive from Buenos Aires to Cape Town, via New York and Moscow. For the South this will mean further rounds of enclosure, more colonisation with the displacement of people and the disruption of local economies, the sacking of the environment and the dubious benefits of consumer goods.

The improvement of infrastructure in the West is part of the move from manufacturing to service/distribution economies. Goods are shunted ever faster over ever greater distances. As transport costs decrease, competing firms will venture further and further, selling identical products in each other's territory. Manufacturers will look further afield to find the cheapest supplier of components. Workers will commute ever further to work. The result will be less an improvement in the quantity of commodities available and more an increase in travel and traffic. People will have to travel further to work, shop, visit relatives and holiday in less spoilt resorts.

Even the European Commission has admitted the axiom that more roads leads to more traffic: "infrastructure planning should not necessarily seek to promote an increase in capacity, since in certain instances this might boost transport demand and in the long-term exacerbate the problem, particularly in the case of road transport". EC Green Paper.

This damaging slip was withdrawn from the subsequent White Paper. The ERT claim: "The benefits are often widespread while the costs are typically borne locally . . . technocratic designs . . . which ride roughshod over the legitimate concerns of others, will simply founder on the obstacles of local resistance . . . Environmental objections, while important, cannot be simply granted a power of veto . . . The increasingly efficient organisation of those arguing for environmental citizens' rights must be matched by a more efficient organisation of the advocates of change, adaptation and growth."

Editorial

Fight the Criminal Justice Bill!

JUST LIKE the poll tax, the Criminal Justice Bill is a flagship of the Government's legislation and rule, and just like the poll tax, this flagship can be scuppered. It was through mass revulsion against the poll tax, thousands upon thousands refusing to pay it throughout Britain, thousands organising and mobilising against it, that the Government was forced to withdraw it.

This time around, in grey Britain, anyone who questions the status quo, by behaviour, attitude, dress, politics or sexuality is singled out as a target. We have already had assaults in the media and the House of Commons on single mothers, beggars and those who dare to mention sex education. Scapegoat after scapegoat is frantically sought out. Anything to take attention away from the economic reality of four million unemployed and the end of the artificially created 'boom'.

Now under the umbrella of the Criminal Justice Bill a whole range of groups will be victimised. Gypsies, travellers, squatters, ravers, will be singled out for attack. The police will increase their powers. They will have greater 'stop and search' powers, and it will be an offence to refuse to undergo a search. The right to remain silent will be taken away. It will now be a criminal offence to stay in a squatted building 24 hours after being served with a possession order, with a six month jail sentence or £5,000 fine as punishment for disobeying. This at a time when the streets are full of homeless and 800,000 homes lie empty. Travellers will be evicted from land they camp on and councils will no longer have to provide sites for Gypsies and travellers. People getting together for a rave will be arrested, with no need for a warrant. These powers could be used against hunt saboteurs, against anti-road campaigners, and in the future against strikers if necessary. There will increased and extended use of detention against young 'offenders'.

Alliance

The Bill is attacking a whole range of groups. What is encouraging about the resistance to the Bill is the alliance that is being built between the different groups under attack. This alliance must not allow itself to be taken over by the Labour Party trying to make out it acts in their interests and channelling the resistance into an electoral jamboree. Nor must it allow itself to be hijacked by one of the Leninist vanguard groups, in particular the SWP, looking for more party fodder. Self-organisation and mass action against the Bill are the order of the day. An injury to one is an injury to all!

Railworkers

THE LEADERS OF RMT, the rail union, are anxious to come to some sort of deal with the Railtrack employers over the signals workers' pay and conditions. Railtrack, actively backed by the Government, is equally determined to make an offer that the union could make the signals workers accept.

Railtrack has hugely misjudged the mood among signals workers by appealing to them directly and bypassing the union. What they fail to realise is the simmering anger there over the pathetic 2.5% pay offer. Many earn less than £150 a week and have to work more than 13 days without a break, with shifts up to 20 hours long! This explains many of the accidents that have happened over the last few years, thanks to the fatigue of rail workers. The depth of anger has terrified the RMT leader Jimmy Knapp into calling for more than the derisory offer, but he and his fellow bureaucrats intend to limit the actions by keeping it to one-day stoppages and not involving other railworkers. But the strikes, if anything, have increased the confidence of the signals workers. They will have to go beyond the token one-day stoppages imposed by the union if they want to win. Equally they must go out to other rail and transport workers, and draw in the tube and bus workers, who are also under heavy attack from the bosses. Signs of this anger among other railworkers can be seen in the two unofficial stoppages in May-June. In Birmingham drivers left their engines for an hour over the disciplining of two workmates, resulting in disciplinary procedures being dropped. In Leeds 150 guards struck to attend a two hour mass meeting when one of their workmates was threatened with disciplinary procedures. They have continued with an overtime ban demanding the reinstatement of their mate. Similarly 1,000 busdrivers struck in late June on Merseyside over the recruiting of new drivers on lower pay and the cutting of sick pay and holidays.

A Manifesto for the Millenium

At the last National Conference of the ACF it was decided to adopt the document presented by one comrade as the basis of a new Manifesto of Anarchist Communism. This is now being worked on by ACF comrades and hopefully should be ready for the Anarchist Bookfair in October in London.

At the Bookfair we hope to have a public meeting to present the Manifesto. It will give an analysis of the current changes that capitalism is going through and will present an anarchist communist strategy to build a new revolutionary movement. Also at the public meeting we hope to have a French comrade of the Organisation Communiste Libertaire who participated in the March 22 Movement, one of the catalysts of the May 1968 events. We will of course also have a stall at the Bookfair where you can buy ACF literature and meet and talk to ACF comrades.

Firefighters

IN LIVERPOOL chief fire officer Andrew Best attempted to impose new contracts on firefighters. Thousands of firefighters demonstrated on the streets in mid-April, joined by striking postal workers.

The FBU, the fire brigade union, eagerly accepted the chance of talks, and sabotaged the chances of gaining more. The contracts were withdrawn but Best is determined that wages are kept down and that cuts are imposed. If necessary he and other fire chiefs around the country will impose this through 'natural wastage'. Firefighters went on to only answering 999 calls and Best threatened a 40% cut in wages. His middle management flunkies attempted to threaten firefighters over this action and the refusal to implement unnegotiated brigade orders. But when they went to the stations to carry this out they met with such anger that watches said they would all be disciplined rather than let one of their workmates be victimised. This was all done on an ad-hoc basis by word of mouth. Middle management were so terrified that they passed a vote of no confidence in Best and his lieutenants and said they would not discipline any firefighter. This anger is not confined to Merseyside. All over the country there are signs of discontent. In Essex five stations in April said they would refuse to answer calls unless disciplinary action against a firefighter was dropped. Management was forced to back down.

The FBU will do its utmost to sabotage any escalating unofficial actions. Unfortunately there are still many firefighters who have illusions in the FBU. Any effective action must involve action outside and against the union.

Postal workers

LIVERPOOL postal workers took unofficial strike action for five days in April against the suspension of a workmate.

Some 2,000 were involved in the action and the postie was reinstated. The leader of the UCW, the post union, Alan Johnston, eager to sabotage the strike, took a plane to Liverpool to address a mass meeting and persuade the workers to return to work. Strikes against the reorganisation of postal services also took place at sorting offices in Southend, Oxford, Bristol and Cardiff.

Italy — Victory of the Populist Right and Neo-fascists

THE ELECTIONS of March 26th and 28th in Italy led to the victory of the right/extreme right alliance led by the businessman Berlusconi.

This alliance is composed of his party Forza Italia, the Northern League and the National Alliance (ex-MSI, fascist). They have an absolute majority in the Chamber of Deputies, and a relative majority in the Senate. The alliance of the left, the Progressist Cartel, could not go beyond the maintaining of the seats of the PDS (ex-Communist Party) and some small gains for the Rifondazione Comunista (ex-members of the Communist Party, hardliners, in a new party with some of the extreme left). Other parts of the Cartel, the Greens and la Rete (anti-Mafia, composed of social-democrats and radical Christians) gained only a few seats. The Centre (the Christian Democrats renamed the PPI — Italian Popular Party, the Pact for Italy led by Segni, the Republicans etc) suffered severe defeats to the profit of the right.

Below: Berlusconi.

Berlusconi created his party out of nothing in just two months thanks to his economic and media power, using his three radio channels, television channels directly and indirectly controlled by him, press agencies and newspapers. The 'political message' of this rich businessman consisted of simplistic and demagogic statements easily digested by a potential mass of voters alienated by the political establishment and still conditioned to a great extent by the media. The magic word is 'new' and all the political parties are using this when they talk about their 'new' parties on the up, ready to clean up the old system.

Not So New!

But Berlusconi is far from new. He owes his economic fortune to the alliance of the Christian Democrats and Socialist Party that ruled up to recently, and in particular to his 'godfather' Bettino Craxi, ex-secretary of the Socialist Party, affected like so many others by recent financial 'scandals'.

Apart from the lies about newness, the other slogans are 'no to the communists' — actually anyone who has expressed the slightest doubt about Berlusconi — the 'free market' — magic term to mean the law of the jungle and privatisation of public enterprises, in particular health and education, lower taxes, and the creation of a million jobs. In reality only the rich and the professionals will pay less tax; the mass of working people will continue to be taxed on their wages. As regards a million jobs, the Italian economy is in a period of sweeping restructuring which means a cut in production and so a cut in the workforce.

In the electoral campaign Berlusconi was allied with the Northern League of Bossi and the National Alliance of Fini. The League itself is a relatively new formation and is concentrated in the north, above all in Milan and Lombardy. Outside of the usual slogans of 'less tax, more freedom for business, immigrants out' is its insistence that the more productive northern regions should not pay for the social costs of the poorer southern regions, and the demand for the creation of three large regions federated for foreign affairs, defence etc, as well as autonomy for tax-collecting and what the taxes are spent on. So, starting out on the same basis as Berlusconi, the League goes one better and calls for localism of an almost tribal nature. And this with the example of Yugoslavia on the border.

As for the National Alliance, this consists of the fascist MSI and some extreme right ex-members of the Christian Democrats. In its transformation from MSI to National Alliance the fascists increased their vote from 4% to 13% nationally, especially in the South and in Rome where they gained the majority of MPs.

A number of points have been under-estimated in the recent past. The rise of racism and violence against immigrants was explained as the actions of a tiny minority — Nazi-skins and other fascists — when the whole problem of racism is much more widespread. Many of the petty-bourgeoisie shopkeepers and small businessmen — and sections of the urban and rural working class — cast their vote for the fascists, blaming the recession and its consequences — sackings — on immigration, when this was a move by the big capitalists, national and international. Another disturbing fact was that 50% of young voters between the ages of 18 and 25 voted for the fascists!

As for the Mafia, they used the votes they controlled to support Berlusconi and the National Alliance, where before they had strong links with the Socialists. But now the Socialist Party has collapsed under the weight of the scandals and they are looking for influence through other political parties.

The victory of the right was also due to the defeat of the social movements against the restructuring plans of the previous government of the socialist Amato. These movements were very large, but the unions sabotaged the struggle, making sure no general strike took place, and that strikes were either regional, or sectional. Despite a growing movement outside the unions or in the process of breaking with the unions that managed to organise strikes, actions and demonstrations (see Organise! 29) it was not possible to defeat the Amato government, aided as it was by the unions.

The victory of Berlusconi is an end result of the process which began in 1992 when the first inquests about corruption in the political world began. All of a sudden, politicians, entire political parties, men considered untouchable, stood accused. And this in a country where scandals, State-sponsored massacres, attempted coup d'états had been the norm for decades and where the judges were totally complacent. Now some little-known magistrates put all in question.

This wasn't due to the fairness of the system. The prosecutions led by these magistrates were given the green light because Italian capitalism had to change. The collapse of the Christian Democrat reign and the 'scandals' coincided with changes in the world — the collapse of the East European regimes. The status quo imposed by the USA on Italy, which barred the Communist Party from entering the government and which resulted in a 'historic compromise', came to an end. The Christian Democrat-Socialist alliance, robbed of aid by the USA, faced mounting popular discontent.

The Communist Party, preparing for government, changed its name to Democratic Party of the Left (PDS) going over completely to social-democracy, and dropping all pretence at acting in the interest of the working class, and now began to talk about the national interest. And then the activity of the judges began. The number of Communist officials indicted was small in regard to the other Parties, but in the eyes of 'public opinion' they were seen as part of the system of corruption.

The vote for the right is the result of an inter-class phenomenon, where workers, shopkeepers, youth, managers, bosses are all drawn into a movement where the regionalism of the League right up to the rehabilitation of Mussolini and fascism and the reintroduction of the death penalty are on the agenda.

The whole history of struggle of the post-war years has been forgotten among the working class. Already the magistrates have cleared the Masonic lodge P2 of involvement in corruption and the 'politics of tension'. Berlusconi was a member of this lodge. Thus concludes 10 years of inquests into plots, political murders, unexplained massacres and bombings in which leading politicians were heavily involved.

Movement

The autonomists, the squatted social centres that have sprung up all over Italy, the anarchist and libertarian movement, the workplace coordinations of the base committees (COBAS), all play a very secondary role in this hypermedia hype scenario. Their lack of combativity point to a weakness of analyses and difficulty in developing a revolutionary identity in this new situation.

The principal problem is the weakness of a revolutionary identity and a vision of a new society — Utopia. As a member of the Anarchist-Communist Group of Rome remarked: "The presence in the struggles has never been absent, certainly, but it is trapped, in most cases, in the sacrosanct practice of 'left unionism', limited to local or specific struggles, with little staying power and without being directed towards a social confrontation".

What appears paradoxical, is that the reactionary right are seen by many young people as 'revolutionary', bypassing the radical movements of the '70s and '80s. Even the experience of the social centres, which prolonged to a certain extent this movement, has not succeeded in getting out of its youth and minority ghetto, and has been transformed from a movement confronting the system to one of defence.

Despite this objectively negative scenario, there are possibilities to develop struggles against the attacks about to be launched against the working class, and to point out the false promises of the Berlusconi government. One favourable sign was the attempt by 50,000 anarchists, autonomists and squatters to storm the National Alliance HQ in Milan during a march to commemorate the resistance to Mussolini, which was, however, thwarted by the police.

Exporting Murder — Toxic Dumping in SA

THOR CHEMICALS — the British owned company notorious for its callous treatment of black workers employed at its Cato Ridge plant near Pietermaritzburg in Natal — is again at the centre of a major controversy, this time involving the import into South Africa of toxic wastes.

Three senior executives are facing charges of murder after the death of a worker from mercury poisoning in July, and Thor Chemicals' parent company in the UK is being sued by three South African workers for damage to their health suffered at the Cato Ridge plant.

The latest controversy erupted when Greenpeace New York and South Africa's Earthlife Africa, together with the Environmental Justice Forum, revealed that a US company, Borden Chemicals and Plastics, had dispatched a shipment of 160 barrels of 'spent mercuric fluride catalyst' at Thor's Cato Ridge plant. Thor Chemicals already has a massive stockpile of imported toxic waste, believed to be in the vicinity of 4000 barrels, including the remnants from its British mercuric chloride plant, which was moved to South Africa after it was discovered that workers in the UK were being poisoned.

Demonstrators from both Earthlife Africa and the Environmental Justice Forum picketed the Cato Ridge plant on February 21st in protest at the new shipment. Similar protests were held at the Borden plant in Louisiana on the same day. Protests by Greenpeace activists in the US have now forced Borden Chemicals and Plastics to agree to take back the shipment.

Earthlife Africa has also revealed that the Department of National Health seems to be acting irregularly by allowing Thor to burn and dump wastes despite its inability to meet the minimum safety standards to qualify for an operating permit.

The Department of Water Affairs has also given Thor permission to dump toxic mercury wastes on its premises rather than at a regulated toxic waste dump. The site is not registered, as is required by law, nor have any written guidelines been provided for its management.

South Africa's environmental organisations are demanding that the government ban all further imports of toxic wastes. The African National Congress has pledged to end all imports of toxic waste into South Africa after winning the election in April, although only time will tell whether — out of line with their performance so far in other areas of policy — they will actually do so.

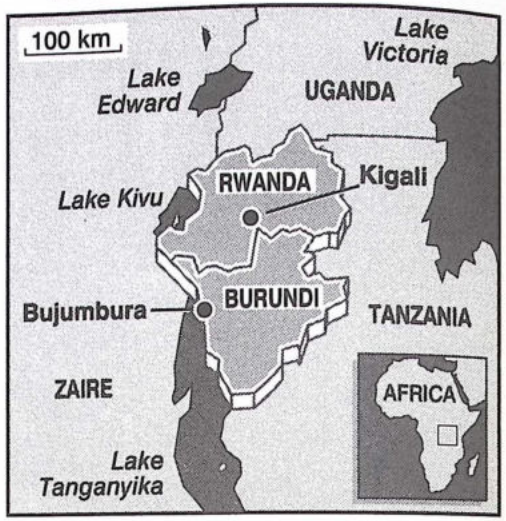
Rwanda and Burundi — 'Ethnic' Massacres and Colonial Origins

PERIODICALLY, RWANDA AND Burundi hit the pages of the Western papers with the same images of massacres and mass waves of refugees.

The journalists fill page after page with their descriptions of primitive tribalism, which they see as responsible for the instability of these two States, with the recurring undercurrent of paternalistic racism which makes Africans into big children who haven't grown out of barbarism. This allows the West to wallow complacently in its self-styled economic superiority, a spiritual and 'racial' superiority. But if we want to really understand the tragic events in these two countries we cannot ignore the colonial period and the massive effects that they have had on African societies.

If we believed the papers, the Burundi region, which is now separated into the two countries of Rwanda and Burundi, always suffered from bloody confrontations between Hutus (80% of the population) and Tutsis (19%) since the beginning of time. Nothing could be further from the truth. Before colonisation, it was a kingdom reigning over more than 200 clans, whose élites were divided into four 'social categories' (Bahutu, Batutsi, Baganwa and Batwa) which were more or less 'superclans' which had different vocations and which competed for the official posts dished out by the courts of the king and the princes.



The arrival of the colonialists profoundly shook this rigidly hierarchical society. First of all the colonialists turned the 'social categories' (not classes in the strict sense) into races, in line with the racialist and evolutionist theories of the 19th century. They opposed Tutsis to Hutus, seeing the first as the race of lords and conquerors, and the second as sedentary peasants. They laced this with large helpings of racialist mumbo-jumbo, calling the Tutsis 'semitised Hamites' or 'Europeans with black skins'. The fact that their researches had shown that intermarriage was the norm didn't change in the slightest their theory that all the African 'races' were not at the same level; the Tutsi were more advanced than the Hutu, themselves more advanced than the Twa (seen as Bantuised pygmies). As to the Ganwas they were arbitrarily labelled Tutsi, because of their social status as provincial governors.

Obscure

This theory served as the base for administrative reorganisation by the Belgian state in 1929. Colonial exploitation required the help of a small part of the local population, and the Ganwa aristocracy was chosen as best assuring social peace. The number of chiefs was reduced from 133 to 35 and the Hutu élite was marginalised, losing all the positions of chiefs, which had accounted for 20%. This wasn't to the profit of the Tutsis, but of the Ganwas and their two aristocratic lines, the Batare and Bezie, who controlled 25 of the posts.

Plural societies

As we can see, to put the problems down to tribalism is dangerous as they obscure the fact that pre-colonial Africa was not made up of united ethnic, cultural and linguistic units, but of plural societies living in interdependence.

The new idea of ethnic identity linked to political allegiances was a result of colonisation. The post-colonial states were founded on ethnicity, which gave riches and privileges to the right group.

After the Belgians left, the two countries took different directions. In Burundi, the Tutsi held on to their privileges, whilst the Hutu took power in Rwanda.

In Burundi, the history of the last 30 years is that of political instability. The single Party, UPRONA, with the help of the Army maintained Tutsi supremacy. The Hutus paid dearly for this — 80 of their leaders were murdered in 1965 (23 of whom were MPs who had assured their majority in Parliament), 200,000 were butchered in 1972. Their next door neighbour Rwanda, was subject to internal struggles between Hutu factions, because most of the minority Tutsi population had preferred exile to death.

The two States used the colonialists' false version of their history. In Burundi they insisted on the traditional superiority of the Tutsi. In Rwanda, they emphasised the stages of Hutu emancipation from Tutsi domination.

In Rwanda a vicious form of state racism was maintained with a politics of quotas and identity papers giving 'ethnic' origin. The Rwandan revolution of 1959-61 overthrew a feudal and colonial regime but it failed to destroy the myth of the 'racial difference between Hutu and Tutsi'.

Things are hardly better in Burundi. If there is no mention of 'ethnic' identity on identity papers, it is because power is in the hands of a minority. A Hutu fraction rules over the mass of the population in Rwanda calling it people's power, whilst the Tutsi minority in Burundi call for national unity to mask their domination.

Turning point

The attack that cost the lives of Presidents Habyarimana of Rwanda and Ntaryamira of Burundi came during a chaotic period.

For the first time, Burundi had elected a Hutu President, a consequence of the democratisation in course. But Melchior Ndayaye was murdered five months later in a failed putsch which cost tens of thousands of lives. His replacement, Ntaryamira, also a Hutu, failed to calm things down, and Hutu armed fractions began to confront the Army, mainly Tutsi, on a daily basis. In Rwanda the state was involved in guerilla warfare with the Rwandan Patriotic Front from 1990. The RPF, talked about its anti-dictatorship stand, but had difficulty in getting rid of the Tutsi label it had been saddled with. The majority of the guerillas are exiles who served in the Ugandan Army.

As for the involvement of the French State, its support for the dictator Habyarimana has never been denied. Several hundred soldiers of the Force d'action rapide are permanently stationed in Bangui (Central Africa) and intervened in the Rwandan capital to protect the 400 French there and bolster the Rwandan government at the same time. Habyarimana was a close friend of the Mitterand family.

Now 2,500 French soldiers are intervening there under the cover of 'honour, decency, dignity'. Practically all the French politicians of left and right backed this intervention. Officially, this 'temporary' and 'exceptional' mission is to protect the civilian population who are fleeing from the East to the West of the country away from the war between the Government and the RPF. This intervention has been approved by the Security Council of the UN. Once more France acts as the gendarme of Africa with the consent of the USA and of Russia. To help this come about, they are once again cuddling up with Mobutu, the President of Zaire, with whom they had ceased all civil and military cooperation, and are keeping him sweet with financial contributions. And all this while the dictator Mobutu carries on his own ethnic purification (mass murder) in Katanga against the Balubas, because his principal opponent Etienne Tshisekedi is a Baluba.

Intervene

The French troops are positioned across the border in Zaire ready to intervene in Rwanda. This is in a region where second generation Tutsi refugees live (the same as those who in Uganda formed the RPF) and which is controlled by the radical Zairean opposition, who adopt fiercely anti-French language.

The French hope to kill two birds with one stone, but at the same time risk a many-sided confrontation. Already the Zairean Army have led several attacks on the local Tutsi population. If the French troops move directly into Rwanda, they will create a country of two zones, one controlled by them, and one by the RPF. The French State shows itself ready to prop up dictators in its zone of influence in Africa. Where 'democratisation' has taken place those newly come to power quickly pledge allegiance to France.

New markets

The United States is newly involved in Africa. No longer is this through the funding of anti-Communist forces but as a financial power eager for potential new markets, as is happening in South Africa (see Organise! 33), France must now control Africa in competition or concurrence with other Great Powers, with the risk of certain African leaders selling themselves to the highest bidder (as has happened or been threatened by Mobutu, Bongo, etc).

The cons of humanitarian aid — Somalia yesterday, Rwanda today — and the defence of International Law — Kuwait yesterday, tomorrow? — are alibis to maintain or consolidate the zones of influence of the Great Powers.

Deforestation of Indonesia: A Policy Driven by Greed and War

INDONESIA IS TO send a delegation on a PR visit to the European Parliament in April to shore up concerns about the massive environmental damage being inflicted by the timber trade on tribal people in Indonesia and to head off possible calls for wood import boycotts because of alleged indiscriminate logging.

The delegation — made up of a team of businessmen in the industry — will, in the words of Indonesia's plywood king, Bob Hasan, leader of the delegation and head of the Indonesian Forestry Community: "explain to the European legislators at their session in April how Indonesia is taking good care of its rain forests ... After gaining the right understanding about Indonesia's forest development, European politicians hopefully will stop supporting boycotts of rain forest wood imports from tropical climate countries, including Indonesia."

Environmentalists say the timber industry in Indonesia — home to some of the world's biggest tropical forests — has damaged about 30% of the country's 147 million hectares (363 million acres) of tropical rain forest.

Desperate

Pledging to comply with calls by the International Tropical Timber Organisation to ensure all hardwood timber comes from managed forest by the year 2000, Indonesia, which earned $5.21 billion from the timber industry in 1992, has nonetheless stressed the need to balance conservation with its economic interests. Following the neighbouring Malaysian government's line of blaming the victims for deforestation, instead of those holding timber concessions, Hasan has said global deforestation can be equated with poverty, as poor people desperate for food turn forests into agricultural land (nearly one-sixth of Indonesia's 185 million people live in poverty).

Yet clearly it is the ruling classes in Indonesia — in other words, Suharto's family and cronies, including the leaders of the timber industry — who are responsible, not only for the appalling poverty in the country, but also for the rampant deforestation.

The billions earned from the sale of Indonesian timber (to eager customers such as the UK, which will hypocritically buy while going through the motions of expressing environmental concern) both enrich the already unjustly wealthy and also fund the purchase of arms that are used not only to cow the Indonesian people themselves, but also to perpetuate the 20-year-old imperialist war on the peoples of East Timor.

Solidarity

We express our solidarity with the poor of Indonesia and the criminally oppressed victims of Indonesia's genocidal war in East Timor, and we uncompromisingly condemn the suicidal policy of greed-driven deforestation.

France — Mass Action Against Wage Cuts

THE GOVERNMENT OF Balladur attempted to reduce the minimum national wage for people under 26 by 20%. This was to apply only to people with less than two years' higher education and was designed to increase divisions based on qualifications.

Since the end of the '70s, the crisis does not seem to have greatly affected the capitalists, whose profits boomed. At the same time, the attacks by the bosses and the State multiplied and reactions to them were partial and defensive. The social movements were greatly weakened in this period and the bosses and State showed they were capable of maintaining a social consensus.

But in March a large movement of protest against these new measures from school students, students and the unemployed shook all this. Unlike in 1968, the school students and students did not mobilise against a law that affected their studies, but about the future as wage-earners.

This movement had its contradictions. Some students, united in the student unions IUT and BTS, said they did not want to be paid like 'supermarket cashiers'. On the other hand in further education and technical colleges working class students strongly contributed to giving the mobilisation a radical character (especially in Lyon) even if others, less disadvantaged by their social background, were put forward as spokespeople for the media. Also to be noted were the greater number of students — noticeable in comparison to the movement of 1986 — who saw that university diplomas were no longer necessarily a passport to a more privileged social position. Most present students are future wage earners concerned by the increasing growth of temporary and part-time work or are future unemployed.

The government, speaking through the mouthpiece of the mass media, attempted to split the movement by denouncing the casseurs who turned up to demonstrations as outsiders to a 'responsible' movement. The casseurs (breakers) are alienated working class youth from the inner cities and suburbs who have vented their rage at their miserable existences by breaking shop-windows during the demonstrations. The accusations of the government were well thought out. Faced by a mass spontaneous movement that was out of the control of the student unions and the political parties, the old bugbear of outside agitators was conjured up just like back in May 1968. In actual fact severe police provocation had led to defensive violence which ignited this outbreak of anger. This indicates a very deep despair and anger in French society. But it also indicates the absence of political perspectives going beyond the simple repeal of a law. This is thanks to the lack of a real social movement able to propose an alternative to capitalist logic at the level of ideas and action.

A tie-up with the workplaces did not come about despite a simmering tension in many workplaces. All the same, the potential for this was higher than in May 1968, when a fringe of radicalised students called for such a link-up, but when the student movement and the workers' general strike developed simultaneously but with different dynamics and goals. The Stalinists of the Communist Party (PCF) and the union they controlled — the CGT — were able to sabotage any radicalisation. The latest movement shows that the possibilities for future link-ups are strong. The youth in education mobilised against a law that directly concerned the mass of workers. At the same time, the practices of self-organisation (strike committees, coordinations) were widespread, reflecting the same development over the last few years in the workplaces, where the Stalinist influence has been greatly weakened.

Hijacks

In the '70s the left was able to highjack the social movements and turn them to their own reformist and electoralist ends.

Now, the Socialists have been exposed by their ten years of loyal management of capitalism, and the PCF is discredited by the collapse of the 'socialist' bloc. But the cantonal elections showed they were still capable of channelling discontent because of the lack of a credible social alternative.

Balladur was forced to withdraw the law, and on 31st March 40,000 demonstrated in a victory demonstration. In the aftermath gangsters were accused by the media of manipulating young people in the disturbances at Lyon. There was talk of anarchists and Trotskyists infiltrating the movement on TV and in the press. Certainly at Nantes, where 20,000 mobilised, the libertarian movement was well implanted, not as outsiders but as activists. They were able to spread their ideas widely and make a strong presence. Here, the streets were occupied four times in a week, despite police attacks and many arrests. Indeed, there and at Lyon the situation was semi-insurrectional.

The French libertarian movement has been enthused by the new movement. There seems to be a great determination to break out of the ghetto and spread revolutionary ideas amongst the mass of the population.

As two Nantes comrades noted: "That the anarchist communists that we are, can act and make politics, on bases other than manoeuvres of committees and declarations of principles... that this way of acting and of thinking in concert with the greatest number of people possible allows the opening of the political debate, the sense of collective action, and that far from isolating us, radical, coherent positions, revolutionary positions, can have a widespread response, allow a globalisation of separated struggles, reinforce the social movements and allow the emergence of an anti-capitalist and libertarian political current."

CARMAGEDDON

In part two of our series on traffic (see Organise! 34 for part 1), we look at the social and health effects of traffic. In the next issue we conclude by looking at false solutions and opposition to the traffic system.

CAPITALISM WANTS MOTOR traffic for profit for the road lobby and for the rapid movement of goods and people (as either workers or consumers). 'Mobility madness' also derives from the need of the business people to commute within and between the zones of power in each city to make business decisions. Cars also promise individuals freedom of movement and are important status and identity symbols.

Freedom

Cars promise individuals the freedom to go where they want, when they want. This is particularly attractive to young people eager to escape the straitjacket of the family. This is a bourgeois freedom however, achieved (if at all) at the expense of others as part of the "war of all against all". Other drivers are obstacles and restrictions to the individual's inalienable right of movement. In practice of course, the net result is more congestion and delays for motorists, increased pedestrian danger and fear (particularly for vulnerable groups such as women and children), and further noise and air pollution. This 'freedom' is also empty because the effect of the accompanying tarmac, concrete and pollution is to "make everywhere like everywhere else". Additionally, as Aufheben point out, the individual's inalienable right of freedom of (motor) movement is enforced and guaranteed by the State (through traffic laws and road construction). The car has everything to say about (for) its owner in terms of identity and status while simultaneously stopping direct communication between people.

Motorisation

Cities and towns of the past were built to the scale of the walking person, and pedestrians, vehicle users, horse, cart, carriage cycle, bus, car, lorry had the same physical access to buildings. This equality has disappeared with the increasing speed (and volume) of motor traffic. Along main arterial roads barriers are put up to speed traffic flow and prevent pedestrians from crossing and motorists from parking; car users and bus passengers can no longer use local shops. The next stage is that a hypermarket opens elsewhere killing off small shops and forcing pedestrians and bus users to shop there or go to the more expensive shop on their estate (with the monopoly of local trade). Arterial roads have two functions — to take people in and out of cities, and to be the lifeblood of all the towns along their route, providing shops, schools, pubs etc. This latter function is lost as the barriers turn arteries into freeways and towns along the route become blighted and die. Cities become compartmentalised, area by area. At the core a hostile city centre defended by an urban motorway, its inhabitants gone. It is surrounded by a series of of enclosed camps hemmed in by arteries which have become freeways. People can only enter or leave the city at controlled exit points to go to work. The whole is physically connected but without clear communication points and with no social contact. Further out a series of scattered isolated encampments cluster the ring road. Workers commute to the city centre from the outer suburb, and others travel out to ring road factories. Cities devoid of life with traffic endlessly circulating around ring roads. The poor from different areas never meet, leading totally separate existences. Thousands of people live in their own niche within areas, many isolated and atomised in their own homes.

YOU CAN SHOVE IT!

081 530 5709 - 530 8369

Health

Exhaust fumes (carbon dioxide, sulphur dioxide, nitrogen dioxide, carbon monoxide, hydrocarbons) are a major contributor to global warming and acid rain, and cause much ill health and environmental damage. The average car pollutes more than two billion cubic meters of air in its life. In Britain emissions from car exhausts have increased 73% since 1981; a 1993 government study found 19 million people in Britain were exposed to pollution exceeding EC guidelines.

In 1965 there were eight million cars in Britain; by 1995 there will be 18 million; by 2025 36 million are predicted. Children and the elderly are particularly at risk from exhaust pollution, which causes asthma and bronchitis. Greenpeace International calculates 7.5 million elderly people are at risk and nine million children. Asthma is one of the few treatable chronic diseases which is advancing in Western countries. Children are more vulnerable because they exercise more and so breathe in more air (youngsters under three breathe in twice as much air as adults for their body rate). Asthma now effects more than one in seven children in Britain; the number of young children admitted to hospital with it has increased 13 times since 1960. It is the greatest single cause of hospital admissions after heart disease and strokes.

Space

Speed consumes distance: forms of transport occupy space, and the faster they are, the more space they need. A car travelling 40 kilometres an hour (kph) requires more than three times as much space as one travelling at 10 kph; a single person driving a car at 10 kph needs six times as much space as a cyclist travelling at the same speed. Germany's cars (including driving and parking) commandeer 3700 square kilometres of space, 60% more than that occupied by housing. Each German car is responsible for 200 square kilometres of tarmac and concrete.

The radius of activity of the well off has expanded immeasurably over the last 30 years; that of the poor has changed very little. The emphasis on speed and 'time saving' leads to transport and planning policies where basic facilities such as shops, schools, leisure and work are spaced widely apart. Most people feel that they have less time despite faster means of transport. Those without cars (35% of the population in the UK) and those who do not have access to them during the day, must spend time searching for other facilities, waiting for buses, trains or friends who can give them lifts, or walking. The working class, women, children and people with disabilities are particularly affected. For women travelling alone after dark there are the potential dangers of waiting at bus stops, for late trains (more dangerous after years of cuts due to lack of guards and conductors), or using underpasses which prioritise the motorist at the expense of the pedestrian. Women are also more likely to have the main responsibility for children in hostile urban environments (including escorting duties necessitated by the danger from traffic). In Britain women spend thousands of hours escorting children, at a cost of £10 billion a year (using Department of Transport cost benefit criteria).

Community

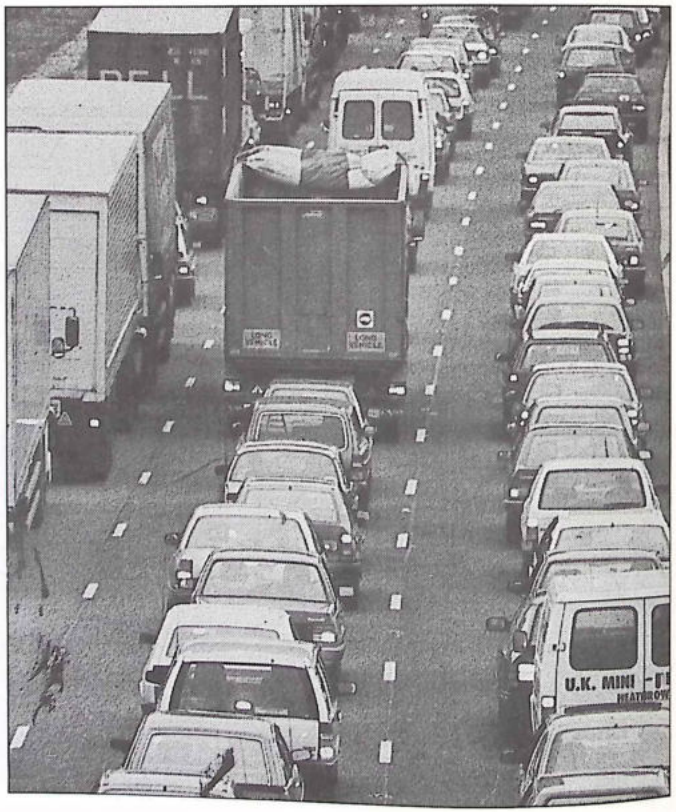
Ordinary but diverse contact is important to people's well being. Traffic affects the number of friends and aquaintances that people have — the more the traffic, the less the contacts. Streets with lighter traffic (around 2000 vehicles a year) have close knit communities where residents make full use of the street — sitting and chatting on front steps, children using pavements for play and teenagers and adults hanging out and chatting on the street.

With medium traffic flow (about 8000 vehicles a year) there is a decline in street use, though friendliness and involvement remain. With heavy traffic flow (over 16,000 vehicles a year) the street is used solely as a corridor between the sanctuary of individual homes and the outside world. There is no feeling of community and residents keep to themselves, ie isolation and alienation. In this process the street is the first to go.

Motorists view pedestrians, cyclists and children playing in the street as intruding on their space. As the volume (and speed) of traffic increases, their attitude becomes more ruthless. People's use of the pavement is the next to go, due to the noise, air pollution and vibration caused. The street loses its attraction to people — children abandon their play space (and adults keep them inside), and adults drive rather than walk.

With heavy traffic residents abandon their front gardens and front rooms in a retreat from vibration and noise. Finally people become 'traffic refugees' and abandon their homes, moving to quieter areas. Poorer people are left behind, trapped and condemned to blight.

The refugees are replaced by more poor people — those who can't afford to buy or rent elsewhere. The street is now deserted and alienation leads to greater anti-social crime. As thefts and assaults increase, people take refuge in cars, putting another twist on the downward spiral.

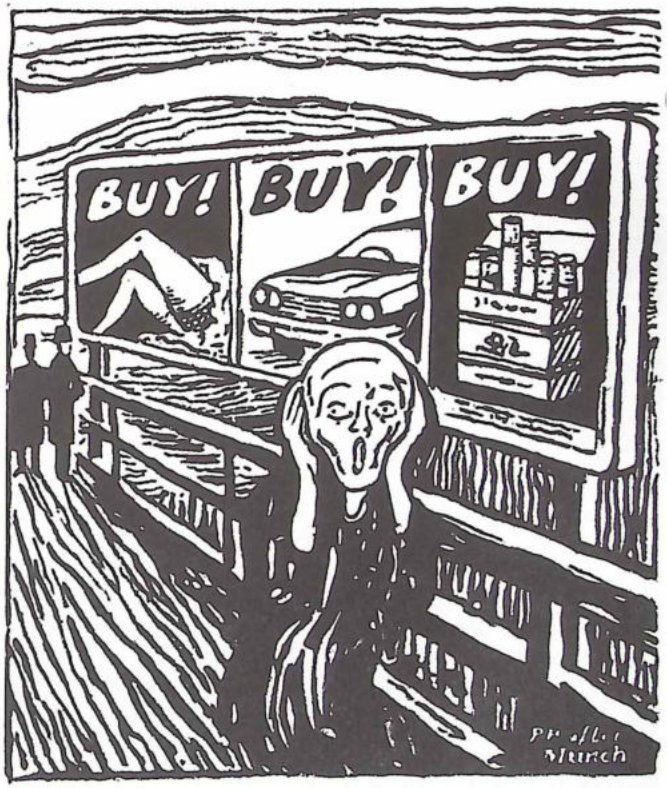


Advertising: The Poetry of Capitalism

CAPITALISM IS A system that seems impossible to crack. Its strength is in the inability of its only opponents (the working-class) to wake up from their induced lethargy. A subtle interplay of media manipulation keeps us passive, inanimate and impotent. For the purpose of this article I want to focus on one aspect of this intellectual lobotomy: advertising.

Personally I find mainstream advertising to be the antithesis of everything creative and artistic in society. For capitalism to sell unnecessary produce it needs to create artificial appetites. It has to stimulate craving for the 'good life' (please note that by 'unnecessary produce' I mean such indispensable necessities as blenders, remote control folding beds and 15-minute car polish and other such items we couldn't live without).

So as a result we have the creation of the modern advertising industry. Around the time of the beginning of mass production advertising skyrocketed into a global billion-dollar industry. With the development of new technology (TV, compact disc, satellite communications etc) advertising found ever more accommodating outlets for its main targets: you and I.



Manipulation

By now I'm sure that one question is on your mind: "What's so bad about advertising?" There are several answers to this. Firstly, advertising is manipulation. TV and newspaper ads entice us with concocted images of sumptuous food, dashing new technology and whiter than white clothes that makes average punters blow their hard earned wages on items that are usually useless, frivolous and, more often than not, have built-in obsolescence just to maximise the amount of profit that can be extracted from the hapless worker. Children are manipulated towards torturing their parents into buying them THAT toy "just like on the telly".

We are mentally bullied, extorted and fettered by advertising. To the demoralised and wary worker advertising creates a little piece of paradise that could be his or hers. The blatant cerebral exploitation of advertising is something that we as libertarians should resist.

That brings me on to another crippling factor of advertising. Despite government claims advertising is still quasi-subliminal, you will often hear people humming a snatch of a jingle or coming out with a well-known slogan. Some slogans have now become sayings in the English language! These images, slogans and general white noise are deliberately ingratiating, so that we are always thinking about product X.

It is ironic to see that an artificially-created industry, born to serve capitalism's needs, has now become an industry in its own right. Advertising agencies now sell ads for revenue to their prospective clients.

Production

The production of ads is another area for concern. TV commercials cost tens of thousands of pounds individually. On an annual scale the amount of money used in research, production, distribution and release is nearly into the £1 billion mark. The waste of such money is criminal. The amount of resources involved in such ads also defies sanity. A good example of this waste would be junk mail. Millions of tons of paper are wasted annually on this idiotic exercise in futility.

"Sex sells" is a familiar saying. In some "less professional" areas of advertising sexism is rampant. Ads for various brands of pornography are mentally and physically degrading to women. Throughout the industry as a whole, women come off worst in terms of employment. It is estimated that out of the (surprisingly small number of) people who work in advertising (approx. 15,000), half are women. However, this is a very bottom-heavy pyramid. Women mostly perform the roles of receptionist, accounts clerk, tea-lady and secretary. Advancement is notoriously difficult to attain. In fact advancement is impossible to attain if you don't possess a cut throat disposition. In the throes of executive power struggles people are often disregarded and thrown upon the economic scrap heap.

"One day, son, all this will be junk mail"

Ad people have the highest rates of stress-related illnesses among the 'professional' classes. The 'competition' demanded by capitalism even treats its lackeys with inhuman disrespect. Advertising is said to be a people business. So is cannibalism.

Advertising is a method of covering up one-company domination of the relevant market. If a product is owned by one company and is then advertised under another brand name or trade mark, then no one gets alarmed at the economic expansionism of one group of capitalist profiteers.

We in the ACF are libertarian communists. We oppose the use of mental coercion on any section of the population. In an anarchist-communist society we will not live by Puritan standards of comfort, but we will not allow anyone to manipulate people into giving up their basic necessities in favour of false luxuries. However, in the present-day, ordinary working class people, dejected and exploited, find no comfort in simple necessities. They want their flash car, they want their rich food and they mean to get them even if they deny themselves the essential items that they need to survive. Why? Because the all-embracing advertising industry has told them that this is what they need. The new car will make them attractive, the new outfit suit will make their mates jealous and the new lager will make them look 'yuppie'. It doesn't matter if the car does only 25 miles per gallon, or if the clothes wear out after six months. It even doesn't even matter that the trendy beer costs £2.50 a bottle. The ad man has buried himself in the worker's subconscious. No one is immune to this manipulative device. Even the politically 'aware' are just as vulnerable to this brainwashing.

As libertarians we should do everything to change this materialistic society. One step on that road is to reveal the ad man's promises for what they really are: fool's gold.

Poetry and Revolution

THE AUTHORITARIAN MENTALITY has always been suspicious of poetry. Plato saw poets as subversive and wanted to ban them from his Republic, while the Nazis murdered the anarchist poet Eric Mühsam because they were frightened of his words.

Poetry's subversive edge is usually left out of the school curriculum, or forgotten when anthologies are compiled, although some of the earliest British poetry is noticeable for its demands for social justice, and for its praise for resistance to tyranny.

Chaucer's contemporary, Langland, wrote 'A Vision of Piers Plowman', which in spite of its religiosity vibrates with indignation at the corruption of the rich and powerful and their oppression of the peasantry. Langland's vision was written at about the time of the Peasants' Revolt, much like Chaucer's Canterbury Tales and Romance of the Rose, but Chaucer lacks any concern for the poor and dispossessed — probably why he is taught on the 'A' level syllabus and Langland is not.

Langland's religious background results in the absence of any idea of resistance to injustice, but resistance is notable in the early ballads of Robin Hood which celebrate the outlaws resistance to the Norman Yoke.

Expression

Because poetry can compress and express meaning in a way that ordinary prose cannot, it has frequently been chosen as the vehicle for spreading radical ideas and attacking the rich and powerful. The Romantic poets were inspired by the early ideals of the French Revolution and influenced by the writings of William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecroft, two precursors of modern Anarchism. Byron's long satirical poems 'Vision of Judgement' and 'Don Juan' attacked the degenerate monarchy, while some of his short poems celebrated the resistance of the Luddites.

Byron's friend, Shelley, was the poet most closely associated with Godwin's proto-anarchism, and as Paul Foot has demonstrated in Red Shelley nearly all his poems can be seen as a direct and sustained attack on political tyranny and economic exploitation. Shelley was expelled from Oxford University for writing a pamphlet on The Necessity of Atheism. Shelley's early poetry includes 'Queen Mab', a long work criticising both Christianity and political tyranny, and 'Ozymandias', a sonnet which provides an ironic commentary on the vanity and futility of a tyrant's power. The political implications of 'Ozymandias' could not be avoided as the sonnet was first published in Leigh Hunt's Examiner only two years after Hunt had completed a three year prison sentence for criticising the future King George IV.

Two years later (in 1819) armed soldiers attacked a peaceful demonstration in St Peter's Field, Manchester, killing 11 people and wounding over 400. Shelley, inspired by outrage wrote the 'Mask of Anarchy'. So powerful was Shelley's poem that no-one would publish it until 1832, many years after Shelley's death. Nearly all of Shelley's work is imbued with hope, and he openly celebrates resistance, calling on people to "rise like lions".

The attraction that French anarchism held for artists after the Paris Commune (1871) was matched by a similar feeling among writers, particularly avant-garde poets. When police seized the subscription lists of the anarchist paper La Revolte in 1894, they found poets like Mallarmé, Quillard and Richepin included in the records. Nearly all the symbolist poets sympathised with anarchism, writing poems on anarchist themes, contributing financial support or writing articles and pamphlets supporting anarchism. Mallarmé even took his support to the extent of appearing as a character witness for the anarchist Félix Feneon, who was charged with possession of explosives during the so called 'Trial of the Thirty'. Verlaine wrote short poems about Louise Michel, the anarchist organiser, who had been imprisoned for her role in the Paris Commune and again for organising the poor. The American poet living in France, Stuart Merrill, claimed that "the symbolist is the anarchist in literature", and Viele-Griffin wrote of "the literary anarchy for which we have battled".

For late 19th century French poets, to call themselves anarchist meant to insist on maintaining their individuality as creators, to reject out-dated rules and to affirm the artist as the only judge of his or her own work. This can be seen clearly in the work of Gustav Kahn, who pioneered free verse and made the urban streets the subject of his poetry in Aesthetique de la Rue. His political anarchism was an extension of his literary radicalism.

One of the most uncompromising anarchist poets was Gabriel Randon, also known as Jehan Rictus (rictus is a death-like grimace), whose whole life was one of poverty and suffering. As a 16-year-old runaway he spent six years of his life as a clochard (tramp) sleeping in the streets and in doorways until he collapsed and was hospitalised. This self-identification with the beggars and rogues of the middle ages, his personal experience of hardship and his extensive knowledge of Parisian argot (slang) inspired him to create a new 'poetry of the people' and he created a series of song-poems called 'Soliliquies of the Poor'.

To each in his turn the pavements
I walk in silence and in a desert
For 'r'th day the finest streets
The fullest of din and crowds
At mi'nigh' are only great hallways
Corridors open to the sky.

I'm th' Emp'ror of the pavement
I'm th' roamer . . . the mash chewer
Th' stink at nights . . . th' along the gutters
The out-of-sorts, the long-mug
Th' anguish chewer — the talk to himself . . .

There was no romanticisation of the poor in Rictus' poetry. They are cold, tired and hungry. They rebel, but they remain without hope.

Rictus wrote articles in the Revue Anarchiste and read his poems out at anarchist gatherings. He refused to compromise or tone down his attack on capitalism and died in poverty.

Resurgence

Britain, like France saw a socialist resurgence at the end of the 19th century, but although it was a socialism strongly flavoured with anarchism, few British poets became anarchists. One minor poet who did was Louisa Sarah Bevington, who had written several slim volumes of poetry before becoming interested in anarchist ideas. She saw no distinction between being a poet and being a revolutionary. In the last few years of her life she wrote widely for the anarchist press, in Freedom, Commonweal, and for Tochatti's paper Liberty, to which she also contributed poems. Working with the London Anarchist Communist Alliance she wrote several pamphlets, which still retain a relevance to our own time.

A second minor poet associated with the late Victorian anarchist movement was the Scot John Barlas, who wrote for the Socialist League paper Commonweal. Barlas took part in the 'Bloody Sunday' demonstration in Trafalgar Square in 1887, where he was badly injured by blows from a policeman's truncheon. Bar-las is usually remembered for firing a pistol shot at the Houses of Parliament as a gesture of contempt. A gesture for which he was arrested and imprisoned. Oscar Wilde stood bail for Barlas, partly because of a shared interest in anarchism. As a result of his truncheon injuries Barlas suffered from repeated bouts of depression and eventually died in a Glasgow asylum. During his lifetime he wrote several volumes of poetry, some of which are regularly reprinted.

Oscar Wilde is always mocked as a dilettante and jester, but this is the literary establishment's method of defusing Wilde's work. His plays represent a scathing indictment of the morals and concerns of the ruling classes, disguised as comedy, but much of his work is more overtly political. The plays are an attack from within the ruling class, his later writings are from a position of exclusion. De Profundis was Wilde's justification of his homosexuality, but it is couched in strongly political tones. The Soul of Man Under Socialism is an incisive argument for libertarian socialism, but it is the 'Ballad of Reading Gaol' which is his most inspirational work. A poem based on his experience while in prison, it is a powerful attack on the notion of punishment.

The anarchist-communist Eric Mühsam placed culture at the centre of his political activism, fiercely defending freedom of the individual from encroachment by right and left. His socialism was anti-statist and he was a tireless campaigner for sexual emancipation and for prison abolition.

Mühsam's main weapon was his razor sharp verse and he became one of Weimar Germany's most acute social critics. His satire provided a focus for his political commitment. His 'Der Revoluzzer', written in 1907, became one of the most performed chansons of the Weimar period.

During World War One Mühsam was a revolutionary pacifist who refused even to carry out 'alternative labour service' and was consequently imprisoned for his anti-war stand. On his release at the end of the war he took part in the Munich soviet, which was brutally suppressed by the German State. Mühsam's anarchist colleague Gustav Landauer was murdered and Mühsam was sentenced to 15 years imprisonment.

While in prison Mühsam wrote a play Judas, accounts of his revolutionary experience in Munich and many songs and poems, one of which became extremely popular. Called 'The Death of a Red Guard Soldier' it is based on Mühsam's witnessing the death of a young fellow revolutionary during the Munich soviet. It ends with these words spoken by the dying revolutionary:

"Even if you kill me
My belief continues to thrive
I myself may die, but the revolution remains alive."

One of the last prisoners to be amnestied in 1924, Mühsam returned to radical activity, editing a paper called FANAL (Beacon) and now less bohemian and more political in his approach. Well known to the Nazis because of his many political and cabaret appearances, his new translation of 'The International' and his writings which included a popular play For Reasons Of State, based on the Sacco and Vanzetti trial, Mühsam became one of their first victims.

On the night of the Reichstag fire, Mühsam was arrested by the SS just four hours before a planned escape to Prague — a flight he had been forced to postpone because of lack of money. He was imprisoned in a whole series of concentration camps and was savagely beaten in all of them. He was cruelly murdered by his captors on July 10th 1933.

Many of the French surrealist poets, including Benjamin Peret and André Breton were involved with the anarchist movement in the 1950s, contributing a series of billets surrealistes to the anarchist paper Le Libertaire. Their contemporary, Jacques Prevert successfully encapsulated anarchist ideas in his haunting poems. Prevert was a script writer by profession, writing a whole series of screen-plays for the films of Marcel Carne, among them Les Enfants du Paradis and Les Portes de la Nuit, as well as the sadly neglected full-length cartoon film The King and Mr Bird.

Prevert's poetry is sometimes tender, wistful and evocative of gentle melancholy, but it can also be mockingly satirical. In the poems of Paroles (1941) and Spectacle (1951), he ridicules the conformity and convention of society, attacking the social damage caused by capitalism, while praising the simple joys of love, and the colours, sounds and smells of the streets.

Relevant, effective poetry wasn't just written in the past — it still has a relevance and effectiveness at the late end of the 20th century. English poet Adrian Mitchell helped to provide a focus to opposition to the war in Vietnam with his poems. Utilising the rhythms of rock and roll in 'Zapping the Cong' and the direct lyrics of 'To Whom it May Concern': "I was run over by the truth one day . . .", Mitchell worked tirelessly to give a voice to the anti-war movement.

A decade later Mitchell was pointing at the insanity of nuclear war in 'On the beach at Cambridge'. His poems find targets in the alienation of everyday life, attacking the cruelty of the school playground in 'Back in the Playground Blues', where he likens the cruelty experienced by children to the beetle which gets its legs torn off, but "a beetle can't beg for mercy, a beetle's not half the fun".

The desire for rebellion expressed in 'Fuck off Friday', is linked to his activities supporting the miners during the miners' strike and to his opposition to the bombing of Iraq in the Gulf war.

A second poet who has been able to give voice to the fears and desires of our time is Heathcote Williams. Actor, playwright and sometime editor of the seminal underground paper IT (International Times), Heathcote has written several book length poems about the destruction of the environment by cars, the destruction of the elephant species, and the destruction of Whales. 'Whale Nation', the first and best known of these poems was originally published in IT. The response it triggered, particularly among young people, provides convincing evidence that anarchist ideas are in harmony with popular sentiment and that, (to paraphrase AWE O'Shaunnessy), poets remain the movers and shakers of the world.

The Relationship Between Anarchism and Pop Culture

AT THE LAST ACF conference we decided to have a permanent section of Organise! dedicated to culture. As we feel this area is open to debate, we welcome all contributions. Organise! editors.

IN RESPONSE TO a letter in Organise! 32, this is a positive step to highlight the importance of pop culture to the anarchist movement, particularly within the punk scene.

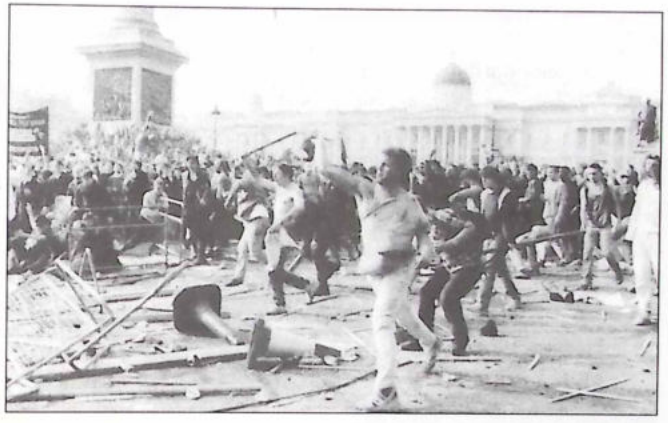
Punk Politics

There is a great deal of scepticism about the significance of punk to real political change, but the massively inspirational work of the Mekons, The Pop Group and especially Crass cannot be overlooked.

Crass were communards and anarchists who had belonged to the underground scene since the late sixties and early seventies and in 1974 were at the forefront of the first Stonehenge Festival. Consisting of five men and three women, not counting 'associate member', poet Annie Anxiety, Crass were initially inspired by the clarion call of the Sex Pistol's Anarchy in the UK and the sloganeering leftist rhetoric of The Clash.

Musically, they had more in common with Irish republican band Stiff Little Fingers. But their political stance, tackling such thorny issues as feminism ('Women'), nuclear disarmament ('They've Got A Bomb'), class divisions ('Time Out'), the hypocritical facade of hippies and yippies ('General Bacardi') and, most infamously, the Falklands War ('The Immortal Death', 'How Does It Feel To Be The Mother Of A Thousand Dead?' 'Sheepfarming In The Falklands') showed an ingenuity which went well beyond the contrived posturing of the 1977 comrades.

As punk turned to the record company safety of 'new wave' (a more marketable, apolitical version), Crass instigated what they termed 'real punk', with benefits for anarchist and class struggle prisoners, heavy involvement with CND, squats and their own Anarchy Centres. By the end of the decade, comrades like Poison Girls, Conflict and Zounds had arrived and a 24-hour 'anarcho-punk' festival was held at the famed Zig Zag squat in London.



Universal

Eventually, anarchism and animal rights would be universally commonplace to the punk movement. The USA, Czechoslovakia, Germany and many other countries all had vibrant punk scenes. Indeed, punk was seen as an important revolutionary stance by the youth of Prague and Berlin who were not fooled by the new capitalist strategies any more than they had been by 'communism'.

Berlin in particular saw a large community of anarcho-punk (and socialist skinhead) youths living out their anarchist principles within a squatted 'no-man's-land' in 1991, fighting the police on the streets to maintain their autonomous community. Crass may have split in the symbolic year of 1984, as they often said they would, but their influential anarchist ideals were firmly entrenched in the minds of virtually everyone active in the scene. Punk had provided a soundtrack to Thatcherism and all that went with it: the 1981 summer riots, the Falklands, the Miners' Strike and the Trafalgar Square Poll Tax rebellion. As the music itself grew more diverse, with forays into ska, reggae, dub, folk and performance art, so the ideals and aims grew gradually more sophisticated.

Chumbawamba, a commune-based, working class situationist group, gave the scene its new mentors, as their extraordinary albums, usually revolving around a single theme being looked at from different revolutionary perspectives, gained critical respect, something Crass never 'achieved'.

The Chumbas excel at producing music in diverse styles, from acapella folk to dance, via polka, thrash and ballads. Lyrically, they display imagination and knowledge regarding aid, communism, the futility of the vote, a future anarchist society, fascism, sexism and animal exploitation.

Relevant

By the arrival of the nineties, the word punk could now be applied to a massive range of bands and individuals and had an obvious relevance to the rise of New Age travellers and Riot Grrrls. The grrrl scene regularly name-checks anarchism and situationism and has committed itself (in Britain at least) to a positive, open-minded point of view, which is largely oppositional to what is seen as the domain of middle-class, separatist bores of mainstream and left-wing feminism.

Within Riot Grrrl there is an incredible network of young people (obviously largely female) communicating, interacting, sharing thoughts on politics, sexuality and lifestyle and pursuing an alternative to mainstream society.

Some now call themselves 'anarchofems' as well as Riot Grrrls, and that surely is an important sign of a serious political edge with their American grrrl friends also moving towards autonomy and generally a fuller understanding that their struggle is the same as that being fought by the pro-choice campaigners, the environmental groups, the anti-racist organisers and, in a lot of cases, the anarchist movement also.

Solidarity

Many are disappointed with the small-minded pettiness, sectarianism and numerous half-hearted phonies masquerading within the anarchist movement and will thus remain Riot Grrrls first with anarchist sympathies included in their 'grrrl positive/grrrl bonding' hypothesis. It could teach the rest of the movement some valuable lessons in sincerity and solidarity. And it teaches the world of music and popular culture a lot about artistic integrity and staunch no sellout attitudes. Within all this, there certainly is some revolutionary potential.

The Friends of Durruti

New pamphlet!

London ACF have produced a pamphlet on the Friends of Durruti, a much misunderstood group that attempted to defend and extend the Spanish Revolution of 1936. In their criticisms of the leadership of the anarcho-syndicalist unions they represented an important moment in anarchist history. Included are an historical introduction written by an ACF member, and two political statements from the Friends themselves. This will be the first in a series of pamphlets in the Stormy Petrel series. Coming up will be a pamphlet on the Italian Factory Councils of 1920-21.

Copies of the Friends of Durruti pamphlet available from ACF (London), c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1 at 75p including postage.

Dear Organise!,

Having attended a debate on the usefulness of Unions as a revolutionary vehicle (featuring the much vaunted Dave Douglass and some faceless socialist clone) and also following the debate (although that might be too mild a word!) between you and D.D. I thought you might like to peruse this item that comes from the local free paper. Typically the workers are yet again stabbed in the back by the union bosses. If the deal had gone ahead we could have had an end to profiteering bosses of both the management and Union type. A coal mine run by the workers would not need a Union to negotiate being fucked for the fat cat's profits, this is precisely why that bastard Scargill won't accede to the demands of the lowly workforce.

In discussion with my fellow miners I keep hearing surprised disbelief at the events that have occurred, but in my mind I'm not really surprised that this bureaucratic fat cat would rather fuck us all off so that he can keep his poxy job selling us gullible sods down the line.

I urge any of your readers who work in industry to seriously consider extra-union activity at the time of strife with the boss class. It's the only way to beat 'em, to make 'em fear us and eventually to destroy them. I've wasted too much time by having faith in the NUM and by not having the faith in the ability of us exploited to organise ourselves!

Yours in solidarity,
CM, Maltby, South Yorkshire

Editors' reply: Thanks for your letter. We are glad that you share our ideas about the unions and we wholeheartedly agree with you about Scargill. Obviously running your own mine is better than being on the dole, but there are many pitfalls. Many cooperatively run workplaces because they have to exist within capitalism end up working harder and exploiting themselves for less wages because they have to compete against the better organised capitalists. Look what happened when the Triumph motorcycle works was bought up by the workers when it failed. They had to work longer hours and take home less to keep their heads above water, and finally they went under. Unfortunately, the only long term solution is overthrowing this rotten system and doing away with the wages system.

PIT BUY-OUT SCUPPERED BY SCARGILL

He won't release cash

by Sharon Hodkin

MINERS' leader Arthur Scargill has 'killed' an attempted workers buy-out of Maltby Colliery.

South Yorkshire miners had intended to bid for the Northern Group of pits which included Maltby, Selby and Kellingley superpits.

The ambitious plans had been backed by trade union controlled Unity Bank Trust, operated by the Co-operative bank.

Refused

But when NUM president Scargill heard of the proposals he refused to give his support.

He believed the plans were against national policy and refused to use union funds to privatise the pits.

This week a Maltby NUM spokesman said: "He should have listened to what we were doing and let the men decide."

Under British Coal privatisation plans announced last month, prospective purchasers have until 25th May to register an interest.

But Scargill's refusal to back Maltby miners has wrecked the buy-out bid.

"The issue is now dead. They have put our interest to sleep because without assistance from the banks we haven't got the £15,000 needed to register an interest," added the official.

It is the third time an attempted buy-out of Maltby Colliery has failed.

Music Reviews

Rage Against the Machine.* Cassette/CD/LP. Approx 55 mins. 10 tracks. £9.99. Epic.

This band makes the Levellers look like Simon and Garfunkel. Ten stunning and really powerful tracks flowing superbly one after the other — as they say on 'Take the Power Back': "The Rage is relentless we need a movement with a quickness". They are the best radical band of the '90s and a band for the '90s already making a major impact amongst the youth of today, sowing the seeds for the future. As they say again on 'Wake Up': "How long, not long, 'cos what you reap is what you sow". From 'Bombtrack' at the beginning the lyrics and the beat are beautiful: "Don't interfere with the thoughts of a militant mind" and "Landlords and power whores on my people, they took turns, dispute the suits, I ignite and watch 'em burn". Then 'Killing in the Name': "Now you do what they told you" with the response "Fuck you I won't do what you tell me". And many references to brain-dead fascists: "You justify those who died wearing your badge and your clothes in white", referring to the Ku Klux Klan.

'Take the Power Back' criticises the education system: "So-called facts are fraud... See right through the red white and blue disguise, with lecture I puncture the structure of lies installed in our minds and attempting to hold us back". They attack apathy: "But death is on my side, suicide . . . if we don't take action now we'll settle for nothing later" in 'Settle for Nothing' followed up in 'Bullet in the Head' with its attacks on brain-dead people: "Believe all the lies that they're telling ya, buy all the products that they're selling ya". Nationalism is lashed with the lyrics: "You stand in line, believe the lies you bow down to the flag, ya gotta bullet in ya head". Get this record, it's really something.

Senser, Stacked Up. LP/CD/Cass. Approx 63 mins. 13 Tracks. (£5.95, although probably more if you buy from Over Price etc).

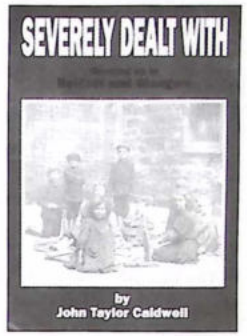
At over 60 minutes this album has got to be value for money in anyone's books. Although I'm not a follower of the singles market I'm pretty certain that this is a reissue of their previous releases, but to those of you who have yet to sample the Senser sound (where have you been?) this is the perfect introduction. From the opening track 'States of Mind', with its bruising defiance of the increasingly oppressive state, through tracks such as 'The Switch', 'What's going on?' and the deliciously tense 'Stubborn', this album continues to invigorate the listener with its unique fusion of metal/dance/ambient/rap. Lyrical content deals mainly with individualism but also tackles such topics as drugs (pros and cons), and the BNP. Side four is a bit of a disappointment in comparison with the first three, but what it lacks in production quality and power it more than makes up for in energy. Overall a stunning album and although I probably won't be able to call it my favourite LP of the year, I think it will remain one of my top three for many months to come.

Book Reviews

Childhood Severities

Severely Dealt With is the first volume of the autobiography of John Taylor Caldwell, the anarchist communist militant whose biography of Guy Aldred, Come Dungeons Dark (1988), Organise! readers may be familiar with. This volume covers his childhood and early youth spent in Belfast and Glasgow between 1913 and 1927. The book is an outstanding piece of working class autobiographical/historical writing and, considering the length of time between the events and the actual writing of the book, all the more considerable in its incredible clarity of description. Written in an engaging and often witty style Severely Dealt With is immensely readable and difficult to put down (I read it in two sittings!). It's a welcome contribution to the body of authentic working class history that should appeal to politico and autobiography (not to mention political autobiography!) readers equally.

The second volume, covering JT Caldwell's subsequent political development and his many years of struggle in the anarchist communist cause, is eagerly awaited and will be reviewed, in depth, in the pages of Organise! In the meantime we recommend our readers to get hold of a copy and to make sure it gets stocked in their local library. Copies of Severely Dealt With: Growing up in Belfast and Glasgow by John Taylor Caldwell (Northern Herald Books) £5.95, can be ordered from Northern Herald, 6 Lilian St, Bradford, W Yorkshire BD4 9LP.



25 years of British Justice

Trials by Ordeal.* Irish Prisoners' Support Group

This book is a publication by the Irish Prisoners' Support Group who are based in London.

Their book is an investigation into the British judicial system's wrongful conviction of Irish men and women over the last 25 years.

The book details the torture meted out to them in prison by the authorities and the measures taken by the government to keep them there. The book is excellently written. Each case is analysed with precision detail. The chapters are arranged in such a way as to give a step-by-step account of arrest, falsification of evidence, torture, trial and conviction.

The book exposes a wide web of corruption and influence. The media's role is exposed via quoting old headlines such as 'Aunt Annie's Bomb Kitchen'. The Annie in question is, of course, Anne Maguire. Parliament is also known to be a major factor in the injustice of the criminal system. The repressive Prevention of Terrorism Act is examined in detail and Parliament's role in the use of the 1883 Explosive Substances Act is also revealed. This Act was used to charge the Maguire Seven and Dessie Ellis.

Various subterfuges by innumerable prosecution workers are described. One example is the comic use of books, found in Noel Jenkinson's abode, as substantiating evidence. The books in question were by James Connolly, Che Guevara and Mao Tse Tung so obviously Jenkinson was a terrorist. (He got a life sentence.)

The police's treatment of suspects is graphic and accurate in the extreme. Tortures include: sleep deprivation, noise bombardment, and immobilisation. The book states that "Almost 800 civil cases were brought against the British authorities".

A whole chapter is devoted to the routine falsification of evidence and the infamous forensic evidence tests for nitroglycerine. One scientist called Douglas Higgs later admitted to the May inquiry that he had been "economical with the truth".

The book never leaves itself open to prosecution as its claims are seemingly well researched. A major endearing factor in the book is that it deals with non-Republican prisoners as well as 'POWs'. However there are some criticisms.

Firstly the book is preaching to the converted. These cases are already well-documented. Practically everyone realises that British justice is in tatters (Irish people have always known how British justice 'works'). The British public also realises that the courts will go to any lengths to achieve a conviction. The problem is that they don't really care. Most would also be turned off by the legal jargon. Secondly the book's support for 'Irish' prisoners sometimes develops into full blown Republican propaganda. Many of the sources named in each chapter's reference list are taken directly from An Poblacht. And we all know that Sinn Fein would never tell lies . . . or would they?

The book's credibility as a vanguard for all Irish people wrongly convicted is tarnished by the inclusion of an appendix written by two Republican prisoners: Ronnie McCartney and Joe O'Connell. These two get a free forum for their witless Republican politics: "The Irish Embassy should be fully involved, ensuring that the rights of all suspects should be safeguarded". Perhaps they don't realise that the Republic is just as ruthless with IRA volunteers as Britain.

As anarchist communists we should have no sympathy for these paramilitaries who live off the backs of the Catholic working class. Apparently the IPSG have no such reservations.

The book's solutions to these 'miscarriages of justice' are pure reformism. They fail to realise that the criminal system is irreconcilable with Republican sentiment. Their book goes on to say that 'miscarriages' are the result of the British presence in Ireland. They neglect to say that the police, the screws and the judicial system have their own agenda aside from maintaining British imperialism. They have to be seen to be combatting terrorism, so, as a result, we have 'miscarriages of justice'.

Having said that the IPSG are not a proclaimed revolutionary organisation so we should not expect too much from them. Their campaigning is of vital importance in letting the judicial system know that we have not forgotten their injustice.

The book's role is to educate and inform and it does this admirably. This publication could be compared with any Anarchist Black Cross publication. The only major drawback is the support for Republicanism that would discourage many from becoming involved in a justice pressure group.

THE LAST FEW MONTHS have shown how close to disaster the governing Conservative Party is.

The La-Bore Party is once again preparing to help administer British capitalism, with or without the help of the Liberal Democrats. It has no solution to the mess capitalism is in, either here or throughout the world. The fact that the establishment media is enthusiastically backing Blair for party leadership shows that they want to determine that the next Labour government has as right-wing an agenda as possible. Not that the other candidates for leadership could be realistically described as 'socialist'. The Labour Party whether it transforms itself into a US-style Democrat Party or remains as a social democratic outfit has no answer to the crisis of the system.

More and more people are becoming increasingly alienated from the system that can only produce mass unemployment and rising poverty whilst a minority increases its wealth, environmental destruction at a spectacular level, war and massacre all over the planet, increasing levels of racism and an ever more arrogant fascist movement, ever more repressive laws against those who question the values of the system in any way, and the appalling, soul-destroying vacuum in everyday life. Many turn in desperation to booze and dope to dull the pain. All around is cultural and spiritual desolation, where hypocrisy, cant and a daily diet of crap are dished up in the papers, on the radio and the idiot-box.

Stunned

Many feel stunned and helpless. At the same time the media makes sure with carefully planned reporting about Eastern Europe and the South that this is the best we can get, so be satisfied with that and don't complain. Yet many are becoming angry and politicised by the attacks of the system. About 20,000 mobilised recently in a demonstration against the Criminal Justice Bill, and many of these had never been involved in action before. A counter-culture, to a lesser or greater extent critical of the system, is re-emerging and is vibrant and optimistic. One sign of this is the explosion of small magazines in the last two years. At the same time there are stirrings of militancy in the workplace.

One of the tasks of anarchist communists is to argue for and fight for the unity of struggle and against sectionalism. We are for the globalisation of struggle, for an anti-capitalist front that challenges the system at every level, be it 1) economic, where we fight over how we are treated at work or as unemployed, against the tax attacks by the State (poll tax, council tax, VAT on fuel) as pensioners against the treatment of the elderly, 2) anti-militarist, where we oppose their schemes for war and arms dealing 3) cultural, where we develop a critique of what passes for civilisation in their system and work towards a culture of resistance 4) sexual, where we challenge the oppression of women, the discrimination against gays, and rigid sexual stereotyping 5) ecological, where we challenge their agenda on the despoiling of the planet, and their motorway plans.

Fighting spirit

Dear readers, we think a new fighting spirit is emerging. We have to be there to argue genuine revolutionary politics, to argue for self-organisation and against the Leninist vanguards, who will attempt to hi-jack any new struggle or movement. We need a national revolutionary organisation. This cannot come about without consistent and untiring propaganda and activity. If you share our perspectives, then come forward now and join us.

ORGANISE!

ORGANISE! IS THE national magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF). Organise! is a quarterly theoretical journal published in order to develop anarchist communist ideas. It aims to give a clear anarchist viewpoint on contemporary issues, and initiate debates on areas not normally covered by agitational journals.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and others open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us to develop our ideas further.

Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! — as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree with our A&Ps at all.)

Deadlines for next issue are 3rd September features and reviews, and 10th September for letters and news.

All contributions for the next issue should be sent to:

Organise! to stay at 20 pages — but we need your help!

FOR SOME TIME now readers will have noticed that Organise! has fluctuated between 16 pages and 20 pages for each issue.

When we had something that exceeded the usual 16 page format but we felt should be included, then comrades dug deep into their pockets and financed the extra pages.

At the last conference it was decided to maintain Organise! at 20 pages, so we could provide analysis of events on a more comprehensive level. But to finance this we need your help.

Conference also decided to move towards a bi-monthly appearance of Organise! To help all this come about we have decided to launch a Press Appeal for £2000. We will be reporting in each issue of Organise! on the amount of money coming in. Remember, you can help Organise! grow in number of pages and in frequency of appearance. Revolutionary Violence

THE ISSUE OF violence within the anarchist movement has long been controversial.

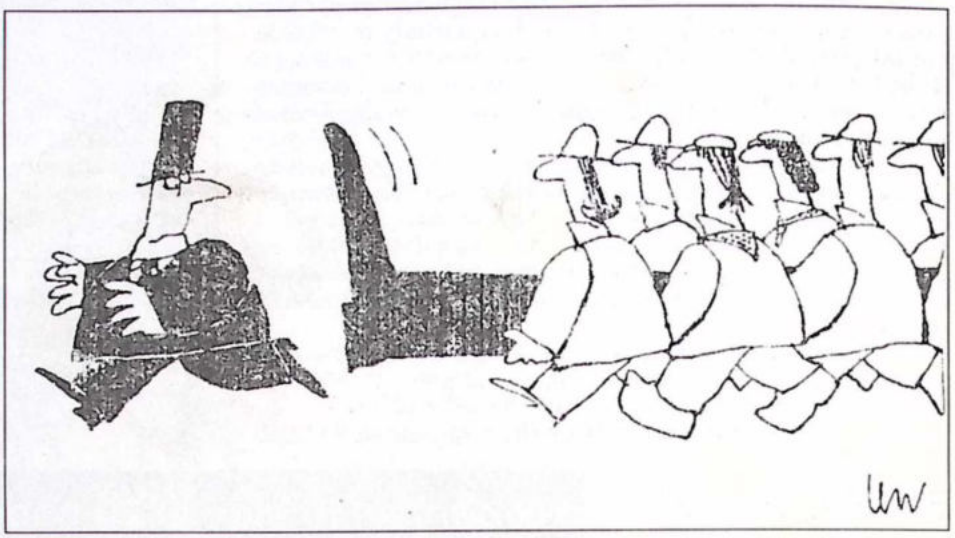
The early anarchist movement associated with Bakunin was openly insurrectionary and the anarchist communists of the late 19th century regarded acts of terror against oppressors as perfectly legitimate. Kropotkin, Malatesta, Most and others enthused over acts of 'propaganda by the deed'. This idea stressed the importance of exemplary actions like strikes, occupations of public buildings etc, by small groups of revolutionaries that would ignite an already revolutionary situation. It very quickly turned into the idea of determined individuals carrying out individual attacks on kings, presidents and capitalists. Given the severe repression in France, for example, after the bloody crushing of the Paris Commune and where open activity was difficult, this was understandable. The State, through the media, were able to so closely associate violence with anarchism that the two ideas became almost interchangeable in the public mind, to the detriment of the movement. Today there are many so-called anarchists who reject the whole revolutionary tradition. So, how should revolutionary anarchists approach the issue?

The first point to make is that it is states acting in defence of privilege and exploitation that practice violence on a large scale. The assassinations of heads of state pale into insignificance in contrast to the normal, everyday actions of the state. In a real sense, states are organised violence. The armed forces, police, prisons and so on are institutional forms of violence used to protect the status quo. And the status quo is in itself violence for it means mass poverty, homelessness, poor health and despair. Should anyone question this legalised everyday terror they are met with the full repressive fist of the state.

State violence

And states are not content to inflict violence on their subject populations, but relish the opportunity to apply it to other peoples. The bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki are perhaps the most horrific examples of this. Some leaders, such as Hitler and Stalin, excelled in murdering millions in both the domestic and external fields of operation. In this context, the bomb throwers and armed expropriators of our revolutionary history must be seen for what they were — heroic, if misguided people acting in self-defence against 'normal' state violence.

With the exception of pacifists, most people accept self-defence as legitimate. To defend oneself or one's family from attack is readily understood and accepted. To defend the oppressed and exploited class is just an extension of this principle. To use appropriate and measured violence against the incarnation of violence which is the state, is no more than to launch a counter-attack. A violent insurrection or general strike must be seen in these terms — legitimate, justified and necessary self defence against the monster of the capitalist state. Anyone who refuses to acknowledge this, necessarily accepts the 'right' of the capitalist state to devour us.



A key point however, needs to be considered, namely that individual acts of violence, however well intentioned, justified by anger, poverty or despair are generally counter productive. Individual terror and group conspiracies are quite easily containable by the state. Rather than inspiring the masses to insurrection, they have generally appalled them, especially given the huge propaganda machines available to oppressors.

Revolutionary mass violence is, however, a different thing if it expresses a determination to overthrow exploitation and oppression. And it takes various forms. The seizure of workplaces, banks and other property is inherently violent since it forcibly removes their possession from their owners. To not do so would be to capitulate to the system of exploitation.

Anarchist revolutionaries defend every method used by the oppressed against the enemy from peaceful and legal protest up to and including violent uprising. Violence as a goal in itself is unjustified and indeed in revolutionary situations working class people have tended to shrink from its use. Not so the state, which on finally securing victory, unleashes a reign of mass terror. Anyone doubting this should look at the aftermaths of the Paris Commune or the Spanish Civil War.

Revolutionary violence is the clear expression of the masses' refusal to continue any longer with the old ways. Sometimes, however, determined minorities, often inspired by Marxist-Leninism, have managed to seize control of such movements for their own ends. The October Revolution of 1917 led to the creation of one of the world's most brutal states. This mistake must not be repeated. Either the revolution is about smashing the state once and for all, or it merely brings about another form of oppression.

Attacks

During the last ten years, the working class has been subject to ever-increasing attacks. Mass unemployment is now seen as 'normal' by those unaffected by it. There has been a large redistribution of wealth from the poor to the rich, leaving millions in a state of near destitution. Exceptionally regressive taxes have driven millions into a hand to mouth existence. State inspired racist violence is common in some parts of our cities. Given this context, is it surprising that we have had outbursts of near-insurrectionary violence? The poll tax riot was a clear and welcome expression of class anger, as were the 'hit squads' which immobilised vehicles and stood up to the police during the lengthy miners strike of 1984-85. When black people form self-defence groups against fascist attacks, they are justified. When demonstrators retaliate against police provocations they are justified. When a whole class rises up against the state and capitalism, it is justified.

When, later this year, we hear stories of old people freezing to death due to the imposition of value added tax on domestic fuel, perhaps those who comdemn revolutionary violence will have a cause to think. Capitalism and the state aren't going to go away or be reformed. They need to be destroyed, and unfortunately violence by the working class is almost certainly a necessary ingredient in this process.

Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists.
We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.
2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.
3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.
4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.
5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.
6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.
7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.
8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution.
In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.
9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation.

We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method.

We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis.

We reject sectarianism and work for a united, revolutionary anarchist movement.

A Manifesto for the Millennium

At the last National Conference of the ACF it was decided to adopt the document presented by one comrade as the basis of a new Manifesto of Anarchist Communism. This is now being worked on by ACF comrades and should be ready by January. Draft copies of the Manifesto are available from the London address for £1 per copy inc. postage.

At the Anarchist Bookfair on October 22 at Conway Hall, Red Lion Square, London WC1 (nearest tube Holborn) we are having a public meeting to present the Manifesto. It will give an analysis of the current changes that capitalism is going through and will present an anarchist communist strategy to build a new revolutionary movement. Also at the public meeting will be a French comrade of the Organisation Communiste Libertaire who participated in the March 22 Movement, one of the catalysts of the May 1968 events.

Posters and stickers

Bundles of this poster can be obtained from the London address. Please send a donation, or get a single copy and photocopy 'em.

London ACF have also produced an A5 leaflet explaining the basic ideas of anarchist communism. Again, send a donation for a bundle to the above address.

Our last two lots of different stickers sold out. So to meet demand we've produced 14,000 more (anti-capitalist, anti-fascist, ecology etc). Again bundles can be obtained from the London address, if you enclose a donation.

Processed Peace — The IRA Ceasefire and the Pax Americana

"PEACE", IT APPEARS is the in-thing around the world. Palestine, South Africa and now Ireland have all been beneficiaries of the "Peace Dividend" brought to us by the New World Order plc.

We were a bit cheated this time though. No handshaking after talks in Oslo or embraces on the Whitehouse lawn! We had to make do with Reynolds, Adams and Hulme in Dublin. Not very spectacular at all.

But seriously folks. When the representatives of the ruling class, and would-be ruling class, stitch up a deal and call it "peace" you'll have to excuse our cynicism. We have to ask what's behind it and whose interests does it serve?

The end of the cold war following the collapse of "communism" has, with the death of the "red menace" meant that the strategic importance of Ireland, North and South has, to put it mildly, diminished. The possibility of a "Cuba on Britain's doorstep" has receded somewhat. With the disintegration of the evil empire of the USSR the possibility of Ireland leaving the orbit of Western Imperialism is now zero. And hasn't the Republican top-brass dropped all this socialist nonsense anyway?

For some time now the stage has been set for America to step in and play its World-cop role and the Irish nationalist and Republican leadership has been rapidly sliding itself into the ANC/PLO role.

Below: Bogside rioter, 1969.

Gerry Adams, once the epitome of terrorist nastiness is now Gerry "world statesman and peacemaker" and John "the balloon" Hulme may yet make it to Oslo (for the Nobel Prize).

Compromise

The role of the British state in all this is the usual one. Much talk about peace and much carrying on of war.

The forces presently holding hegemony in the British state realise that the war in the Six Counties will not be ended without "compromise" on their part. The Republican movement, for its part has also long realised that the armed struggle, which could probably be continued indefinitely, will not achieve its vision of a united Ireland. Compromise, is, therefore, inevitable. And, without doubt the IRA ceasefire represents an acknowledgement of this inevitability.

Undoubtedly the long-term aim of the most clear-sighted of the British bourgeoisie is a lasting "peace" in Ireland. The price of continued war just isn't worth it and the IRA bombing in the City in '92 has obviously shaken those it was aimed at. If this "peace" requires reunification then Ireland will be reunified on British terms. If "peace" could be achieved without reunification then this would be another option, but it can't, so it isn't. When we say on British terms we mean that the British state will accept some form of political structure, introduced over a period of time, which will involve Dublin in the administration of the 32 counties. As long it does not create political instability.

The trick for the British state will be to offer enough to incorporate Sinn Fein whilst successfully marginalising/neutralising any forces which could jeopardise the "Peace Process". Neither side, the British state nor the Republican movement can be seen to have sold-out or to have accepted defeat.

At the moment the Republican leadership is using mass mobilisations, particularly around the Border Roads campaign, as both a show of strength and as a means of keeping nationalists occupied. If Sinn Fein's place at the negotiating table isn't soon in coming, demoralisation may creep in, possibly leading to schism in republican ranks. If this happens Sinn Fein/IRA will be forced to either resume the armed struggle or to liquidate those who wish to.

Paramilitaries

The other force which could jeopardise the "Peace Process" is, of course, the Loyalist paramilitaries. But, since it has been the British state which has generally armed and trained them, they may be less of a problem to "neutralise" than some may think. What will be important will be the loyalty (to the British government) of the security forces themselves. Since the ceasefire the obvious collusion between the security forces, particularly the RUC, and the Loyalist paramilitaries, has continued unabated. Although the Army has started wearing berets rather than helmets it has not, unfortunately, taken to wearing flip-flops. Places such as Crossmaglen, for example, remain large scale open-plan prisons. Only time will tell us where the loyalties of the various military intelligence agencies will finally lie.

For the Unionists, particularly the moderates (UUP, Alliance) the offer of a referendum, confined to the Six Counties and therefore a foregone conclusion in favour of continued union, is a sop. The non-sectarian land of milk and honey may be far away for northern Catholics, but everything points to Unionist political domination being gradually emasculated in favour of some form of power-sharing in a 32 county set-up. After not-inconsiderable sound and fury the "sensible" Unionists will come to accept this. "Nelson" Adams may have his Orange FW DeKlerk after all.

Above: "Now should I change my first name to Yasser or Nelson?"

Bogus

So what does this all mean for revolutionaries? For the myriad groups of the British/Irish left it's generally been very clear. After years of support, critical or otherwise, for the Irish National Liberation struggle, they have to decide whether to condemn the ceasefire as a "sell-out" or to welcome it. For the various Trotskyist groups, who change their line as often as their underwear, and who do so with such consummate ease, there's no problem. As they have said all along, the "petit- bourgeois leadership of the Republican movement" inevitably "sold-out" the struggle because only the working class can lead the National Liberation struggles to a successful conclusion (under the leadership of...whichever Trots are speaking). What they don't say is that National they don't say is that National Liberation, even if "lead by the working class", is an impossibility. National "independence" from one Imperialist power inevitably means "liberated" nations being in thrall to a rival power. When the world is totally dominated by Imperialism, the only alternative is worldwide communist revolution. Any other anti-imperialism, whether based upon nationalism or a leftist variant of nationalism, is essentially bogus.

So much for the left. What of we anarchist and libertarian communists? Do we support the ceasefire? We have never called for an IRA ceasefire, mainly because such a call puts the "blame" on the Republicans and ignores the fundamental cause of the war.

What we can say is that the ceasefire may have effects unforeseen by both the Republican leadership and the Brits. The mass mobilisations, the marches, demonstrations, pickets etc, which the Republican Movement has instigated, may develop a dynamic which the leadership may find difficult, perhaps impossible, to contain or stop. Although this dynamic might not immediately develop ideological autonomy, the nature of the demands (for demilitarisation, opening up of the border) and the means used (direct actions, even if mainly symbolic) may lead many to revolutionary conclusions. We can only hope so and with our meagre forces try to assist this development. One thing is for sure; as long as the conditions which created resistance remain, the resistance will continue. We have to encourage that resistance and, where we can, try to win the leadership of ideas within it. At least an IRA ceasefire means that Irish libertarian activists may have one less body of armed men to dodge. Rest assured we will continue to work towards the day when all the guns of the bourgeoisie are silenced, and not with the aid of any Imperialist power but with the undefeatable power of a united revolutionary working class!

Signalworkers — Not Much of a Victory

THE SIGNALWORKERS' ACTIONS came to an end when the rail union RMT negotiated a deal with the Railtrack bosses. RMT deliberately limited the actions only to the signalworkers and to limited strikes rather than an all-out strike.

At the same time the government and the boss class were determined that the strike would fail: the government fully supporting Railtrack, whilst The Financial Times and The Spectator expressed the views of the capitalists in their calls to sack strikers. The Institute of Directors increased its strident demands to Michael Portillo, the Employment Secretary, to make strikes in "essential" services illegal. Portillo expressed his sympathy with these demands. Railtrack had already shown its willingness to force other railworkers to do the work of the signalworkers during strikes. At the same time they continued, with the help of the media, to peddle the lie that they were able to operate almost complete services during strikes.

The government was determined to make its 2.5% ceiling on pay for the public sector stick. And in fact RMT settled precisely for that. Not only that, it agreed to changes in working practices, and payments for increased productivity which would be paid in advance. These deals would have to be introduced locally.

The only benefits of the strike were that Sunday working was kept out of the standard working week, shorter hours and more holidays were agreed. But these have to be balanced against the attacks that the signalworkers will now receive through implementation of the new productivity deals.

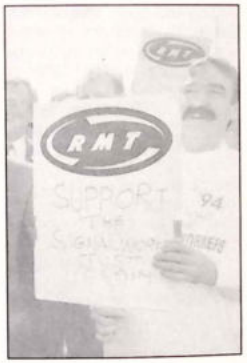
As a result of the previous productivity increases over the last few years, the workload of many railworkers has increased considerably. In some areas two signalworkers now do work that was originally done by 100.

These savage attacks come at a time when Horton, the chairman of Railtrack, pays himself £2,335 per week for a three-day week and when a new Railtrack Head office is being constructed costing £7 million — twice what it would cost to pay for the signalworkers' increase — whilst £146 million was spent restructuring in 1993/4, which led to a huge new layer of bureaucracy of managers, but no extra money spent on services.

The signalworkers have failed to gain the victory that so many on the Leninist left claimed, in particular the Socialist Workers' Party.

The deal was rushed through by RMT with no time for signalworkers to study the small print. At the same time the strike ended with the signalworkers not completely demoralised, as has happened with the miners. But signalworkers will have to be prepared to go into action again quickly, and must seriously think about developing methods of organisation outside the control of the union.

The strike could have achieved a much better result if other railworkers and other transport workers, in particular on the buses and London tube, had come out in concert with the signalworkers, and if the actions had broken free of the deathly grip of RMT, and if support had been built on a massive level in other workplaces and outside the workplaces in the neighbourhoods.



This support would have meant not just talking about the pay demand, but showing how the attacks on railworkers have eroded the service, and forced many to work overtime. From here we could have gone on to the effect this has on safety standards, and the priority that capitalism is giving to road transport over public transport.

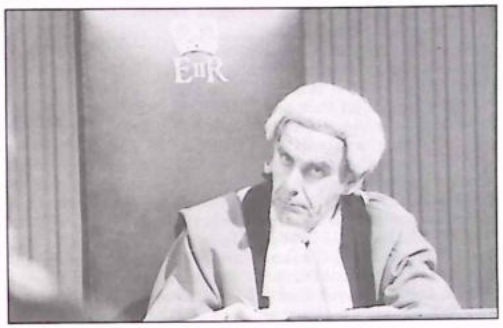
The links have to be shown between the attacks on railworkers, the public transport system and the road-building schemes of the government. Active solidarity must be established between the fights against the motorways and the struggle of all transport workers.

Meet and greet the ACF!

You can meet us at the Anarchist Bookfair and the London Greenpeace Fayre this year, where we will be running stalls. We'll also have a public meeting at the Anarchist Bookfair (see separate box for details). Anarchist Bookfair Sat Oct 22, 10-8, Conway Hall, Red Lion Square London WC1 (nearest tube Holborn). London Greenpeace Fayre Saturday 29 October 11-8, same venue as Anarchist Bookfair.

Keep it Fluffy? or Fight the Criminal Justice Bill!

THE MASSIVE AND joyful turn-out to the Criminal Justice Bill demo in July showed the depth of opposition to the legislation about to be passed by the Major government. We explained all the repercussions of the Bill if it was enacted in Organise! 34. Now we look at the opposition to it, and how effective resistance could be organised.



Above: "Are you a squatter, traveller, raver or striker? Guilty!"

The Bill is being directed above all, as many already know, at squatters, travellers, ravers, anti-road resisters and hunt saboteurs. This is because at the moment the principal opposition to the system is expressed through these specific struggles and life-styles. The defeat of the miners and other heavy battalions of the working class meant that the struggle against capitalism shifted its ground. Whilst action continued in the workplace (in subdued fashion and on a fragmented basis) and indeed is now gathering strength again, opposition was showing itself at a cultural level and in direct action against roads. This explains the chief targets of the Bill.

Of course, some of the opposition to the Bill is designed to shackle any genuine resistance to it — a seeming contradiction. But this opposition — which argues for the signing of petitions, lobbies of Parliament and so on — recognises the legitimacy of the system and is only interested in keeping it pleasant. The civil liberties group Liberty, in the handout they produced on the Bill, has the telling little ditty: "Keep it sweet, keep it right, remember, this is a peaceful fight". Oddly enough, this was illustrated by a graphic of a baton-wielding, riot-shield-carrying cop. The leaflet had the advice to enlarge and multiply the poster, encouraging people to spread this message of non-resistance! Another defender of complete lack of real resistance was Steve Platt, editor of New Statesman and Society. This boring weekly rag has always supported a soggy right-wing Labour viewpoint, singing the praises of Kinnock, and denouncing the class violence of the miners' strike. Steve Prat was one of the sponsors of the Coalition Against the Criminal Justice Bill, also supported by the "fluffies" of the Freedom Network and the Socialist Workers' Party. Enthusiastically writing in New Statesman he whinged on about "Some unpleasant verbal badinage of the kind that denies the essential humanity of the people in blue uniforms". (Tell that to any striking miner, traveller, raver or black person.) And drooled on about "stewards and nonviolent activists who kept the march moving, and prevented the possibility of truly serious clashes occurring". No, Platt(itude) has not become a blissed-out Peacenik overnight, he is merely lending his support to sabotaging the completely justified anger against the Bill.

Attacked

Police attacked demonstrators after the May 1st demo against the Bill, and then after the Hackney Homeless Festival and at a demonstration at Hackney Town Hall against the Labour Council's support for the Bill. Most recently they used considerable violence against the homeless and unemployed in Oxford who were occupying a large empty building as a protest against the Bill, and with the intention of providing both a social centre and shelter for the homeless. They did not attack the massive demo in July on any large scale because of the numbers. They feared the crowd would fight back, leading to a re-run of the Battle of Trafalgar Square, which led to the defeat of the Poll Tax and was a major factor in the fall of Thatcher. The Major government is in a much weaker position than the Thatcher regime, and the police tactics at the July demo were specifically designed to avoid this. This does not mean that they will not attack us where they are numerically superior and away from the glare of publicity, as has been proved by events described above.

Obviously we must defend ourselves against violence from the police. We fail to agree with the Fluffies of the Freedom Network that we should peacefully accept any attacks. We cannot let them impose their pious morality on us. If they try to stop any resistance against the attacks of the State then they themselves are acting as cops. Indeed, attempts were made by some Fluffies to tear the masks off of some demonstrators who did not choose to be recorded on video.

Ironically enough, one of these apostles of Fluffery is rumoured to have received a hefty whack from a police truncheon when he positioned himself between the pigs and the demonstrators.

We say that raves, squats, anti-road occupations must not be attacked and broken up when the Bill is put into action. If people fight back and defend themselves, then we support them unconditionally, with no strings attached. What would have happened if mass resistance to police attacks had occurred on the July demo? Would the Fluffies have denounced this? (The answer is Yes!, they would have.) Would they have put themselves in the same position as Militant did after the Battle of Trafalgar Square? (Yes again!)

The Fluffies almost withdrew from the July demo because they feared that the Socialist Workers' Party and anarchists would seek confrontation with the police (indeed they made sure that the date of this October demo was moved forward so that it would not coincide with the Anarchist Bookfair and lead to the participation, they hoped, of fewer anarchists).

SWP

But the Fluffies have nothing much to fear from the SWP. In their own way they intend to keep the fight against the Bill as fluffy as possible. This means they will try to direct the movement towards appealing to the Labour Party and the TUC to fight on our behalf. Fat chance! When Labour enthusiastically supported large sections of the Bill and when the TUC has never done anything but sabotage any struggle! In fact the SWP are enthusiastically arguing that the main object of the Bill was to attack the unions! As usual they've got it completely wrong! Does anyone remember during the fight against the Poll Tax how the SWP said that community-based resistance would be a failure and that non-payment was a non-starter? Remember how they did a quick U-turn when it became clear that many thousands were refusing to pay the Poll Tax? Of course the Bill could be used in future against striking workers — and not against the unions who are there to control any workers' action that gets out of hand — but the main target is the groups and sub-cultures already mentioned. This is because they are in opposition to present society and because the Major government wants to please its supporters amongst the big landowners and farmers, the landlords and the hang'em and flog'em brigade in the Home Counties.

The Criminal Justice Bill must be met with mass defiance and mass resistance — as if it did not exist in the first place. The law must be flouted and any attacks on raves, squats, anti-road actions etc, must be met with mass mobilisations. The lines of contact and networking already in place on a national and local level must be strengthened, extended and enlarged. Unity of all those under attack and mass resistance are the watchwords!

Riot! An eye-witness account of the Battle of Park Lane

THE ANTI-CJB DEMONSTRATION on 9th October ended in what the media and the Police described as the "worst" riot since Trafalgar Square.

They blamed "anarchist trouble-makers" for the riot and claimed that we didn't have a legitimate right to be present. As if a piece of highly-repressive legislation would not naturally interest us. Liberty criticised some police action but said it was a difficult event to police. All were convinced that a major calamity had happened and professed horror at the violence. (This on the day that Britain joined the US in the military build up in the Gulf!)

What horrified them most was that mounted police were routed and driven from Hyde Park. Later, police repeatedly failed to storm the Park from the Park Lane side as they were pelted with missiles and attacked with a ten-foot battering ram. The reaction of those of us in the park was one of elation. It is a long time since we have felt this sense of class power in the face of the State's thugs. Walking through the police encampment at Marble Arch I was struck by the stunned silence. Their omnipotent self-image had been shattered

Arrests

Of course given time to reflect, it was obvious that not everything was ideal. As in any riot, heavily-armoured police inflicted far more injuries than they took and many more people were arrested. Some camera crews were attacked, but the television-coverage showed clearly the faces of those attacking the police. We can expect more arrests of people identified from pictures supplied by the media. For these reasons we should make it clear that anyone who turns up at a demonstration with the sole purpose of turning it into a riot is highly irresponsible. However, this isn't what happened and we support unconditionally anyone who resisted police provocation.

What seems to have triggered the violence was police reactions to sound-systems being brought to the park. They do not like losing control and tried to stop them. Any police action comes with the implicit threat of violence, but the ravers who were partying would have none of it and drove the police back. Park Lane and the Marble Arch roundabout were blocked and the police eventually let one of the trucks into the park. But they soon sent horses in to disperse the crowd. This provoked the full-scale riot, as demonstrators used the space to throw missiles at the horses and the round shield units and forced them away. People drifted down towards Park Lane and this is where the police were humiliated again as they failed to storm the Park. In the front line a fire breather celebrated by blowing flames at them.

As we expected, the fluffies condemned the attacks on the police with at least one trying to unmask a rioter. Paul May of the Judith Ward and Birmingham Six campaigns was the most blatant member of the coalition to condemn the rioters. We feel that the police's racist framing of innocent Irish people on its own would justify any attack on them. However, many of the Coalition expressed regret that police had been injured. Jeremy Corbyn thought that everything happened as the result of bad policing, while the SWP surprised us by expressing support for resistance to police provocation. What their stance is on people taking a few precautions and coming prepared with masks and firecrackers is unclear, and I heard at least one of their members complaining about the "bad example" set by one of his comrades who joined the riot rather than getting on their bus.

Class War

Class War's stance was totally clear and their leaflet was produced as "evidence" that everything was pre-planned. The media never say that American women who arm themsleves against rape pre-planned their shooting of rapists. Nor do they say that the massive police armoury including shields, clubs, horses and vans driven at speed were examples of pre-planned violence. No, the fact that many of the rioters didn't mask up and that they didn't take CW's advice of getting close enough to be sure that their missiles hit the police rather than demonstrators, show that what happened was spontaneous. Of course the usual rumours floated around of agent provocateurs, of the police wanting a riot to justify the CJB and even of CW being an MI5 front. The reality was that the riot was a spontaneous and totally legitimate reaction to immediate events and to the increasing police repression of recent years. The fact that some people thought that a riot was sufficiently on the cards that they should come prepared doesn't change this reality. Many of those appearing in court were of no fixed abode. (The media added an interesting racist angle by focussing on the fact that two of those accused are Spanish.) The number of NFAs highlights the media hypocrisy. No doubt some of them were squatters or travellers. This legislation will grant the police the right to seize travellers' homes, with violence if necessary, and landlords will be granted the right to evict squatters violently. Anyone who plans this sort of violence shouldn't be surprised when they get hit back. We can expect more retaliation to this and other repression in the future.

Yobs and Boot-Boys

BEFORE THE CRIMINAL Justice Bill has even got through parliament, John Major has started planning the next law and order attack on us.

In the lead up to the party conference he gave a speech in which he attacked "uncouth yobs". The speech poses as an attack on crime and criminals but in fact it is an attack on the working class. "Uncouth" and "yob" are words the ruling class use of the working class. Hooray Henries and student high jinks were not on the agenda. When the middle class see a group of young men with cockney or geordie accents hanging around after the pubs shut then the thought "yobs" goes through their brains. And it isn't just the middle class: women, older people and other "vulnerable" people have been taught to fear groups of working-class youth. But when you actually look at the statistics it isn't women or the old who are attacked, it is overwhelmingly young men who are the victims of violent assault in the street. Women face violence in the home. The popular fear of violent street crime is largely a media invention, the coverage varying with editorial whim and the prevailing climate more than with the levels of violence on the street: you are far more likely to be killed or maimed by a middle-aged, middle class drunk with a company car, than by a working class yob. But this isn't to say that intimidation or violence from gangs of anti-social young men isn't a problem. I have been on the escalator at Leicester Square when a bunch of drunken young men got on. They joked about wanting to do over some beggars and then one of them started to taunt me. One of his companions still had his wallet out with his police identity card clearly visible. And this is the heart of the matter. The reason there are so unruly yobs around is that the ruling class need them. They need them to man the police force and the army. (Yes, I do mean "man".) And if the occasional prisoner gets a bruising, if the odd Argentinian POW, civilian in Belfast, or woman tour operator in Cyprus gets beaten, or murdered or raped, then they pretend it never happened, say it was justified, find someone to frame, or talk of "rotten apples". The reason that The Sun and the government react so strongly to attacks on "our boys" is that if you look too closely, you'll notice that they are just the same as the "uncouth yobs".

Machismo

The media are full of positive images of male machismo. Sport, film and TV promote hard, tough masculinity. Hendon Police trainees used to pack out the TV room to watch the antics of Carter and Regan on The Sweeney. They needed their minds filled with violence so that they could go and seize shoplifters or attack striking miners and printers, and suppress all opposition with violence and the threat of violence.

And it isn't just the ruling class's hired thugs who are the targets of this imagery. Neo-nazi boneheads can absorb it and then go out and attack blacks and Asians. If just enough violence happens to scare the most peaceful elements and keep us divided: black from white, male from female, old from young, gay from straight, even Saints from Pompey and Celtic from Rangers, then people's minds are distracted from the real divide: the rich and powerful from the rest of us.

The ruling class also model themselves on the macho culture. Boarding school and rugger teach the young to be tough and unfeeling, and incidentally stop them from having any real contact with their working class peers. And when they have become tough and unfeeling, they can start wars, they can make people redundant, they can squeeze benefits and they can sell arms to mass murderers, all in aid of Capital and the State. Heseltine and Portillo are just the sort of men this system hopes to churn out and which the right glorifies. Kelvin McKenzie, Ian MacGregor and Margaret Thatcher may have slightly different educational backgrounds but their brand of macho ruthlessness is just how the ruling class likes to see itself. For them, hard is good and fuck what it does to other people.

So don't be fooled. It is the ruling class yobs who cause far more death and misery than the most anti-social working class lad can dream of. And beware of the gloss that sections of the revolutionary left put on the macho image. None should cry over the odd hospitalised copper: they had it coming. And if Kenneth Clarke were found stabbed to death one day, we'd feel the same sense of elation we did when Ian Gow and Louis Mountbatten got their come-uppance. But we should be wary of glorifying the same kind of machismo that the current system likes to promote. Is it really so great that a bunch of rich school kids got a beating? Surely their parents should be the real target. The children are forced into a role just as much as we are and a beating is hardly likely to do anything except make them into harsher masters for the future. After all, that is precisely the purpose of their public school education. But that doesn't mean that we should all be shy and retiring. When change does happen, the ruling class will use its hired yobs against us. And no doubt in the frontline against them will be those same law-defying yobs from the working class that John Major has attacked. So we should avoid the type of middle class leftism that pretends to support the working class, but sneers about the "underclass" or the "lumpenproletariat" whenever it sees a group of youths hanging around the street corner. And in the meantime we should support each other in our communities against anti-social crime.

What kind of world is this when people have no choice but to call the police for help when threatened, and where they can set up neighbourhood watch schemes because people haven't been helping each other anyway?

No, we should take inspiration from Derry in the '60s, the mining villages and Brixton frontline in the '80s and the bailiff busters in the '90s and build a real neighbourhood watch which will keep the yobs out even if they are in uniform. Then the only people who ring the police will really be grasses and not frightened pensioners.

UCH — SAVAGED NOT SAVED

THE FOLLOWING TEXT was produced as a leaflet by people fighting to save University College Hospital. The ACF did not have a hand in its production. Nevertheless, we feel that the information and the opinions expressed in the leaflet are deserving of wider circulation and that is why we are re-printing it in Organise!

THE SWP doing Bottomley's dirty work for her:
Q: What have Virginia Bottomley and the SWP got in common?
A: Among other things, they both claim that University College Hospital (UCH) has been saved.

About 700 jobs and hundreds of beds have been lost, and the main Cruciform building — which everyone associated with UCH — has been closed. Yet for different, equally-manipulative reasons, the "Health" Minister and the "Socialist" Workers' Party are both agreed on the lie that "UCH has been saved". Goebbels: "The bigger the lie the more it's believed", would have been proud.

Well — now-merged with the Middlesex, there's the administration — really useful if you've had a heart attack. And there's the Accident & Emergency — but that was never planned for closure in the first place. Instead, as with all A & E's without a hospital attached, it's been left without adequate back-up, giving most patients just 48 hours to stay before being moved on. There are, however, 40 or so extra beds for those who need intensive care, who can now stay on a bit longer. Nevertheless, staff are now complaining that whereas before it used to take just a couple of minutes to move such patients to a specialist ward in the old Cruciform building, now it takes up to half an hour to get to the Middlesex because of heavy traffic. What's more the recent death of a six-month-old baby at UCH A & E shows how dangerous it is to have an A & E separate from the specialists (now based in Middlesex) who were previously on site; at the same time the cuts ensured that the equipment for monitoring the baby wasn't working. It looks like the parents are going to sue the over-worked nurses involved, using the Patients' Charter. The much-lauded Charter is used intentionally to blame individual health workers in order to fend off attacks on the real murderers: the managers and accountants who push through the cuts demanded by Bottomley and her genocidal government.

Apart from this, there's a private wing (great!). Also "saved" (we're not sure they were planning it for closure originally anyway) are the Urology department (much reduced), the clap clinic and Obstetrics. And there's a new children's ward: however, at the Middlesex there used to be two children's wards, and now there's only one — which means that between them, one children's ward has been lost, even though on paper UCH's has been "saved". Similarly, by classifying some beds which were previously the Middlesex's, and by counting the beds existing towards the end of the run-down of the UCH, the health authorities can claim that UCH has lost "only" 70 beds instead of the 300+ that have really been lost. Lies, damned lies and statistics. Moreover, three weeks after Bottomley said the UCH had been saved, it was announced that the latest plan being considered was to sell off the whole UCH site (the land fetching millions on the property market) and to move parts of the UCH to various other hospitals. If this comes about UCH will merely be an administrative label on some bureaucrat's door.

To say all this means the hospital has been saved is like saying that a formerly healthy adult, who has had both legs and arms amputated and is on a life support machine, has been saved. Well, technically yes — but it hardly constitutes the victory the SWP like to make it out to be.

With saviours like these who needs grave-diggers?

During the Vietnam war an American general declared: "In order to save the village, it had to be destroyed". With UCH it's more a case of "in order to destroy the hospital, it had to look like it was saved".

Virginia Bottomley says the UCH has been saved, for similar reasons to the government saving coal mines in 1992 — to stop people fighting together, to reinforce the ignorance and confusion about what's happening to the hospitals and to divide up the fight to save them into isolated campaigns for each hospital, separated from a more general movement.

But why does the SWP proclaim "We saved UCH" when those SWP members who have worked and struggled at UCH — some of whom are genuinely fighting to win — know perfectly well this is bullshit? As in all hierarchies, the individual has to repress their point of view and preach "the party line". During the strike, SWP strategy was designed to gain the maximum publicity and to show how radical they were compared to the union leadership, by pushing for demands that they knew the leaders would not meet. The predictable sell-out of the strike by Unison was the "victory" the SWP wanted: confirmation of something they knew beforehand would happen, but did nothing to undermine. In fact, they had encouraged a faith in the union which they knew would inevitably be betrayed. It was only afterwards that they needed to find a happy ending, so that they could encourage others to repeat the tragedy at other hospitals. The SWP's main concern was recruitment to a self-proclaimed image of themselves heroically and successfully leading the working class to victory, even if this victory is a myth. For them this is more vital than the development of any real struggle by the poor, honestly facing the horrific extent of their defeats and the reasons for them.

The struggles at UCH

During the struggles at UCH the SWP did everything to minimise the efforts of non-SWP members. During the work-in aimed at stopping the closure of Ward 2/1 in Nov-Dec 92, SWP members played as much a part as anyone else involved in the struggle — though it was probably the support of junior doctors which really won this battle, admittedly only a temporary reprieve. In the strike of Aug-Sept '93 they played a more significant part — not all of it helpful by any means. For instance they did much to ensure that the cheerful demos which had previously disrupted traffic got turned into boring routine affairs. And in the occupation of Ward 2/3 in September, admittedly suggested by an SWP member, though broken into by a non-party hospital campaigner, they did much to dampen the high-spirited atmosphere. When occupiers met with a few SWP union stewards to discuss the occupation, the occupiers were told the stewards represented the decisions of the strike committee, and these decisions were: vetting to decide who should be allowed into the occupation, to be carried out by the branch secretary and chair, both SWP members. People would have to book themselves onto a formalised rota days in advance just to be able to spend a night there, reducing the occupation to a chore and duty, killing off the social dynamic going on. The effect of these changes was miserable: a lot of people, particularly locals who visited regularly, were put off from coming. And there seemed little point in giving out leaflets encouraging people to come, if they had to be vetted first. People now felt they were only there with the tolerance of certain officials, and no longer joint partners in the struggle.

The openness of the occupation, with free debate flowing back and forth informally, was replaced with an atmosphere of intrigue and secret whispering. It was only later that the occupiers found out that these demands of the SWP union officials weren't at all proposed by the strike committee: it had been an SWP manipulation from the very beginning.

The second occupation of Ward 2/3 was organised by us — UCH Community Action Committee — without, unfortunately, a strike at UCH, and completely independently of any political party. We had hoped to extend the occupation of one ward by getting loads of people back from a TUC Health Service demo on November 20th. We failed, even though the occupation took nearly three weeks to be evicted. During this time, the SWP were even less supportive than the rest of the media — the occupation only got a mention after the eviction. We could never, of course, pretend that "we saved UCH" — not just because it hasn't been saved, but, more vitally, because if UCH had been saved it could not have been down to us, but due to a more general and much more combative movement, involving a considerably greater section of the working class than the few people who initiated the occupation. Unlike the SWP, we have no pretensions to being an indispensible vanguard, able to win victories on our own. And, of course, UCH has been, by and large, a defeat, and to ignore that is to confuse and demoralise any chance of a fightback, which is where the SWP and Bottomley have so much in common.

If a fight is to develop to save the hospitals or to stop the horrific attacks on the poor, it will not only have to bypass the parties and unions, but attack them as enemies and obstacles to our struggle. Our health and our lives can not be "saved" by the professional liars of the Left, Right or Centre, but only by ourselves organising not just an organisation with a name on a banner or logo on a leaflet, which is just an image, but organising specific actions and critiques, correcting our failures and weaknesses.

THE WORKING CLASS AGAINST THE ANC

WE HAVE CONSISTENTLY argued in the pages of Organise! that the ANC was an authoritarian, pro-capitalist organisation and that the mass of the population in South Africa, the working class of town and countryside and the poor, could expect nothing from the new regime.

As we said in Organise! 33: "The new regime that is being created will also face trouble from amongst the black industrial working class and from the urban and rural poor . . ."

The first signs of this opposition erupted with the strikes that broke out in June and accelerated by late July. In fact the expectations of the working class are high, with more strikes this year so far than any year since 1987, with nine million days lost in strikes. These strikes involved all the important sectors of the South African economy — mining, metal, telecommunications, transport, post, health service and retail. The strikes in the major industries were preceded by 48 different disputes amongst catering, metal, paper, oil, municipal and court workers. These disputes in the working class even set off a strike amongst the police of the ex-homeland Kwazulu! One of the most important of these strikes was the Pick 'n Pay retail chain where a national strike of 20,000 workers took place. Workers occupied the stores defying court orders and police actions. Pick 'n Pay workers were fighting for a 229 rand monthly increase, derisory when one considers that many are on R200 a week. This compares to the daily income of R1,000 for the Pick 'n Pay bosses, who made vast profits under apartheid, and offered their employees a laughable R175 over a 16-month period. But the strikers were also fighting against the racist practices of Pick 'n Pay, which tries to sell itself as an enlightened employer.

On 13-14 July police attacked the strikers with stun grenades, rubber bullets, tear gas, batons and police dogs. It is significant that the apartheid regime very rarely used stun grenades against strikers, whereas in their first confrontation with the working class the ANC-led regime used it immediately. In further attacks on the strikers the police arrested 800.

The new regime is a government of "National Unity" between the ANC and the old rulers of the Nationalist Party. In this new regime unity is indeed forged — between the new black ruling class and the old white ruling class. Junior partners in this government are the long-time allies of the ANC, the Stalinist South African Communist Party, who will attempt to control the working class to the benefit of the regime, through their influence in both the union bureaucracies and among many ordinary working class people.

It is highly significant that the Minister of Police, Sydney Mufamadi, is a SACP leader and a former Assistant General Secretary of the union COSATU, which has an alliance with the ANC and SACP, and to which the strikers belong! In fact not one minister or MP having membership in the ANC, SACP or COSATU supported the strike, whilst ANC and SACP ministers said that the violence was caused by the strikers. As to the union leaders, the attitude of Enoch Godongwana of the metal-workers union NUMSA, a component of COSATU, was indicative. He sang the praises of "orderly strikes" completely under the control of the union, with "normal" collective bargaining. This was a side-swipe at the direct action tactics of the Pick 'n Pay workers. Despite these attempts by the unions to shackle workers, direct action tactics have continued with the recent lorry-drivers' strikes, where road blocks were set up by the strikers.

Silent

Mandela has already warned that industrial action would harm the prospects of foreign investment. On 18 July he hurriedly met with his old ally Sam Shilowa, General Secretary of COSATU. The following day, union leaders lowered the wage demand to R196 over 15 months, which is a 30% drop and comes close to the bosses' offer, the difference being a measly R5.90 per week. The bosses refused to accept and under pressure from the strikers, the union leaders were forced to revert to the original demand. Soon after this, the union settled for the lower offer!

The Communist Party remained silent on the strike until after Mandela had tried to end it, only then to come out in support of the strikers. This of course means nothing with its members serving in the government and controlling the police which brutally attacked the workers.

The ANC-led regime has already planned its repression against any opposition from the mass of the population with its retention of detention without trial, and the taking over of broadcasting by ANC hacks. Already ANC, SACP and COSATU ministers are enriching themselves and living in lavish style. Even before the election, Peter Mokaba, the former head of the ANC youth wing, was attempting to extort from the Miss South Africa beauty contest, a big money-spinner for white capitalists. He said that the contest was biased against blacks (Yes, it was, but why should black women feel any more liberated by being allowed to participate in this cattle market?) and demanded £50,000 to be paid into a trust fund run by him and a business partner. This was dropped after the white capitalists complained over Mokaba's head to an ANC superior. Since then, Mokaba has seized control of this degrading event to line his own pockets.

Thugs

Once the ANC and its allies in SACP and COSATU came to power they made sure they awarded themselves huge wage rises. Mandela got R784,350, cabinet ministers R470,000 and MPs R193,200 compared to average black working class wages of R8000 a year. Other signs of the ANC intention to exploit and repress working people was its adoption of the military dictators of the former homelands of Transkei and Venda, General Bantu Holomisa and Brigadier Gabriel Ramushwana, who served the apartheid regime faithfully, and who were placed on the ANC electoral list. Tokyo Sexwale, former high-up in the ANC's armed wing, Umkhonto we Sizwe, and implicated in torture of dissidents, is now Premier of the new PWV province around Johannesburg. For her part Winnie Mandela has manoeuvred away from any repercussions over the murders committed by her and her bodyguard of thugs and is now nicely ensconced as deputy minister of arts, culture, science and technology! She has bought a huge mansion in a wealthy part of Cape Town, and the air tickets and luxury accommodation of her gang of thugs are paid for out of taxes. Now, under mass popular pressure, Mandela has been forced to make a statement that he will reduce ministers' salaries.

The first budget passed by the new government retained VAT on basic foodstuffs, which was a great burden for the working class and which the ANC had promised to abolish. Company tax was reduced, despite enterprises like Anglo-American increasing their profits by 23%.

Not only in the workplace and the streets did the working class challenge the old order. The homeless began to act with squatting and occupation of the land. Johannesburg City Council counter-attacked by bulldozing one of the squatter camps on the outskirts of town on the coldest night of the year. The Minister of Housing, Joe Slovo, the strongman white leader of the SACP, condemned land occupations and said that workers' families had to join the housing queues and that squatters were being manipulated by "outside forces"! This statement should be viewed in the light of 1.3 million homeless, massive overcrowding and that fact that the much promised housing programme promised by Slovo has led to one house being built. And this while a massive Olympic stadium is being built in Johannesburg. Some of Slovo's chums in the police came out with the pathetic statement that these squatters' actions were instigated by Nigerian drugs barons!

Unlikely

This brings us to the key component of the electoral package promised by the ANC — the Reconstruction and Development Programme(RDP). This set targets of, for example, one million homes being built, redistributing farmland, providing water and electricity to townships and rural areas over a five-year term. This would cost an estimated R135 billion rather than the R39 billion estimated by the ANC. Considering their promises to the IMF, World Bank, and big business, and the ANC decision not to tax the rich, as well as their pledge to keep State spending in check, these promises seem highly unlikely. Jay Naidoo, ex-COSATU leader and now Minister in charge of the RDP, is urging workers to show restraint and remember the ANC's obligations to the World Bank. At the same time, Joe Modise, ex-guerilla leader and now Minister of Defence, backed up by the former Umkhonto leader Ronnie Kasrils, a leading Stalinist, are urging that the Army should be built up. The budget on security — which includes the Army and police — was increased by 10%, which means that this equals all of the budget set aside for the RDP. Meanwhile Mandela is urging that arms production be increased so that profits can be made from the international arms trade.

This process of sell-out is not confined to the upper echelons of the ANC. Many trade union organisers have been given jobs in personnel management by the bosses, whilst many others have got well-paid jobs in the many government bodies and committees.

The euphoria that brought the ANC to power is evaporating and many working class people, who voted them in, are beginning to question their politics. The Communist Party has suffered as well, with internal dissent and the expulsion of some old-time Stalinists, who didn't want to adapt so readily to the SACP's new tactics. In Natal, Harry Gwala, a local leader, was thrown out of the Party after the election. He had criticised the deal that the ANC and SACP had struck with the right-wing tribalists of Inkatha in Natal. This involved fixing the vote there so that Inkatha got a (false) majority, and then fixing up power-sharing with them in the province. It may well be that the SACP's participation in the government may seriously undermine it. We hope so. The SACP is the last Stalinist Party in the world that was growing and recruiting amongst the working class in the run-up to the election, at a time when all others in the world were disintegrating. The foundering of the SACP could open up the way to working class self-organisation. But capitalism always has one last line of defence to fool the working class — the extreme left. Already several British Trotskyist groups have set up branches of their organisation in South Africa — these include the Socialist Workers' Party, Workers' Press and Militant. All of these groups enthusiastically supported a vote by the black South African working class for the ANC-SACP-COSATU alliance, suddenly discovering after the election that this alliance was betraying the working class. From singing the praises of the ANC to denouncing it was very easy for these slippery advocates of "critical support" for every repressive, anti-working class regime like Iran and Iraq. Total amnesia on supporting a vote for the ANC is now widespread. These outfits are as much capitalist rackets as the ANC and SACP — they wish to come to power at the expense of the working class.

The small numbers of anarchists in South Africa must seriously consider the questions of organisation and strategy. They must orientate themselves to the mass struggles of the black working class — be it in the workplace or in the homeless struggles — and to the construction of a specific anarchist communist organisation. They must clearly and loudly call for the development of a mass movement based on self-organisation. To remain in a self-imposed ghetto now will be a luxury that they will not long be able to afford.

Spread anarchist ideas through the Arab world!

AS WE MENTIONED in Organise! 34 the comrades of Al Badil al Taharrouri in Lebanon have completed the translation into Arabic of Anarchism. This book is considered by many to be the best introduction to class struggle anarchism, and was written by the veteran libertarian communist Daniel Guerin. The translation, with notes by George Saad, has already been processed on a Macintosh, and now the comrades need to pay for the cost of printing. 2,000 copies will be distributed in Lebanon and the other Arab countries whilst another 2,000 will be distributed in Europe amongst Arab workers there. Anyone wishing to make donations to this important project should send IMOs etc made payable to Agora 2000 via BP 177, 75967 Paris cedex 20, France.

Unholy Holy Alliance

THE RECENT UN Population Conference in Cairo highlighted the increasing determination of religious leaders to dictate morality. The Vatican teamed up with the mullahs of Islam in an attempt to squash any move towards making contraception more readily available and to prevent the conference taking a pro-abortion stance.

The conference itself had as its supposed aims the recognition that limited population growth is necessary for economic development and that this must be accompanied by the "empowerment of women". President Clinton said his aim was to make family planning available to every woman in the world by the year 2000.

However, it is doubtful whether western governments are motivated by a genuine concern for the people of the Third World, especially women. Rather, it is a question of the West's fear of the world instability that could result from increases in population in countries that have high levels of poverty. The worry is that the West will be "swamped" by refugees, the number of whom on a world scale has already increased from five to 15 million in the past 15 years. The emphasis on population control is thus a desperate move to contain the problems of poverty within the Third World itself, without the West having to spend much money on aid.

Mutilation

The Muslim countries are aware of the real western motives and Iraq, the Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and the Sudan used this as an excuse to pull out of the conference. However it is a mistake to see this resistance to western interference as progressive in any sense. Their concern to preserve their "cultural and religious identity" is just a way of maintaining values and practices that are some of the most repressive in the world. In the Sudan, genital mutilation of women is still widespread and women in Saudi Arabia may as well not exist in terms of public life. The governments of these Muslim countries' main reason for attacking the conference is their hostility to the idea of "empowering women". They are worried that freely-available contraception will lead to "promiscuity" and the decline of the family, the male-dominated institution that makes sure women are kept in their place. Even Benazir Bhutto, female Prime Minister of Pakistan, who claims to be all in favour of the empowerment of women, does not want this to take place at the expense of the sacredness of life and the family. In other words, no abortion and women can have as much power as their husbands agree to.

Reactionary ideas, however, are not the sole preserve of Islam. Christianity also seems determined to keep women in their place. The Pope has obviously seen the common repressive element in all religions and has formed an unofficial alliance. In June, representatives of the Vatican met with Islamic leaders to discuss the dangers facing modern society: secularism, consumerism and individualism. One would have thought that they would be attacking the money-obsessed consumer society we know as capitalism. But this was not the focus of their discussion. Instead they talked about the decline of the family and sex. In other words, the major danger facing modern society is the attempt by women to have control over their own bodies and to free themselves from a lifetime of devotion to children and husband. This view is reinforced by the need for both religions to keep women producing the "faithful". The new catechism states that any family planning that is not abstinence is evil.

The Pope is joined in the political sphere by the far right parties in Europe. A Catholic party, L'Autre Europe (The Other Europe) in France advocates women returning to the home and forcing all children to have a Catholic education which teaches such values. The Northern League in Italy has many MPs in Parliament, including Irene Pivetti, the first female speaker of the Italian Parliament. They are busy trying to promote "pro-family" policies, using Christian beliefs as justification. (Why aren't these women staying at home, you might ask?)

These developments come on top of increased membership of reactionary evangelical churches in America which have been active for some time, claiming to have been the source of Reagan's victory and subsequent policies. Whatever they call the religion, they all have one thing in common: the determination to impose a "moral order" that they claim comes from God or Allah. However, this "moral order" is remarkably similar to the order of patriarchal class society which is based on domination, obedience and conformity and where the rich have the moral right to rule and where women stay within the prison of the family.

False consciousness

The influence of these religious movements should not be underestimated, especially when they start joining forces. As one of the evangelist leaders in America, Pat Robertson, says, "I am convinced on the political scene that if the evangelical churches, the Roman Catholic churches, the Orthodox Jewish people, all of us work together, we can elect anybody to any office, at any level".

Fundamentalist religious movements continue to grow in the Muslim world as in their Western Christian equivalent. All these right-wing religious movements contain a high proportion of women activists who give the term "false consciousness" a new meaning. These women seem determined to make all women suffer the same fate that they have chosen for themselves; spending their lives as child-bearing assembly lines.

"Family planning is forbidden unless a woman has had so many children that her health is in danger", says the wife of a Gama at al Islamiya member, the Egyptian fundamentalist group.

Resistance

Fortunately, there are signs of resistance to these reactionary, anti-women ideas. The Pope clearly did not have the support of his church members (perhaps the reason he needed to turn to the Muslims for support).

An organisation called Catholics Speak Out collected signatures from Catholics all over the world to protest the Pope's views on birth control. The Vatican was strongly criticised by American Catholics with a leading catholic theologian, Maguire, saying at the conference, "They (the Vatican) have run into a new problem in their lives — an articulate womanhood — and the women here are resisting them stoutly and strongly". The Population Institute estimates that 80% of Catholics ignore the Pope's directives on birth control.

In the Muslim world, the people themselves do not seem to agree with the fundamentalist views on birth control. Bangladesh actively promotes birth control and even in Iran, 65% of married women use contraceptives. There are also signs that Muslim women themselves are organising against those aspects of the religion that oppress women. The Muslim Sisters was founded by three women who were fed up with being harassed by the "moral guards" when they were in their hotel room making plans to set up a rural health care project. They now claim to have support from women throughout the Islamic world and amongst Muslim women in Britain.

However, this resistance is still within the context of religion and so long as the basic premise of these religions, of a "moral order" being imposed by a superior being, is still adhered to, then it will never lead to liberation.

Rejecting only what is seen as the reactionary elements of a religion is like getting out of the prison cell only to remain in the yard.

The growth of interest in religion amongst ordinary people can be seen as a desperate attempt to explain their world and give them hope in a period where nothing else appears to be delivering the goods (Capitalism, "communism", democracy, science and technology). Many are rejecting the old order, but instead of creating their own order, they attach themselves to another set of beliefs imposed from outside, that controls and dominates their lives. The only true "moral order" is one that is created by ourselves, based on equality, freedom and solidarity. This can only be done by rejecting the shackles of religion.

Free Leonard Peltier

LEONARD PELTIER, a Lakota-Chippewa Indian, has served 18 years of two life sentences, after a frame-up conviction for the shooting to death of two FBI agents.

The agents were part of a massive military-type raid on Pine Ridge Indian Reservation on June 26, 1975. That infamous attack, documented in the video, Incident at Oglala, was the culmination of two years of a virtual war on American Indian Movement for their defence of Indian lands and culture.

There is overwhelming evidence of an FBI cover-up and the fabrication of evidence in order to get a conviction of Peltier. He was accused of killing two FBI agents, although there is evidence the two were killed by FBI bullets. Peltier's last hearing was Nov 9, 1992 before the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. At that appeal, US prosecutor admitted, "We don't know who killed the agents". The appeal was denied. Over 25 million signatures from around the world have been collected calling for a new trial. Petitions won't free Peltier. There needs to be an active movement around the world that mobilises as many people as possible to demand his release.

Haiti — The American peace-keepers strike again

THE AMERICAN ruling class pick a hopefully easy prey for military muscle flexing after their tarnished reputation from intervention in Somalia.

Yet again the hawks in the Pentagon need to throw their weight around. The economic blockade that was implemented to punish the military regime of Cedras exacerbated the situation there and forced many poor and starving Haitians to flee to the US, thereby putting pressure on the Clinton administration to intervene. Clinton needs to stop refugees seeking asylum in Florida, and, he hopes, placate the right wing. He is already forcibly sending refugees back from the Guantanamo US base in Cuba where they fled to Port-au-Prince. But the Clinton administration knows that this is not enough, and the situation in Haiti must be "stabilised" to cut off the flow of refugees. This was one of the reasons for military intervention — not some deep love of "democracy". The generals who overthrow Aristide were allowed free rein in Haiti for three years before this.

Aristide was elected on a reform programme and the USA fears that if this is implemented it will encourage the masses in Haiti to take action against the local ruling class. Aristide has to be kept under control. The CIA had characterised him as a dangerous radical, starting off a smear campaign in which he was called a "psychotic manic-depressive with homicidal and necrophilic tendencies". He is mistrusted by many of the US ruling class. The Clinton administration believes that he can be easily handled. They are prepared to put him back in power in order to keep the Haitian masses quiet. They realise there may be a danger of things getting out of control if expectations are high and the Haitian ruling class is attacked.

Opportunity

Haitian working people used the opportunity of the US invasion to rush onto the streets and attack Cedras' police and soldiers, exacting revenge and seizing weapons. At first some of these were handed over to the US marines, but now many are being kept. Aristide issued an appeal asking that both Cedras' thugs and the masses hand over their weapons to the occupying troops. He is also prepared, under US pressure, to give an amnesty to Cedras and his gang, a gang which tortured and murdered thousands.

The US faces many problems with Haiti, just as it did with Somalia. Support for intervention in Haiti has not received popular support, despite a constant barrage of propaganda on American television. The US marines have the task of both controlling the Cedras mobsters and making sure that the popular revolt does not race out of control. Behind Cedras are a tiny and very wealthy minority who live in spectacular opulence at the expense of the majority who face extreme hardship. The masses may well decide to sweep them away as well. Once again the USA may be bogged down in another country they have invaded. From Somalia to Haiti, and perhaps again soon in the Gulf, they may find that it is not such a cushy number being the world's policeman. In this power-game it will be the working class in Haiti and US soldiers who will suffer the consequences.

Organising in the workplace — beyond rank and filism

Day school jointly organised by the Anarchist Communist Federation and Subversion. 11-5pm, Sunday November 6, Conway Hall, Red Lion Square, London WC1 (nearest tube Holborn)

This day school continues the one we jointly organised with Subversion in Manchester last year. We hope to continue the interesting and stimulating discussions we had there, and talk about practical possibilities of organising. Info from London address.

Western Toxic Wastes Arrive in Russia

THOUSANDS OF TONS of hazardous wastes from Germany and France are being transported by train to the settlement of Svetlyi in the Orenburg region, according to a report from Moscow, received 15.03.94.

The wastes have been declared as raw materials for production of cobalt and nickel, though in fact they contain poisonous substances, including cadmium (8-10%), thallium (2-3%), selenium, germanium and arsenic — substances which may cause intestinal colic, acute kidney insufficiency and other potentially-fatal diseases.

According to Greenpeace Russia, five wagons loaded with Australian wastes are also being transported to Stavropol Krai.

In all, during the months following the publication of special GP report Russia: making a Waste Colony, there have been revealed more than 17 schemes to export Western waste to Russia.

Taking the hazardous waste of other nations has always, of course, been a source of income for poorer countries (there are many such in Africa), irresponsibly greedy governments (such as the UK), and governments which have traditionally shown a callous disregard for the well-being of the majority of their peoples (such as South Africa). Russia, with Eastern Europe — is already heavily polluted by 70 years of mismanaged industrialisation.

PEDESTRIAN PROBLEM

IN THIS ARTICLE we look at the problem of motor danger and false solutions to it. Next issue we conclude this series on traffic by looking at Green Cars, Public Transport and opposition to Motorisation.

The Road Safety Myth

Until the 1930s road safety was seen as a problem caused by motorists. Private car drivers were a minority — more mileage was covered, and more journeys made, by bike. In 1935, after agitation by cycling organisations, rail unions and the newly-formed Pedestrian Association for Road Safety, legislation such as the driving test was brought in to control the danger. Road safety ideas were brought in, centred around education, engineering and enforcement. Ever since "road safety" has been the territory of professionals such as road safety officers, road and vehicle engineers, traffic police, doctors, lawyers and the Department of Transport. The road safety lobby (RSC) has succeeded in suppressing the earlier anger and hostility against motorisation by legitimising the danger it creates. Generally people's anger following an "accident" to a pedestrian is directed on the behaviour of a deviant minority (eg speeding drivers) rather than car use in general. The lobby maintain (with the support of official figures) that accidents — injuries and deaths — have decreased and so roads are "safer". The official accident figures are too low however: accidents are under-reported (due to police and hospital methodology, for reasons of insurance claims etc). The majority of accidents (80-95%) are excluded from these statistics on the grounds that they are "damage only". Accidents have also decreased because vulnerable road users have stayed out of the way as danger has increased. Between 1955 and 1990 the chances of 10-14 year olds being killed on the roads nearly doubled; a half of male deaths for 15-19 year olds are from motor vehicles. The DoT makes the reduction of perceived risk secondary to casualty reduction in order to continue with its programme of motorisation: reducing the safety of the environment for the pedestrian. It implies that no-one is responsible, and that "unforeseen circumstances" are to blame.

Because of their pro-car bias, many "road safety" measures in fact produce the opposite effect — "Everything that supposedly produces more danger in fact produces more safety...and everything that is supposed to produce more safety produces more danger...Better roads, better sight lines, fewer bends and blind corners, less traffic; better lighting, better weather conditions...make greater danger...because every "non-restrictive" safety measure, however admirable by itself, is treated by drivers as an opportunity for more speeding, so that the net amount of danger is increased".

The RSL method is to use excessive detail; divide and rule (eg talk separately of "pedestrian safety", "cycle safety" and "the older road user" and portray an illusion of objectivity to obscure the central facts of danger on the road. Cost Benefit Analysis (CBA) is an increasingly popular lobby method. The official text on CBA for road casualties is The value of life and safety: a search for a consensus estimate. There cannot and should not be a monetary value on life, and life and safety are not only different, but often mutually opposed. The real cost of motorisation is at least £30 billion more than motorists pay. CBA costing includes congestion, accidents, road-building and maintenance; it excludes the loss of revenue to public transport, stress, air pollution, noise, children's escort time, and space (taken up on roads, in garages etc). CBA is only used to give a pseudo-scientific gloss to Department of Transport (DoT) places. The health disbenefits of mass car use (asthma, bronchitis, cancers, coronary problems, stress, social isolation, global warming etc) probably dwarf the numbers injured and killed on roads; they are not included in RS research and discussion. The rules of the game are biased against those most affected, who are also of course the worst off. CBA considers people as consumers, individuals whose power is determined by their income, rather than as political subjects. Although speed is a major cause of accidents, and creates worse injuries and a greater likelihood of death, the DoT regards speed reduction as bad. For them it creates frustrated motorists who act "aggressively and irresponsibly". Pedestrians too:

"May take liberties with slow-moving traffic that they would not take with faster traffic. A mother who would never dream of wheeling her pushchair across an urban freeway may be tempted to do just that in a city street".

What a cheek — a pedestrian trying to cross the road!

The department's national campaign in the winter of 1989 was a typical exercise in blaming the vulnerable, those on the receiving end of "accidents", rather than those responsible. Cyclists and pedestrians not wearing reflective or fluorescent clothing were "dimwits" — equally responsible for accidents as those in charge of powerful and dangerous machinery. There is little evidence that such "aids to conspicuousness" are beneficial. Also ignored is the evidence of voluntary tests and police surveys, which show that between one and two million motorists would fail the existing eyesight test. New findings also suggest that 20% of drivers suffer from night blindness. Similarly, Texaco's "Care on the Road" campaign (1992) tried to shift responsibility for "being seen" further away from drivers onto children; and BP Oil's recent campaign to get them young was called "Living with Traffic" (sic). Yet the evidence of children's behaviour in traffic suggests that it is they who anticipate danger and behave responsibly, not the drivers.

The DoT's motor bias leads it to stand truth on its head maintaining for example that:

"Travelling by car or bus is safer than walking"

Safer for whom? In 1990, three other road users were killed in accidents involving pedestrians; 1,014 pedestrians were killed by cars. Those who are the most vulnerable to danger are the least dangerous themselves. The introduction of compulsory seat belt legislation played a central role in legitimising the road safety lobby — yet evidence suggests it led to a lower level of care by motorists and therefore more danger for the vulnerable. In the two years following compulsion, pedestrian fatalities increased 14%; cyclist fatalities by 40% and rear seat passenger facilities by 27%.

Safety: False Solutions

Segregation is one method; it aims to reduce danger to vulnerable road users by minimising the possibilities of confrontation with motorists. This means footways and pedestrianisation for walkers; bike paths and lanes for cyclists (ironically, motorways in Britain started as a means of segregating the motor danger posed by cars). Experience shows however, that the only road-user groups to gain substantially from segregation are car and lorry drivers. This is because of the motor bias of the DoT (eg although most accidents to cyclists occur at junctions, motorists turning left have priority over cyclists in bike lanes). Equally important is the power dynamic of motorisation — cars have an immense greed for space, and the threat of danger and other motor problems tend to expand to nullify all but the most radical (total) safety strategies for pedestrians and cyclists.

Most cycling and walking, especially in rural areas, has to be unsegregated. Footways need to be protected from parked or moving cars (one third of "accidents" to walkers occur on the pavement). This can only be done by continuous barriers which prevent convenient crossing for those on foot. Footway space is constantly under threat/disappearing. Subways are rightly hated for their real and perceived danger. Visibility and surveillance are usually poor, and they are often badly maintained. Their steps are a particular problem for children and their carers, the elderly and people with disabilities. Even where they are well lit and populated (eg Birmingham City Centre) they put people in an unsatisfactory subterranean environment. Foot-bridges suffer similar disadvantages with the addition of "heights". Pedestrian areas can be found in most central urban areas. They are a form of segregation for walkers. There are however, problems of access for the disabled and they can generate additional traffic in adjoining areas. These inner city areas are also atypical of most areas where people walk.

For cyclists, there is insufficient space for continuous cycle tracks or lanes. Junctions are dangerous (as noted earlier) and they have an inferior status: often blocked by cars, and badly maintained — making them worse than nothing. The post-war British new towns, such as Stevenage and Peterborough, have a segregated network of cycle and pedestrian paths. This is inappropriate to older towns and rural areas where distances are too long to walk, the environment is isolating and dangerous, and there are obstacles to public transport and other problems caused by motorisation. Even an extensive programme of cycle routes such as the GLC's proposed 1,000 mile network of the 1980's would have left 93% of London's roads without cycle routes, all with homes, shops, workplaces and other destinations on them.

Off road routes (eg Bath-Bristol pedestrian and cycle path) have been built on old railway sites, canal towpaths, bridleways and forest roads. They are very limited in availability and prone to appropriation by more space-hungry and powerful forms of transport. Cycle routes using side streets are also very limited in scope.

Traffic calming is another approach. It developed from pedestrianisation, environmental areas and the Dutch "woonervon" ("play streets" where the footway/road boundary is dissolved). Road humps, traffic islands and footway extensions are used to restrict speed; extend space for walkers/cyclists, children's play etc; and create a more human environment. Most roads are not traffic-calmed however, even where it is fashionable. Officially, 80% of urban roads could be, but only a tiny minority are likely to be treated (and the effectiveness of TC is questionable). The average cost is £40,000 per square kilometre, ie £4.8 billion, which would take 57 years to complete. Limited TC can provide car parking space and be used as a bargaining counter or palliative by the road lobby. It cannot tackle the motor danger posed by rural roads. There is also the problem that danger could increase as motorists emerge from traffic-calmed areas, relax and increase their speed.

Problem of Power

We can see that "road safety" is a road lobby smokescreen to divert people from addressing the root of the problem — power. The power dynamic of motorisation with its social effects of fear, retreat and isolation, ill-health, injury and death; the power of the road lobby (large sections of the ruling class — the state, media, road safety lobby, oil/car/construction companies etc). The road lobby causes the motorisation problem, then defines how it is discussed through the "road safety" myth — thus its "solutions" prevail: keep pedestrians and cyclists out of the way, build "safer cars" (safer for drivers, more dangerous for everyone else), and build more roads.

The Red Hot Anarchistic Communistic Scorcher Column

THE PIGS of V Unit (Special Police Group) have been testing out new and nasty cuffs on protesters against Faslane Peace Camp in Scotland. These are chainless, all-in-one metal cuffs which restrict movement and punish by cutting into the wrists. When asked why they were using the cuffs, one of the scum replied that "We are testing them out on you". The rest of us had better watch out — we're next.

DEPARTMENT of Transport pondscum spent £250,000 to employ private eyes to harass Twyford Down protesters. This sum could reach £350,000 by the end of the year. They signed a contract with Bray's Detective Agency in Southampton in 1992. Result: eight jail sentences and 54 summonses.

WHEN THE newly-elected Labour council in Camden came to power earlier this year they immediately set up plans to sack all council staff and re-employ them on new contracts. Already 43 caretakers have been sacked, and now over the next three years Camden plans to open up council departments to "competitive tendering". Did you really think there was any difference between Labour and Tory scum-bags? Wise up!

THE MINISTRY of Defence spent over £800 million on four diesel subs which they then promptly flogged to Pakistan for £400 million. They also managed to up the bill on Trident subs by an extra £800 million. Of course the protozoan life form Rifkind sent plenty of this business to firms like Tarmac, who finance the Conservatives heavily.

TALKING ABOUT protozoan life-forms, remember all the paeans of praise when top parasite Nixon croaked recently. A quick rehabilitation for a top crook, who bombed Cambodia to smithereens and thus helped Pol Pot come to power; who was an eager lieutenant of witch-hunter McCarthy in the 50s; who authorised burglary and bugging; who vindictively tore up a White House tennis court because Cabinet members wouldn't back him on Cambodia; who regularly came out with anti-semitic and anti-black remarks; who sent private eyes to Paris to spy on Teddy Kennedy to catch him fornicating — the list is endless. Yet you couldn't open a newspaper without reading eulogies about him. A good indicator of the morality of the low-life who rule us.

Anarchy in the UK — A look at the British Anarchist Movement

ANARCHISM HAS WEAK roots in Britain, with no strong tradition in the working class. This lack of a base within the class has made it difficult for British Anarchists to achieve their aims and also given British Anarchism its own peculiar character.

Today, most of those in Britain who would call themselves anarchists seem to base their anarchism on a tradition dating back to youthful rebellion in the '60s rather than the tradition of revolution with its roots in the first International Workers' Association of the 19th century.

A strong anti-organisational and anti-theoretical current runs through much of the anarchist movement, which severely hinders effective activity. Lack of theory and class-based analysis means all manner of liberal and leftist ideas can be found under the label of anarchism.

Pacifism is a hardy perennial liable to spring up in times of struggle. The moralistic preaching of those who believe only in non-violent action can often be heard by the careless listener. Obviously, non-violence is often a useful tactic, but it should never be allowed to become a principle. It's going to take a lot more than moral pressure to bring down the ruling class. Those who spout "fluffy" nonsense about the police being "human beings too" and believe that protesters should lie down and form a doormat in front of riot cops can only be a hindrance to the revolutionary movement.

Hobby

Conversely, militant anti-fascism also has strong anarchist support. Now, whilst beating up fascist boneheads might be a worthwhile hobby, we should never forget just how reactionary popular fronts against fascism can and have been; eg the Popular Front government in Spain destroyed the revolution there long before Franco's fascists could. None of the anti-fascist/racist groups in Britain have moved beyond this leftist ideology.

For other issues of importance to revolutionaries, such as the trade union question and the situation in Ireland, many anarchists seem unwilling to develop a revolutionary critique and are content to tail-end the Leninist left. The historical experience of the workers' councils has also passed many people by.

The phobia of organisation compounds these problems. Most British anarchists don't belong to any formal organisation, local or national. Not belonging to an anarchist organisation hampers people's theoretical development as they have no regular contact with like-minded individuals to discuss current issues with, or to learn from other comrades' past experience.

The lack of organisation also means that when struggles arise ad-hoc networks have to be set up as a reaction to local or world events. Such loose networks do serve a useful purpose but quickly fall apart as struggles end, leaving no long-term benefits. Attempts to create permanent networks of the various anarchist groups, such as the Class Struggle Anarchist Network, have so far proved unsuccessful. Few people are prepared to make supporting a loose network one of their priorities and instead people direct most of their energy elsewhere.

In terms of activity such as regularly producing papers, attending demonstrations and organising meetings, etc, it is the national organisations which are best at putting the case for anarchism, though some local groups also do very good work. At present there are two national anarchist organisations — aside from the ACF there is the anarcho-syndicalist Solidarity Federation, and there is also the Class War Federation made up of anarchists, libertarian marxists and others.

Whilst we in the ACF have major political differences with both these organisations, sectarian bickering is a luxury we cannot afford. Another group worthy of mention are the libertarian communists of Subversion. Though they reject both the Marxist and anarchist traditions they are undoubtedly revolutionaries and we continue to work closely with them.

Milieu

On the fringes of the anarchist movement is the ultra-Left "milieu" made up of people who for the most part believe in one of the variants of ultra-left marxism, ie council communism/situationism/autonomism.

Whilst these people don't suffer from the low level of theoretical development endemic in in British anarchism, they are even worse at organising for activity, preferring to remain in tiny politically-pure groups. The Brighton-based group Aufheben is attempting to create an alliance of these groups, but so far with little successs.

It seems to me that if British anarchism is to grow then anarchists need to take their task more seriously. People should get active in their local group if one exists, or, if not, try to set one up. They should actively develop their theoretical level by reading and discussing about contemporary and historical events. See what the anarchist/libertarian journals have to say on these issues and consider who they agree with most. Serious thought should also be given to joining one of the national organisations. This does not mean abandoning political freedom in favour of stale dogmatism — it's far more likely to mean abandoning idle inactivity in favour of lively ideas and action.

The Friends of Durruti

London ACF have produced a pamphlet on the Friends of Durruti, a much misunderstood group that attempted to defend and extend the Spanish Revolution of 1936. In their criticisms of the leadership of the anarcho-syndicalist unions they represented an important moment in anarchist history. Included are an historical introduction written by an ACF member, and two political statements from the Friends themselves. This will be the first in a series of pamphlets in the Stormy Petrel series. Coming up will be a pamphlet on the Italian Factory Councils of 1920-21.

Copies of the Friends of Durruti pamphlet available from ACF (London) c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1 at 75p including postage.

BLUE CHRISTMAS

TRADITIONALLY, CHRISTMAS BEGINS in Britain in September. We know that the festive season has begun because a new round of Harvey's Bristol Cream sherry advertisements are shown on television. And this year was no exception. Close on the heels of the drinks adverts come those for toys, and when the season is in full swing, we are entertained to the strains of "We Wish You a Merry Xmas" in the promotion of Quality Street chocolates.

This is not the place, obviously, to bemoan the loss of the Christian festival. Insofar as December 25th occurs near the shortest day of the year in terms of daylight, there is plenty of cause to brighten up our lives with some winter festivities. After all, the Christians nicked it from the pagans, who made having a good time a cardinal principle of life. So why shouldn't we Anarchists who are committed to the idea of having one life (ever) have a little pleasure around that time of year too? The problem is that in capitalist Britain the campaign to promote the "feel good factor" is just part of a continual process of propaganda designed to preserve stability, and make lots of money.

Let's take the first bit first. The very certainty that Xmas comes but once a year and has done for about 2,000 years, reinforces the idea that somehow the existing order is the natural order. Church and the State unite to emphasise the unchanging nature of things and with that, the inevitability of class domination.

This is reinforced by emphasising the cosy, warm sense of well-being associated with the nuclear family. The nonsense of the Virgin Birth in which father, mother and baby are united, has been promoted by our rulers in conjunction with the Church for centuries. Though God is the "real" father, it is Joseph who completes the family unit, alongside Mary and Jesus. This message has become more urgent in recent years given the virtual collapse of the nuclear family and the rise of voluntary single motherhood.

The idea of the happy family is also pushed every year by the great mother herself, the Queen. This multi-millionaire invades our space every Christmas day, though how many people actually switch off at this point is unknown. Viewing figures are never published. Nevertheless, enough people presumably do watch this annual farce and are comforted by her talk of the great British family. Class divisions and poverty are made to disappear, if only for ten minutes.

Christmas for millions of people is in fact a complete misery. Given the massive promotion through advertisements for gifts of all sorts, the poor are forced into impossible dilemmas. Poor parents, in particular, run up crushing debts in order to try and meet some of the expectations which advertisers stir up in their children. The targeting of children in the pursuit of profit is given legitimacy by the ideological cover previously alluded to. Poor working class families spend the six months following Christmas paying off the inflated prices of presents bought from mail order catalogues. They either go short for half the year, or shift their debts to other areas such as the rent.

Christmas for elderly working class people who have been reduced to destitution, for the unemployed and homeless, is a time of great distress. Charities, collections for programmes like Blue Peter, etc, do nothing to alter this, though they make philanthropy an outlet for guilt...while someone freezes in a ditch. Have a merry Christmas.

Jean Vigo — Nought For Conduct!

JEAN VIGO, son of the anarchist Miguel Almereyda (editor of Le Libertaire), and of his companion, Emily, herself a militant, was born in poverty in 1905 in Paris. As he grew up, his playground was often the exercise yard of the prison where his father spent many sentences thanks to his revolutionary ideas.

In 1917 Almereyda, now director of the paper Le Bonnet Rouge which campaigned against the World War, was arrested on the orders of President Clemenceau and banged up at Fresnes prison. Several days later he was discovered strangled by a shoelace. He was 37 years old. By then he had moved away from anarchism to a belief that all the socialist groups should be united in one organisation. He had also been tainted by allegations of receiving bribes. As the writer and activist Victor Serge noted: "The graph of his destiny had started from the Paris underworld, had mounted to a climax of revolutionary pugnacity, and was now tailing off in corruption, among the money-bags".

Jean, the "son of the traitor" passed his childhood in colleges at Nimes and Millau. The memory of his father, and the long years of boarding school, developed an anger against the system and a wild imagination shot through with irony, expressions of a rage to live. It was in the cinema that he realised this imagination.

His first film of 1929 A propos de Nice was very much a social film, contrasting the rich parasites of the Promenade des Anglais and the poor neighbourhoods of old Nice, and with a strong anti-militarist and anti-clerical flavour. At around this time he joined the Association des Ecrivains et des Artistes Revolutionnaires (Association of Revolutionary Writers and Artists). His next film Zero de Conduite (Nought for Conduct) gave plenty of room for his savage and anti-authoritarian sense of humour. In this portrayal of a boarding school and the revolt of the school students with which the film ends, Vigo spares no-one — neither the school functionaries nor the officials, the parents or the children. For the first time on screen children are shown breaking all conventions. Not for them the "innocence" and "purity" of childhood, but unfettered rebellion. This film, with lyrical scenes of revolt, drew the anger of bourgeois society. The film was banned soon after it appeared in August 1933. The "Organised Fathers of The Family" started a massive campaign to ban it, and Vigo was called "anti-French".

Vigo's next film, L'Atalante, developed the other side of his outlook. On one hand the spirit of revolt, the lack of illusions in present society, as well as a certain pessimism, and now to be more fully exposed, Vigo's appreciation of the passing beauties of life and the fleeting joys and happiness in it. In this film, about the motley collection of people living and working on a barge on the Seine, Vigo retains his harsh portrayal of life in present-day society. People are portrayed as behaving mechanically, as in the marriage scene, and the actions of the employers. In one scene, a mob of well-fed bourgeois lynch a starving thief. Here Vigo draws on his acquaintance with the social drawings of pre-World War anarchist illustrators like Steinlen, Grandjouan and Gassier. But this mechanisation of personalities is limited to the scenes on land — the scenes representing society. On board the barge is a microcosm of purity, of happiness and of fraternity. On the barge each works for all and all work for one.

Vigo's development of an optimistic social theme and vision of a future society were to be cut short by his premature death on 5 October 1934 at the age of 29. He died of under-nourishment and overwork, which left him open to a fatal attack of septicaemia. This son of anarchists carried his parents' work on in his own way and he too was to fall victim to a cruel and repressive society.

Vigo's two main films have been recently restored to their former length and have been doing a circuit of the "art house" cinemas. They have been affected by the passage of time and sometimes viewing them is difficult — the feeling of datedness is strong. Nevertheless, it is worth seeing for the best moments. Zero de Conduite is being shown at the London Filmmakers Coop, 8pm Friday October 21st at 42 Gloucester Avenue, London NW1 as part of the 10 Days of Anarchy event. On the bill with it is If, directed by the late Lindsay Anderson, and heavily influenced by it. (Interestingly, the scriptwriter of If, David Sherwin, admitted that his great hero was Nestor Makhno, the Ukrainian Anarchist revolutionary.)

DEAR FRIENDS,

Please find enclosed a response to one of your articles which was excellent!

I wholeheartedly agree with the views expressed in issue 34 in the article NATFHE sabotage. It is a disgrace that a trade union is seeking to collaborate in a deterioration of working practices which will lead to a decline in the real quality of further education. They are accomplices to this capitalist government. In covering up the real figures about unemployment the government is persuading young adults to go into FE. They are given fairy tale career guidance eg "take a course and then you will get a job and live happily ever after". It is not publicised that graduates have the highest rate of unemployment and it is forgotten that many young people no longer want to study. They just want a proper job. Being working class, the young adults are not likely to complain about the real quality of their courses. The reality being that class sizes are being increased — doubled where room space permits. Walls are being demolished to create larger rooms. The actual hours students are able to have contact with lecturers is being reduced. Students are given "self-directed study time", which means go to the library or go home. The real reason has nothing to do with education, it means the lecturer can teach more groups of larger sizes. If you are on a course you may get to the end of the year without the lecturer knowing your name. The government has pulled a clever three card trick: 1) Conning the youngsters that they are doing something for a career. The government hopes they won't realise that there are no jobs for them at the end of their study. It also reduces the likelihood of subversive activity to undermine the system. 2) It keeps the already-fiddled unemployment figures down and is good for propaganda, eg: "more and more young people are entering FE". 3) By cutting costs in FE redundancies and increasing staff hours, it saves money. College managements sired with the Thatcher mentality are implementing state policies whilst receiving fat salaries paid for by higher enrolment fees. They regard their staff as "the enemy" and have no regard for the students other than making sure their numbers increase. American-style semester systems, alien to Britain, are being introduced, along with meaningless mission statements and even more meaningless slogans such as "progress to succeed" or "committed to quality". They are adapting the marketing methods of double-glazing salespeople in their desperation to achieve targets. The real victims are the young people. There are no jobs at the end, grants are slashed when they are half way through the course. Most have part-time, low-paid jobs to help them through the course. Some are even encouraged to continue studying and to take further courses which lead to greater debts. The prospects for a job are no better. No doubt the state has calculated that it is cheaper to push young adults into FE than pay out social security. They see FE as a pre-dole creche, custodial training and educational conscription. Many thanks and best wishes,

G.H. (Canterbury)

DEAR ACF,

I refer to your article "The Mythology of Nationalism" in the April/June issue of Organise!. I found it interesting to be reminded of the various invasions of Ireland in the past, by the Firbolg, Picts, Cruthins, Celts, etc. I also agree that nationalism is pro-capitalist. However, a few points made towards the end of the article I strongly disagreed with. Firstly, despite the fact that Ireland has been invaded by many different tribes, this is completely irrelevant to the war in the six counties. All of Europe has had various tribes wandering around raping and pillaging in the distant past, but this does not mean that they have soldiers on the streets today. The one invasion that is relevant is the British invasion. That is because the British state still occupies the six counties in the north of Ireland. The six counties, like Hong Kong and the Falklands, is still a colony of Britain. It is claimed in the article that the war in the six counties is not a colonial war. It could not be anything else but that. On one side you have the nationalists fighting to end the occupation of their country by a foreign power. On the other side you have foreign rulers controlling violent oppression by an army, and an armed and politically-motivated police force operating alongside death squads who eliminate those who oppose them. What could more typically be a colonial war than that? It is extremely important for anarchists in Britain to recognise the existence of British imperialism and to fight against it. The British state is able to do things that most capitalist states would not be able to do in their wildest dreams. Club Britain is one of the most powerful states in the world. It is in the G7 and the security council of the UN. Not only does it directly occupy its own colonies, but it is able to intervene militarily along with the other imperialist powers in "independent" countries throughout the world. The British state, when helping the USA, was able to bomb Libya with impunity. It took part in the Gulf War and killed 200,000 civilians and conscripts who had already surrendered. It, with the UN security council, still operates an embargo, even denying medical aid which is killing the poor of Iraq in their thousands. It is able to send the SAS to train Pol Pot and arm him with mines in Cambodia, and supply the Indonesian state with warplanes so they could slaughter the people of East Timor. Its army operates throughout the world, suppressing whole nations of people in the name of the national interest, which means higher profits for the British ruling class. Apart from military intervention, Britain along with fellow imperialists: USA, Japan, China, Russia, France and Germany is able to exploit economically the rest of the world, using various institutions such as the World Bank and IMF and trading treaties such as GATT. The British ruling class is able to assert its own will on countries throughout the world. The media and politicians are always claiming that it is in the interests of the British working class to support global domination and the role of "world policeman". We must expose that lie. We must be clear that Britain has no right to impose its will on other countries, and that it is not in the interests of the British workers to support the oppression of other workers. As far as the six counties go, anarchists should be fighting for the uniting of Catholic and Protestant workers. We should be arguing for the end to the partition of Ireland because it divides the working class of Ireland and we should be fighting for an Anarchist Republic. But most importantly whenever Northern Ireland is brought up we should make it clear that the reason for the problems of the North is because of British Imperialism, and the only solution can start with their withdrawal.

yours for anarchism
A.B. (London N17)

EDS. REPLY: History moves very fast, and we feel the British State is ready to jettison the six counties (see our article elsewhere) rather than maintain its costly military occupation. Of course we are in favour of British military withdrawal, we always have been, but we feel that calling for an end to partition must be unambiguous. Reunification with the South, still completely incorporated within world capitalism, would not in itself be an advance. Yes, unity between Catholic and Protestant workers, a very difficult task, must be fought for, and must be on the basis of opposition to all capitalist states, even if they drape themselves in green and summon up the mystical Republic.

Anarchist Communism

ANARCHIST COMMUNISM IS a distinct body of social and political ideas. Anarchist communism offers a radical alternative to the statist belief systems which have proved their bankruptcy in the twentieth century.

Marxism in both its Bolshevik and social-democratic varieties has proved a disastrous failure. Reformist feminism has made women bosses and prime ministers, but has left the majority of women still tied to the family and in low-paid jobs. Ideologies based upon capitalism, eg fascism and liberal democracy, were either blatantly murderous or hypocritically so. Only anarchist communism remains to be tested as a fully coherent approach to organising the world. As the second millennium draws to a close, its latter century has seen the almost-unrestrained rise of the state and with it virtually continuous warfare — plunder dressed up as the "global economy" and ecological devastation. The people of the world in the next century deserve much more than has been available to the great majority so far. The rise of capitalism, the technological state and imperialism have eliminated the human factor from social life. The individual in the advanced industrialised state has been removed from the community and isolated into concrete boxes, with television as the main link to the world outside. The poor majority in Africa, Latin America and Asia struggle to survive as their way of life is increasingly dictated by the needs of the insatiable global economy, with their own elites encouraging and benefiting from this exploitation. Racism and nationalism are if anything stronger, stirred up by various elements in the ruling class and taken up by many people in the working class as they see can see no other answer to their problems. Women are under attack world-wide with the rise of religious fundamentalism and the generalised obsession with the "decline of the family" and "moral values".

Anarchist communism is the alternative. It places the individual at the centre of its approach, for only active, thinking persons can ever be free. However, the individual does not exist separated from the rest of humanity. Capitalist exploitation whilst destroying "natural" communities has created and is creating social solidarity on the basis of class identity and reality, where people choose to identify with each other rather than being forced into a community because of tradition. The ruling classes of the world are waging a desperate class war against the numerically-vast population of workers and peasants. In the search for profits the producing classes are subject to ever-more savage assaults. But it is out of this struggle between exploiter and exploited, between the oppressors and the oppressed, that the mass of the population will achieve the realisation of human freedom. Social revolution is the only way of achieving liberation.

Anarchist communism is often attacked as being a utopian dream since it is both anti-capitalist and anti-state. The argument goes that both of these are necessary because of "human nature". Won't new forms of exploitation and new classes arise? Isn't it inevitable that some people have more power than others? Isn't the state necessary to keep order? We say a loud "no!" to these arguments.

Within the general context of a stateless and moneyless society, the new social order will operate through a building of community ties and along with them the creation of bodies which will be expressions of individual and community desires. There is no antagonism here between the individual and the collective for two reasons. Firstly, the individual belongs and survives within the context of the collective, so the workers and community councils as the new forms of administration will be an extension of the individual within society. Secondly, the workers and community councils (which need not necessarily be separate bodies) will have built into them a number of devices preventing the abuse of power. For example, they will be assemblies of the people themselves and should any form of delegation be necessary then the delegates will be directly elected, easily-removable and temporary.

Also, given the development of communications technology, mass participation, either within a popular assembly or via link-ups of local groups and individuals, will be possible. The assemblies at the local, district, regional and international levels will be able to plan for the future on the basis of input from participation at various stages of the peoples' assemblies. Given that there is no coercive state apparatus to enforce decisions made within the various popular organisations, there will be no physical imposing of undesirable options. The aim throughout will be to achieve results on the basis of consensus and compromise.

Anarchist communist society will be a moneyless society. Goods and services will be made available on the basis of needs. There is a limit to the number of fridges, carpets etc that people can consume, and given the downgrading of possessiveness, the inability to accumulate wealth through the amassing of possessions, the absence of advertising, and education for sharing, there will be a limit to the demand. One of the functions of money is to act as a "store of value". This allows individuals in capitalist societies to accumulate enormous sums, well in excess of what they can ever spend. In a moneyless society there is no means of accumulating wealth, thus creating another obstacle to the reemergence of a ruling class.

It may be objected that this basis of social organisation is fine for local village-sized populations but is unworkable on a larger scale. However, there is no reason why it could not operate on a larger scale if it is based on the principles of voluntary cooperation and federation which would still allow for freedom and solidarity. Even within capitalism, when examined, huge organisations and corporations are little more than conglomerations of small groups organised within a given managerial structure. Local, small-scale efforts are channelled in a particular direction. There is no reason why those efforts could not be channelled voluntarily for the common and individual good, with the impetus coming from below.

For an anarchist communist society to operate effectively, education in the widest sense must prioritise a socialisation process which stresses personal growth, a love of freedom together with a sense of responsibility and solidarity. Subtle Capitalist education has effectively gained an acceptance amongst most of the population of the system that exploits them through a subtle process of brainwashing and a distortion of the natural tendency towards social solidarity by stressing patriotism, nationalism and loyalty to the company. An anarchist communist approach to education would allow the natural tendencies to develop so that individuals would be able effectively to participate in the new society with confidence and responsibility.

Most other ideologies aim to dominate and control nature and indeed the last two centuries have witnessed a total transformation of the natural world as it has been twisted and distorted to fit the supposed needs of human beings. Now, nature is giving its reply, to such an extent that the very existence of humanity is threatened. Anarchist communism seeks to work in harmony with natural forces, utilising appropriate levels of technology to meet people's needs. There are enough resources on the planet to provide a living for all, without destroying the planet in the process.

Anarchist communism is the only ideology which challenges all exploitation and oppression, whether it be of workers by the bosses, women by men or the environment by human beings. It alone emphasises both freedom of the individual and solidarity within the community and struggles for a society which is free of both economic exploitation and the oppressive state. Anarchist communism alone can point the way forward to survival and well-being.

Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists.
We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.
2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class. Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.
3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.
4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.
5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.
6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.
7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc).
Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.
8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution.
In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.
9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation.
We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method.
We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise ourselves on a federative basis.
We reject sectarianism and work for a united, revolutionary anarchist movement.

Editorial

A new year comes and we seem no nearer to revolutionary change.

The war continues in ex-Yugoslavia, and now Russia re-asserts its dominance over the regions it controls with its attack on Chechnya. Yeltsin and his followers intend to show that no region can secede from Russia without the full military might of the regime being unleashed on them. This includes the usual horrors of massive bombardments that claim the lives of both combatants and civilians. Once again the State unleashes its terror. There is no difference between this massacre and that unleashed by the Allied Powers in the Gulf. Very little pressure is being put on the Yeltsin regime by the West in this latest bloodletting. The Western powers of the United States and, Britain and France-Germany hope to do a bit of horse-trading over the Balkans. If Russia is allowed to get away with this attack, the Western powers hope that they can persuade Russia to exert pressure on its ally Serbia to be more pliable in the carving-up of ex-Yugoslavia.

The war in Chechnya is a war between two different sets of gangsters. The Chechen Mafia are behind the regime there. One cannot forget the mass deportations to Central Asia of half a million Chechens under Stalin which ultimately was a major factor in the development of the Chechen gangs. This does not excuse the Chechen regime, which seeks to establish its own fief in opposition to the Russian State gangsters.

Yeltsin hopes by his actions to placate nationalist elements in both the military and in politics, and to keep the Russian Federation together. This attempt is doomed to failure and the break-up of the vast empire developed under the Tsars and perpetuated under the Bolsheviks looks set to be coming to an end.

Destruction

The wars continue, famine rages in the countries of Africa and Asia, and the environmental havoc leading to desertification and mass destruction of forests and pollution of the atmosphere, land and seas carries on apace. In the West, unemployment increases by leaps and bounds. Whole areas are devastated by lay-offs and redundancies, whilst public transport systems are run down. Cynicism with the whole political system increases phenomenally, along with a feeling of apathy, a feeling that nothing can change.

And yet, all around the world are small groups of people who think that things can change. Revolutionary movements can come like a thief in the night, and surprise us all. We refuse to be discouraged. We feel that social change can come, has to come, if we are to survive on this planet. We work towards the day when new movements in opposition to this decaying system emerge, as emerge they will. Already, more and more people in this country are seeing that direct action is the way forward, even though the cult of non-violence is often bound up with this. But this will be swept aside with the radicalisation of movements.

This government is almost certainly in its last days, and no future Labour administration will sabotage the growing social discontent for ever.

Labour Pains

THE TORIES HAVE LURCHED from crisis to crisis, from scandal to scandal, like an old prizefighter up against the ropes, staggering under a rain of blows. In this situation the Labour Party, under the leadership of Tony Blair, is well ahead in the opinion polls and looks set to become the next government.

The Tory administration is in tatters and many of its backers in the ruling class are looking for others to help administer the system. They know that the Tories are now deeply unpopular and that their plans to, for example, introduce VAT on fuel, would have faced fierce resistance. They are looking around for a safer bet, a party and leadership that can administer the attacks on the working class that the bosses know are necessary for their own welfare. It is still necessary to keep wages down, to dismantle large sections of the welfare state and to maintain a large pool of unemployed.

Sections of the boss class would prefer a joint Labour-Liberal Democrat government, and in fact this has been touted in the press. Even better, they would prefer a government of National Unity, where sections of the Tory wets could be drawn in.

This is why, for a while, Paddy Ashdown was receiving extensive coverage in the media and was given the big build-up. Now, however, the hopes of the Liberal Democrats are waning, as Labour under Blair is seen to be offering a much more inviting alternative.

Capitalist support

The old Labourites who defected to the SDP: Rodgers, Williams and Jenkins, are now actively supporting the option of Blair as the next Prime Minister. Behind them is the millionaire David Sainsbury, who financed the SDP split and donated £5,000 to the Blair leadership campaign. Other capitalists like Marks and Spencer are also contemplating giving financial assistance to Labour. This is coupled with the withdrawal of Tory funding by other capitalist outfits.

There are favourable noises in the media as well. The Murdoch-owned papers, especially The Sun, are giving hints that they will back Blair. Even the glossy magazine favoured by the upper classes, Harpers and Queen, noted that it was now perfectly OK to vote Labour.

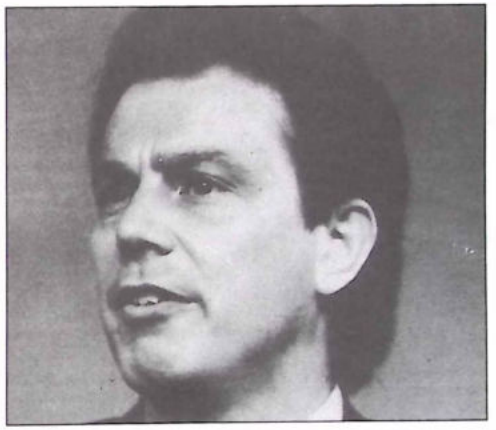
Safe horse

Yes, the boss class has nothing to fear from this public-school-educated barrister. All the signals he is giving are designed to demonstrate that he is a safe horse to back. Witness his decision to send his children to grant-assisted schools.

Blair is carrying on the work of Neil Kinnock and John Smith in transforming the Labour Party from a party that represented old-style social-democracy (and always on the right wing of world social-democracy) and a political vehicle for the trade unions, to a party more akin to the Democrats in the USA. There are many pitfalls here, as the Labour Party is still pay-rolled by the union barons, and much of the membership at branch level still believes in the old Labour beliefs and norms. This conflict is opening up rifts between the union bosses, some of whom support the ideas of the 'modernisers'.

Part of the push to change Labour is seen in Blair's seven-page pamphlet Socialism. He wishes to demonstrate both that he is no danger to the system and also that the concept of socialism can be seen as one based purely on ethics and that it can be re-employed as a harmless catchphrase, and keep the party faithful happy at the same time. In the pamphlet, he argues that socialism is not connected to the economy, that class is no longer useful as a term, and that any lip-service to defence of the working class should be replaced by phrases like 'national renewal' and a 'national crusade'. The word 'opportunity', one of the new ploys to market capitalism, should be substituted for 'equality'.

In his talk of 'one nation', Blair follows in the tradition of Thatcher, who tried to eradicate any notion of class, and Major, with his 'classless society'. The boss class has always been keen on hiding the truth about society, that it is divided into an exploiting and dominating class, and a class of those who are exploited and dominated. Blair is doing a good job in carrying on this tradition.



The Labour Party is also showing how safe it is by messages sent out through its Social Justice Commission. This endorsed the so-called reforms that the Conservatives were carrying through in unemployment benefit and social security payments, implying that if Labour came to power it would scrap universal child benefit. The ruling class can sleep sound, knowing that the health service that was 'opened up to the market', resulting in the growth of thousands of immensely well-paid hardmen administrators and the further run-down of services will not be changed under Labour.

On other important issues Labour is seen as keen on outdoing the Conservatives. Take the Labour stance on law and order for example. Here Labour is attempting to show that it can rule Britain more efficiently than the Conservatives, that it is the real friend of the police, that it can direct the strong state more effectively.

In a policy paper, Getting to Grips on Youth Crime, Blair called for custodial sentences for under-16s, and 'secure places' to lock them up. He demanded greater stop and search powers for the police, and to his satisfaction this was included by Home Secretary Michael Howard in the Criminal Justice Act. During the leadership campaign he said that there was "no bigger problem in the country than crime and lawlessness" — forgetting all about unemployment and the root cause of all social problems, capitalism itself.

Further outlining Labour policy on law and order, Blair stated in a speech that he would be "tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime". This would mean more repressive police actions, what Blair calls "robust enforcement methods"; more people sent to prison for longer. He recommends greater State surveillance, especially cameras in every shopping centre.

He is an enthusiast of 'anti-truanting schemes', and training and work programmes for the young unemployed. This is a continuation of the Tory fake schemes that hide unemployment, and take people off the unemployment register to pay them a pittance.

The key note in the speech however, was the call for 'strong community policing'. This was developed by the State as an idea after the 1981 Brixton riots. It involved the pushing of neighbourhood watch schemes that would foster cooperation between the police and the 'public'. This was coupled with the use of greater force by the police. Alongside this, his trusty lieutenants Prescott and Cook make a speciality of hounding the Conservatives because they are not tough enough on prisoners and prisons are not secure enough.

Blair knows that he needs the support of the State if Labour is to come to power again. He knows that if he is elected it will be in a situation of continuing mass unemployment and increasing poverty. He will need increasing police powers as he attempts to carry on the work already put into operation by the Conservatives, the attacks on living standards, wages, and benefits against which many may decide to act.

But don't get us wrong. Blair and his cronies represent a shift in Labour policies towards US-Democrat-style politics. But the old style Labour Party was no friend of the working class. It pioneered anti-immigrant and anti-working class policies, pay freezes and austerity programmes, and under Callaghan started implementing monetarist policies before Thatcher was elected. It has consistently used the police and Army to crush strikes. It is there to defuse working class struggle.

Blair is also attempting to outdo the Tories in his attacks on single parents. He said that it was "good common sense" that children had a "stable family environment with their parents". He thus publicly slapped the faces of thousands of single parents. He pledged to make sure that children would be taught 'good parenting' in school. So the classic, heterosexual nuclear family unit is to be pushed. The Tories have already targeted single parents as one of their scapegoats. Labour looks set to continue this witchhunt.

Foot in it

Despite this, the Left continues to call for a vote for Labour. Take the Socialist Workers' Party for example. First of all it backed Prescott in the leadership contest, then decided it was Prescott who saved John Smith by supporting his plans to weaken links with the unions.

Leading SWP member Paul Foot, writing in the New Statesman last July said, "A powerful campaign based on restoring to the people the wealth swiped from them by the greedy minority, and taking back into public hands the decisions now made by freeloaders on the utility boards could restore to Labour the self-respect and confidence so necessary for electoral victory". Labour is unable to do this and Foot is unable to see that. Even if it were possible, it is not the place of so-called revolutionaries to advocate such a course. Foot and his fellow party members, and like-minded outfits like Militant, Socialist Organiser and countless other Trot outfits as well as the remnants of the Stalinist parties, continue to foster illusions in Labour, continue to believe that nationalisation, that is, State ownership, equals ownership by the working class. Those who work in the nationalised industries know whether or not this statement is true.

The Left, no matter how revolutionary its rhetoric, and no matter how much it denounces Labour 'betrayals' remains firmly tied to the politics of Labourism. The Socialist Workers Party could be described as the external wing of Labour, with its unswerving call for a vote for Labour, coupled with its calls to make the TUC and the union leaders fight. Despite dissatisfaction in the ranks, among those who see that a vote for Labour is ludicrous, the SWP will continue to defend Labourism.

The likelihood of grassroots Labour members breaking with Labourism because they are sickened by the turn of the Party remains very slim. They are drenched in cynicism and disillusion or have adapted to the changes. The Labour Left, still represented by people like Benn and Peter Hain, will remain in the Party and will stop any split with Labourism by continuing to foster the illusion a) that Labour genuinely represents the interests of working people despite everything and b) that the Party can be turned to 'socialist' policies. They are terrified that the attempts by the modernisers to win the next election might misfire and that they might lose the support of thousands upon thousands of working class voters.

As Hain said in the Stalinist daily, Morning Star (28 September 1993): "We cannot afford to have a political underclass totally alienated from the political system."

We anarchist communists for our part work towards the destruction of the Labour Party, which acts as a brake to independent working class struggle. But a turn from Labour if it took place without the development of a strong and confident mass movement in the workplaces, on the streets and estates, would be of little value. Groups like the British National Party would fill this vacuum unless there were a credible revolutionary alternative. We have the immense task of assisting in the creation of this alternative. Our numbers are small at present, but we will not be discouraged. Unflinching, dogged and tireless work is necessary in the years ahead in developing our practice and theory. We hope that you, dear reader, will come forward to help us in the fight.

We've got hold of a few copies of our out-of-print pamphlet The Myth of Labour's Socialism, which analyses Labourism and gives an account of Labour's anti-working class practices in office. It's 60p plus postage — but hurry, because there are only three copies!

Poverty in Britain increases

RECENT REPORTS BY different groups and newspapers show a dramatic increase in poverty in Britain in the last 15 years from 1979-1994.

The poor now represent one in four of the population in Europe and 25% in the UK according to the European Commission's definition of poverty, which estimates poverty from an income after deduction of housing costs of less than half the national average. The Low Pay Unit's analysis of households below the average income for the period 1979-1991 estimates an increase from five million poor in 1979 to 13.5 million now. The gap between rich and poor has widened massively in 15 years, with the poorest tenth of the population — three million people — having a drop of 17% in their living standards. For the average pay packet this is a drop of about £30 per week in income.

Infant mortality rates also show a widening gap between rich and poor, the lowest figure being 3.9% in Northallerton District, compared to a high of 12.9% in East Birmingham. Another big indicator of poverty is the rise in TB (tuberculosis) the killer disease which had been in decline since the '50s. In the last three years cases have risen from 5,500 to 6,000. Tower Hamlets is the worst affected area in Britain, and cases there have risen by 40% in five years, with 50 in every 100,000 now infected — ten times the national average!

Tower Hamlets also has more households with more than 1.5 people per room than any other London borough. In addition, 50% of households there have an income of less than £6,500 and a third less than £4,500 per year. From a workforce of an estimated 25 million, nearly half are estimated to be in low-paid jobs.

The British ruling class has gone on the offensive against the working class since the defeats of the '70s. This has been partly achieved by changes in the tax system which have benefited the rich and taxed the poor more. Benefits have been slashed in relation to inflation.

Things are unlikely to get better with high unemployment likely to remain a permanent feature of capitalism. With real figures of at least four million unemployed, wages are kept low and the boss class has a permanent pool of labour which it can use as a threat to those in work who dare to ask for better wages and conditions.

We need to build unity between those in work and those unemployed, indeed between all sections of the working class. The attacks on living standards have to be resisted so that we can inevitably go on the offensive to smash this corrupt and rotting system and build a new society where everyone gets what they need and not just a few who satisfy their endless greed at the expense of the majority.

STATE SURVEILLANCE

HAVE YOU EVER thought there's someone watching you. Just because you're paranoid it doesn't mean they're not out to get you. We live in a society which is increasing the ways and means it keeps tabs on us in every aspect of our lives.

The growth of information technology enables employees, schools, social security, police, local and central government and every other euphemism for the bosses to keep a vast range of 'facts' about ordinary people. 'Facts' which cannot be checked because of the obstruction of the bureaucracy which obtains them even in the unlikely event of your becoming aware of the record's existence. "Knowledge is power" the old saying goes and even Lord Acton, someone from a position of privilege in society, admitted power tends to corrupt and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

The latest 'breakthrough' in this accumulation of intrusion is the surveillance camera. In recent years, the world in which we live has come under the all-seeing eye. The centres of large towns abound with strategically-placed monitors peering down on us. Shop cameras are so universal as to be passed unnoticed in an instant. Railway platforms are surveyed by the latest in high-tec. All this supposedly for the comfort and safety of the public. It is time to ask who benefits from this craze for surveillance.

Who guards the guards?

At every point we are told that the camera protects us, the ordinary citizens. The thrifty shopkeeper's livelihood is guarded against 'thieves'. The lone woman on the platform is protected from her would-be assailant. The smooth flow of traffic in cities is ensured and accidents avoided. The careless motorist is deterred from speeding.

The real question is what has caused the problems we are to be protected from and who is doing the 'protecting'. They are of course one and the same, a small minority, not of lawbreakers but lawmakers, who govern and own our society. Having cast the majority, whose work has made them rich, into the mire of daily grind or the absolute poverty of unemployment, the Real Scroungers offer false protections against the ills they have made, to increase their control over the mass of ordinary people lest they try to reclaim their own.

Voyeurs of ourselves

These points may seem trite and obvious to readers of this article but camera surveillance as a new block in the wall that separates the ruling class from its negation is another cunning step on a long road. The cops make out that they benefit the working class person if they are robbed on the street. That, of course, is not the real reason for the police force, which is to protect ruling class property and against strikes and insurrections. When there is confrontation between the police and the working class, as in riots, evictions, harassment on the street, you can see clearly who your opponent is.

The camera observes and records. It marks the next step beyond the soft cops, the social workers and Labour Party (nice Mr Blair will kiss capitalism better). It engenders passivity among those under its own gaze. Why fight back against racists and fascists on the street, they'll be captured on camera. Why stop someone being mugged, the video tape is in its heaven and like God it will bring the iniquitous to judgement in the hereafter. The camera divides us from one another. We can't fight back against State repression because we'll be captured on film. As individuals gazing into our reflections on the screen we have no response. A TV has been placed in the streets which we can watch, but we cannot change the channel let alone make the programmes.

Jeremy Beadle

The missing link is organisation. Every new technological discovery from the wheel to the internet can be used for the perpetuation and maintenance of hierarchical rule and oppression, or to facilitate a community of equals enjoying the fruits of life. It is not the thing itself we fight against, but its use. In the hands of an organised working class fighting for its liberation it will not be us powerlessly watching them watch us, but our former bosses trembling as they watch us watching them watch us make the social revolution that destroys them.

The Friends of Durruti

New pamphlet!

LONDON ACF have produced a pamphlet on the Friends of Durruti, a much misunderstood group that attempted to defend and extend the Spanish Revolution of 1936. In their criticisms of the leadership of the anarcho-syndicalist unions they represented an important moment in anarchist history. Included are an historical introduction written by an ACF member, and two political statements from the Friends themselves.

This will be the first in a series of pamphlets in the Stormy Petrel series. Coming up will be a pamphlet on the Italian Factory Councils of 1920-21.

Copies of the Friends of Durruti pamphlet are available from ACF (London), c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1 at 75p including postage.

A ROAD TOO FAR

We conclude our series on traffic by looking at green cars, public transport, the anti-roads movement and transport in a future society.

Green cars

THERE IS NO SUCH THING as a clean car. Vehicles based on an internal combustion engine inevitably emit pollutants. This puts the achievement of lead-free petrol in perspective, as does the length of time it took to secure such a limited, non-car-threatening objective.

Traffic fumes are a major contributor to the greenhouse gases which produce global warming. Cars and light vans produce 18% of global carbon dioxide emissions (with more produced by their manufacture), nitrous oxide (which contributes to surface and tropospheric ozone) and carbon monoxide. A proportion of nitrogen oxides turn to nitric acid and fall as acid rain. They react with other chemicals in sunlight to form petrochemical smogs containing ozone which destroys millions of dollars of crops in America and elsewhere. The nitrogen oxides in smog irritate the mucous membranes in the nose, with serious adverse effects on health, particularly for people with respiratory problems. Benzine and polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons are implicated in causing cancer.

Catalytic converters are supposed to reduce emissions of these dangerous pollutants. However, converters don't work when cold and therefore have no effect on the start of the journey when most pollutants are emitted. Converters are widely used in Los Angeles which is still one of the smog capitals of the world.

Similarly, there are a number of problems with alternative fuels. Liquid hydrogen needs electricity to freeze it and has storage and safety problems. Like electric vehicles it needs an expensive fuel which usually produces carbon dioxide in its generation. Alternative sources of electricity are expensive. Super 'technical fixes' such as hydrogen fuel cells and cold fusion are very expensive and distant prospects. If and when they are introduced they will displace existing car technologies to the de-developed world, as has happened with tobacco.

Even if a genuine green car is developed, it doesn't tackle the many other adverse effects of cars, such as the waste of space and resources, the danger element and the effects on street life and community.

Public transport

CARS CANNOT BE UNIVERSAL. Even putting aside the large-scale social effects of isolation, ill-health, environmental damage and injury and death, there is insufficient space for the roads and parking that widespread car ownership would entail. We already have extensive problems with cars, despite 35% of the population not even having a car for reasons of age, disability or lack of money.

The erosion of public transport in Britain (and elsewhere) is a basic consequence of mass car use. In the 1960s and 1970s, one-third of the 17,000 miles of railtrack were axed and 40% of the stations were closed. Mass car use sabotages public transport through the allocation of funding, competition for space and loss of ideological support. The passenger revenue from buses in 1988 was £2.58 billion and that from trains was £2.19 billion. Of that, only 20% was government subsidy. Government subsidies for public transport have been cut back more and more, resulting in fewer staff and less spent on new equipment. This has serious implications for safety. For example, BR has rejected the ATP automatic signalling system that was promised after the Clapham rail disaster.

Other effects include older stock (less efficient, more dangerous), fewer routes, and higher fares. All of these factors (together with the heavy road bias of the Department of Transport) conspire to cause fewer passengers for a progressively worse service, thereby justifying further cuts in government subsidies and higher fares, causing a vicious downward spiral. Privatisation will mean more of the same. The Budget announced a £300 million pound cut in the rail subsidy for 1995 with a further £235 million cut in 1996. Hundreds of workers are losing their jobs and many more are threatened with privatisation, profitability will be the sole consideration, despite government assurances to the contrary, and up to half the rail network could disappear.

Cars compete with buses for space and slow them down. They are far more wasteful of space than buses, tubes and trains. One bus or coach carries on average the passenger equivalent of 22 cars, taking up a seventh of the space. Of people going to work in central London by road, between 50-100% more go by car than by bus: 130,000 cars rather than 3000 buses. Mass car use has impeded the possibility of an adequate public transport system. Consequently, there is a lack of imagination about what such a system could be. Ideas for improvements could include: locating more stops near homes, making the system cleaner, more regular and safer and providing greater access for people with disabilities and children.

Anti-roads movement

WHAT ARE THE ORIGINS of the current, radical movement? In the 1970s Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace International involved many green activists with their populist-activist environmentalism. By the 1980s this had degenerated into professional lobbying by the few, with most people being reduced to members/supporters who raised or gave money. This void was filled by the setting up of an Earth First! (EF!) group in Britain: a radical ecology grouping committed to direct action and grassroots organisation (see Organise! nos. 26 and 28 for analysis of EF! in America). Over here, internal differences over public image, the use of violence, form of organisation etc, led to the setting up of the underground Earth Liberation Front (ELF).

In Britain EF! was influenced by its American parent, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament/Greenham Common campaign and the Animal Rights movement. From these it inherited radical liberalism and militant moralism as well as the tactics of collective direct action, lobbying/publicity stunts and non-violent civil disobedience.

The movement has adopted non-violence as a principle (rather than as a tactic). The justification is that it gives a good media image, thus winning over public opinion and creating a moral stance in contrast to the materialist immorality of the roadbuilders. The media is not neutral, however, but is part of the State, largely owned by millionaire (or billionaire) capitalists such as Murdoch, the late unlamented Maxwell, Conrad Black etc. It defines the terms of political debate (eg security forces, terrorists, peace-keeping forces, deserving poor, scroungers etc) and peddles the line of the State. When it takes another line, this usually reflects divisions within the ruling class over strategy eg Murdoch's recent conversion to Blair's Labour Party after years of Labour bashing. As Aufheben point out, public opinion in this context is conceived of as homogenous and passive opposition, needing a bland, acceptable image of opposition. However, the public support for the 1984-85 miners' strike and the anti-poll tax movement, despite the negative media image which portrayed these struggles as violent, contradict this view. The logic of principled non-violence is that there is no difference between the violence of the State and the violence employed by people resisting it. This argument could also be extended to violence against property, ie it is morally wrong to cut fences or sabatoge construction equipment.

Strategy

Thankfully the anti-roads movement, particularly the M11 campaign, has not taken this line and has a fine record of sabotage. The rationale behind the movement's strategy and tactics is that their resistance is expensive to the roadbuilders and that this extra cost will create a new political climate where the Government refuses to underwrite the roadbuilders. Interestingly, the latest development (at the time of writing) is that Tarmac Construction is trying to recover the extra costs arising from the Twyford Down (M3) resistance from the Department of Transport, who in turn are suing 76 of the protesters for 31.9 million damage. This 'raise the cost' strategy failed to stop Cruise missiles at Greenham Common, but on a global level it was pivotal in the downfall of the USSR, with America using the arms race as a means of bankrupting the Soviet regime.

A further argument used against violent tactics is that they would give the police and excuse to wade in, but recent struggles (poll tax, Criminal Justice Bill etc) show that the police do not need an excuse to use violence. They are violent when they want to be. The question of whether or not to use violence should therefore not be one of principle but one of tactics. The entire State apparatus with its army, courts, prisons etc is based on violence. Capitalist exploitation is a violent attack on our freedom and well-being. It seems highly unlikely that we can overcome their power without any use of violence. However, it is equally wrong to have violence as a principle of action. As Emma Goldman said, "The more the violence, the less the revolution." Therefore, the decision of whether or not to use violence should depend on what tactics will best achieve our ends, whilst attempting to minimise violence.

Legitimacy

The other strand of principled, nonviolent, civil disobedience is accepting the legitimacy of the State. The flip-side of the 'democratic rights' of protesters that many in the anti-roads movement talk about is the 'duties' of citizens to obey the laws of the 'democratically-elected' government and to respect private property. However, we have to recognise that the government is not a government of the people and that it, and the laws it passes, represent the interests of the ruling class against us. The private property they are concerned about is the property of the ruling class. Therefore it is a mistake to speak about 'our rights' in a system that is not ours in any sense.

The future

The government plans to finance its motorway expansion programme through electronic tolling (aiming to raise £700 million). Tolls are currently charged on a third of European motorways. In August the Tory-controlled Transport Select Committee rejected the idea as illegal and liable to cause thousands of extra injuries and increased environmental damage through drivers using trunk roads more to avoid payment. Although this is a short-term defeat it foreshadows far advanced plans of the State and the electronics/motor industry. An example of this is the Prometheus project (Programme for European Traffic with Highest Efficiency and Unprecedented Safety) which involves the majority of European car manufacturers. Technology is already far developed for tolling, electronic monitoring and control of vehicle speeds as a way of reducing traffic jams, increasing traffic flows and of course increasing revenue and profits for the State and private capital.

However, depite its ambitions, the government has been forced into a number of other defeats and climbdowns through a combination of factors. The increased militancy of the anti-roads movement, the inadequacy of the public transport system, increased awareness of health problems caused by car pollution and pressure on the Department of Transport's large budget at a time of public spending cuts have all combined to make the government rethink, especially with the forthcoming general election (1996-97) and 12 Tory MPs in marginal seats facing hostility to unpopular road schemes.

Although the Twyford Dowm and M11 battles were lost, the scheme to demolish Oxleas Wood has been put on ice and six more schemes were postponed in late December 1994. This is on top of the cut of one third in the national road-building programme announced last summer. If rail privatisation goes ahead it will mean massive cuts in the rail network of up to a half, extensive redundancies (which have already started) and higher fares.

Links

This is a battle that can be won, particularly because it is unpopular and the government is in the run-up to a general election. It is vital that anti-road campaigners, transport workers and those threatened by road schemes build links. Revolutionaries should be working to build and support this process. Ultimately, a community-based, accessible and green public transport system can only be built as part of a revolutionary transformation. Its components will include popular planning involving all the communities affected, minimising the need for transport through increased local self-reliance, a service that is free and accessible to all, minimal pollution and disturbance to the environment and community and compatibility with a thriving street life of walkers and cyclists.

NOTE: We are indebted to Aufheben no. 3 for their excellent analysis of the anti-roads movement.

Moral Panics and Children

MORAL PANICS ARE not new, but in 1990s Britain they seem to be continuous and all-persuasive, including single mothers, working class yob culture, crack-pushing Yardies, Aids, video nasties, flesh eating bugs and computer porn. The range of moral panics is now so wide that large numbers of people are implicated. For example, child abuse implicates the family and everything a man does can be interpreted as 'abuse'. Furthermore, there is the 'discovery' of hitherto suppressed experiences of child abuse.

Moral panics tend to happen when society has not been able to adapt to dramatic changes such as the Industrial Revolution or the modernising trends of the 1960s. The old system of values is crumbling and cannot explain new developments, so many people feel anxiety and loss of control. For the ruling class, moral panics are the result of a loss of moral authority and control, despite having played a major role in fostering them. Attempts to defend values at such times are doomed because there is no consensus. The Tories' Back to Basics failed due to lack of agreement on what 'family values' are. At present, no institution has the authority to define values and what is 'right' and 'wrong'. For example, the Church of England cannot agree on whether women and gay men can become priests. For the working class, there has been de-industrialisation, long-term unemployment, loss of homes and break-up of working class estates and neighbourhoods through yuppification. With the erosion of these communal ties, life has become far more atomised for many people. In this context, national anxieties combine with feelings of insecurity to make people susceptible to moral panics where everything can be seen as threatening and people frequently construe the worst possible outcome.

Children

There are currently a number of moral panics about children, particularly around the 'public child'. These include truancy, theft, joyriding, abduction, assault and killing other children or even adults. Underlying these moral panics is one about childhood itself, because the old definition has been dismantled by both public awareness of children's exploitation (widespread child abuse, both emotional and physical, and child poverty) on the one hand, and moves towards respecting children (Children's Act 1991, children's rights) on the other. In part the panic over childhood is a reaction against the empowering strategies of combatting child abuse, with opponents maintaining that 'parental rights' are undermined and that such strategies encourage self-centredness and fail to distinguish between the 'normal' and 'abnormal' exercise of parental authority. The crisis around children is also partly a projection of adult anxieties about capitalism in recession. Middle class bigotry also plays an important (though disguised) role: the subhuman culture of the poor is threatening to overthrow fundamental human decency (ie middle class values). Thus the end of childhood is blamed on the moral chaos of the poor and the moral irresponsibility of the mass media by such as The Observer's Melanie Phillips.

Childhood as we know it in Western industrialised countries is a recent social construction. In the Middle Ages, once children had reached seven they were regarded as adults, and in the Industrial Revolution child labour was widely used in the mines and factories. Western children are kept dependent on adults for far longer than is considered necessary in other societies. This dependence has been lengthened and intensified by Conservative government policies in housing, education, health care and taxation, which increase parental responsibility and rights over their children. It is now harder for a young person to leave home and exist independently from their family. Parents' increasing control over (for instance) children's sex education is potentially in direct conflict with their protection from sexual exploitation.

Childhood

Research into media stories and adverts about child abuse show that childhood is the issue at stake.

"Kevin's 8, but for him childhood's over, Kevin's been raped."

(National Children's Home advert)

Childhood is defined not by age but by a set of qualities and experiences which are incompatible with being assaulted. It is an institution which exists independently of and sometimes in spite of children. 'Innocence' is a defining factor, an ideology used by adults to deny children knowledge and power, which increases their vulnerability to abuse. This 'innocence' or rather ignorance, is a vehicle for the adult double standard. A child is ignorant if s/he doesn't know what adults want them to know and innocent when they don't know what adults don't want them to know. In the name of innocence, adults repress children's own expressions of sexuality and deny them rights over their own bodies (eg Gillick's campaign in the 1980s to prevent young women under 16 gaining access to contraception) and try to protect them from 'corrupting' influences such as Section 28 which prohibits promoting positive images of homosexuality. The image of a child as passive victim complements that of innocent victim, both are in need of adult protection. The dominant message from the state is that all children are at risk. With the focus on children's weakness and incapacity, the call is for increasing surveillance. Parents are told to guard their children closely and not let them out alone or at night. This is the seige mentality which encourages children to live in fear. However, in any case, this approach is counterproductive because most abuse takes place within the family and increases children's isolation within the family by telling them to keep all other adults at arms length. Children brought up to fear strangers will grow up more fearful, shutting themselves in, locking themselves out of the support they need and cutting themselves off from other children. They learn to react against people who are different and withdraw into the safety of tight-knit kin groups. Brutality within the family is preferable to the risk of the unfamiliar. The growing epidemic of fear also stops adults from offering help in case others see them as child molesters. The fear of intervention is greatest across barriers of race.

When children reach an age when they are allowed out with few restrictions, a variety of factors conspire to make their behaviour 'anti-social': the poverty of town planning for their needs, lack of transport due to availability and cost, the destruction of waste ground, poor or non-existence play provision and the general exclusion of children from adult society. Due to being 'locked away', when children do break out they appear more threatening to adults as their lack of experience makes them more fearful of others, less socially adept and more at risk from the environment. Children react to such a malign environment by deliberately drawing attention to themselves: screaming, scribbling on pavements, smashing milk bottles, banging on doors and generally getting in the way of adults. Vandalism is often a response to alienating environments such as high rise blocks, areas of rough wasteland are important to children. They cater for their need to alter and interact with the environment in a setting where they have a high degree of ownership and independence. As these areas are eliminated by capitalism's insatiable drive for more profit from every source (any land not yielding profit must be waste), children's messy and disruptive play becomes anti-social because of where it has been forced to move to, eg children's excavation of a bank next to a foot-cycle path leads to bricks and rubbish on it. Children's lack of mobility (arising from car domination) means that they have smaller territories and therefore tend to become more defensive/aggressive as they become nearer home.

Early teens is the 'gang' age, when they like to hang out on the street, chatting to their friends, flirting, showing off, seeing and being seen. Hanging around inside indoor shopping centres is a favourite activity. They go for warmth in winter, to meet friends, to watch and play complicated games of hide and seek with the ever-present security guards who are there to enforce the law of consumption (if you're not shopping, get out!). Their youthful energy is a constant irritation to the air-conditioned sterility of this consumer heaven.

The current youth cultural panics are computer games (children becoming adult too young/ negative effects on play), raves and nightclubs (drugs, sex and alcohol) and pornographic/violent videos. Youth cultures are a mixture of self-expression, defiance and refusal of the dominant ruling class culture. They inevitably end up being ideologically recuperated either through trivialising them and naturalising their 'otherness' or by transforming them into meaningless exotica. After recuperation, new sets of conventions are established which create new commodities and industries, or rejuvenate old ones.

Crisis

As we have seen, a crisis in the social institution of childhood is at the root of the current moral panics around children. Fundamental to the old definition of childhood is the idea that children are either little angels or little devils. This denial of children's humanity is similar to that of other oppressed groups (eg women are either madonnas or whores). Angel and devil are two sides of the same coin. If adults insist that the proper child has no sexuality, aggression or cruelty then 'evil' is the only way way of understanding these behaviours from children, as we have seen in the case of the killers of Jamie Bulger. Furthermore, the trial judge maintained that there was a direct link between the violent video the two boys had seen (Childsplay) and the murder they had committed. This is despite 30 years of research showing that the link between violence and violent/pornographic material is inconclusive.

Lock them away!

The moral panic response to such anti-social behaviour (real or perceived) is renewed calls and action to 'lock them away' and demands that parents be prosecuted. (This has already happened over truancy.) There are plans to introduce child jails with spartan regimes for 12-14 year olds with a minimum of three offences. This is another return to a discredited solution which, far from curing the problem, will lead to reoffending and will be plagued by bullying and self-harm. After all, the prison was aptly described as "the university of crime" by Kropotkin. The reaction to joy riding is entirely disproportionate to the crime. Under the recently passed law of 'Aggravated Vehicle Taking' it is punishable by two years in jail or five if death is caused, yet of the 526 recorded incidents by 1993, only three resulted in loss of life. Girl gangs are also not a new or a worse problem as they existed in the 1970s. Young women offenders are dealt with more harshly by the police and courts than men because they are breaking the social taboos governing women's behaviour. Unlike the better off, many working class parents cannot afford nannies or nurseries. They (mainly women) are criticised for not being available to their children 24 hours a day. 'Helpful hints' on how to combat child abuse include the suggestion that women should not go out at all. Mothers of incest survivors are even blamed for not being there for reasons of illness/death or for abdicating childcare to their husbands. One lawyer defending an alleged child abuser maintained that the mother should take responsibility because: "This woman repeatedly went out to the grocery store leaving this child with her father."

The moral panics around the public child and childhood is a self-fulfilling prophecy. A society which represses children and fails to cater for their needs produces 'anti-social' behaviour in children, leading to calls for further repressive measures and the bolstering of the very institutions which are to blame in the first place: the nuclear family as the prime training ground for sexism and authoritarianism and the seat of most child abuse.

Conclusion

The epidemic of moral panics is a reflection of a society in crisis, with the contradiction of most people living increasingly-atomised lives in a mass society. This is the result of 20 years of recession, the defeat of many working class struggles and the consequent dismantling of much of the previous working class powerbase through de-industrialisation.

Moral panics must be opposed because they distort reality, increase atomisation and support and encourage repressive responses and false solutions. These responses and solutions are individual rather than collective and increase the powers of the state. The job of revolutionaries is to promote and support collective responses to social problems such as anti-abuse strategies that empower children, child-directed play provision, struggles against development of waste ground, new roads etc. These struggles are both an end in themselves and a means to an end — the building of power, confidence and collectivity towards the only way of achieving real community: the social revolution.

That's the Spirit?

INTOXICANTS AND STIMULANTS have been around since the birth of the human race. Whether it's tea, coffee, coca leaf, magic mushrooms, peyote cactus or yage vine, people have used different plants and distillations of plants to combat tiredness, help them work, make them jolly and convivial, combat depression, or use them as an aid to 'spiritual' experiences.

Beer and wine have been around since the dawn of civilisation. In fact, there is now speculation that the earliest towns in Mesopotamia came about precisely because people wished to cultivate grape vines, moving away from their hunting and gathering existence. Stronger alcoholic drinks probably originated early on too. But did you know that the systematic and regular production of strong booze came about at a time when the centralised State came into existence?

State revenues

In England, the first official distilling of whisky and gin took place under Henry VII (strangely enough, regular production of whisky began in Scotland at least ten years later). In Russia, vodka appeared at the same time as firearms. In all these countries there was a need to obtain State revenue quickly, and at the same time make sure that the State controlled production of strong alcohol. Spirits fitted the bill perfectly. Generally made from grain, which is a basic and most common product of agrarian societies, it was easy to transport and long-lasting. As well as raising much-needed revenue, spirits were used to control the poor and to create large numbers of permanently pissed paupers who were easily-manipulated.

In his book History of Vodka, William Pokhlebin talks about how the early Tsars created and controlled a lumpen proletariat "whose energies could be directed into any channel for the price of a 'bucket' of vodka" — the smallest bucket contained 12 litres! State taverns were ordered by the Tsars to serve drunks: refusal was illegal! Pokhlebin notes in his book that a drive against alcohol in the Soviet Union was necessary as vodka was ruining thousands of lives, aggravating domestic violence and leading to drunken brawling, accidents and murder. But it was a case of winning over people by argument, not by banning, which proved to be completely useless. He remarks: "The supposedly proletarian State resorted to the idealistic fantasies of the bourgeois US legislators of the 1920s."

Strong spirits have continued to be used by people to deaden the pain of life under the present system. It is hardly surprising that alcohol remains an accepted drug, whilst cannabis is still generally banned throughout the world. No comparisons are made between the numbers of people killed by alcohol through drunken driving, cirrhosis, nephritis, heart disease, strokes and cancer and the minimal bad effects cannabis has on people. Similarly, another drug, tobacco, which kills hundreds of thousands around the world every year, is condoned. Hardly surprising either that the tobacco and drink barons regularly finance or influence political parties around the world.

Gasping for a fag?

DESPITE THE FACT that millions in the west have given up indulging in tobacco in the last few decades, the tobacco industry still remains one of the most profitable, with sales of over $40 billion worldwide (1978 figures).

Cigarettes are cheap to make, they are habit-forming and recession-proof. Whilst sales have been affected in the west, they still make huge profits for the tobacco companies. And the tobacco companies are making up for falling sales in the west by aggressively peddling tobacco in eastern Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America, where consumption is rising by at least 3% a year. The tobacco multinationals have no intention of letting go of their vast profits, despite the vast damage that tobacco does to people's health (lung cancer and other forms of cancer, chronic bronchitis, heart failure, strokes, etc, etc).

Health

Governments are — supposedly — meant to take an active interest in the 'nation's health'. In the west, the development of ministries of health has been a common phenomenon in this century, mirrored in eastern Europe and the south. They are meant to intervene over matters of health. Yet on the subject of tobacco they have consistently hung back.

As statistical and medical evidence mounted in the '50s that tobacco was particularly harmful to health, governments signally failed to act. This was most acute in Britain, where 75% of men smoked and lung cancer began to reach epic proportions, with the highest incidence in the world.

Between 1956 and 1959 less than £5,000 was spent on anti-smoking propaganda, whilst the tobacco companies spent £27 million on advertising. Iain MacLeod, minister of health in Churchill's conservative government (1952-54) later admitted: "Smokers, mainly cigarette smokers, contribute some £1,000 million yearly to the exchequer and no one knows better than the government that they simply cannot afford to lose that much." This has remained the attitude up to the present day with Virginia Bottomley.

Pronounced

In the United States this has been even more pronounced. Early American capitalism was founded on tobacco. The American revolution, which guaranteed the independence of the American bourgeoisie from British domination, was financed by tobacco, when it was used as collateral for loans received from France. It still remains one of the most important cash crops, employing tens of thousands, mainly in the south-east.

When Kennedy came to power in 1962, the last thing he wanted to do was upset the influential southern politicians — including Lyndon Johnson, his running partner. They dominated the Congress committees, and he would have to accommodate them if he were to govern effectively. He failed to act on scientific findings about tobacco.

Despite the formation of a Presidential Commission under medical pressure, any investigations were ham-strung from the start. Dr Terry, the surgeon-general, when forming the Commission, sent a list of scientists to the tobacco industry to be vetted.

In the end, eleven scientists were selected, five of whom were smokers. Following this, one scientist from the National Cancer Institute was removed when he spoke publicly suggesting that tobacco was a health hazard.

The tobacco barons had received evidence on how harmful tobacco was from their own scientists. They hid this information, whilst developing 'low tar' cigarettes to prepare for any adverse publicity about it. They introduced filter cigarettes, although they had originally been designed to attract female smokers who were seen to want cigarettes whose ends didn't get soggy!

When a film was made for British TV about the Marlboro cigarette ads in 1976, the tobacco giant Philip Morris took an injunction out against it being shown in America. These ads had made a speciality of showing handsome, virile cowboys puffing on a Marlboro, the aim being to connect cigarette smoking in the mind of the public with good looks and 'masculinity'. The film showed that all the cowboys who had taken part in the ads had died of tobacco-related diseases, except one — who is now dead of lung cancer.

Blatant

Jesse Helms is the Republican senator for North Carolina. He now has considerable power in the Republican Party and has begun to make blatantly racist announcements about black people. He is a champion of all the fundamentalist causes — anti-abortion, anti-homosexual, pro-nuclear family, anti-drugs, anti-liberalism, anti-'communism', anti-welfare, anti-permissiveness. He was an architect of Reagan's presidential victory, mobilising all the forces of the New Right and the Moral Majority. He owes his own election as senator to his support for tobacco and tobacco's support for him, with a solid vote from the tobacco farmer. When Joe Califano, President Carter's lieutenant, began to make anti- smoking announcements on a consistent and regular basis, Helms mobilised the tobacco machine against him, forcing him to resign, getting himself re-elected and ousting the second senator for North Carolina, a Democrat. He followed this through by making sure Carter lost North Carolina and the presidency in the 1980 presidential election, helping to put Reagan and tobacco in the White House.

In 1976, Reagan had looked set to ride off into the sunset of his political career. Helms revived this, getting pledges from Reagan that he would not act against tobacco. In a letter to a big tobacco farmer who supported Helms he wrote: "I can guarantee that my own Cabinet members will be far too busy with substantive matters to waste their time proselytising against the dangers of cigarette smoking."

Tobacco is a political issue. The tobacco industry regularly exerts influence to get pro-tobacco candidates elected in the Western world (it's no suprise that Thatcher got a lucrative job after she lost her job as PM promoting the interests of a tobacco giant). It targets Africa, Asia and Latin America to export ill-health. It sponsors sports and arts, competitions and clothes bearing brand names and holidays, all with the aim of persuading people that tobacco is healthy, when the truth is that it causes horrific and immensely painful illness, accounting for hundreds of thousands of deaths every year.

The Wicked Weed?

ALONGSIDE DANGEROUS DRUGS like tobacco and alcohol, how does cannabis compare? Well, for a start, it's illegal! In Britain in 1991, 42,209 people were prosecuted for possession of cannabis, whilst in 1992 in France 30,000 were prosecuted, resulting in several thousand sent to prison and thousands of others on suspended sentences.

The State is able to use the excuse of cannabis possession as a means of control and pressure. And of course it always comes in handy when unemployment is rising and the system is crumbling to whip up yet another moral panic. In Britain, the Home Secretary Michael Howard has increased fines for possession from £500 to £2500. In France, the ministers Quiles and Broussard have just started a witch hunt against drugs. The cretin Quiles stated that "hashish or resin 40% pure are more dangerous than cocaine that has been cut". Not only is this statement ridiculous, but it proves how incompetent he is — hashish and resin are the same thing! In fact, in Britain, cannabis offences make up 90% of all drugs offences.

Research

One researcher into tobacco made the sensible statement that any organic substances administered through smoking them would be carcinogenic. This would include herbal tobacco and cannabis. Research has discovered that marijuana contains three times more tars and five times more carbon monoxide than tobacco. Tars and carbon monoxide have been shown to be major reasons — alongside nicotine itself — as to why tobacco is so dangerous to health. Marijuana can also increase the heart rate drastically, which could set off heart attacks in people with cardiac problems. Set against this is the fact that regular users usually consume much less marijuana than an average tobacco smoker, and many prefer to eat it rather than smoke it.

For a long time it has been known that marijuana actually significantly helped people suffering from some illnesses. It is used by thousands of people suffering from multiple sclerosis, glaucoma and cancer, and others with chronic pain. In 1990 an Aids sufferer in the United States was arrested for possessing two cannabis plants. Ten narcotics agents broke down the door of his trailer and held a gun to his wife's head. Subsequently he became the second person in American history to obtain the drug legally, although this right was taken away the following year.

In fact in the last century, from 1842 to 1900, cannabis was used in half of all medicine sold in the United States. The writer Robert Burton recommended it for depression in his Anatomy of Melancholy written in England in 1621. So why then has cannabis become such a demon drug? The fact is that cannabis is a product of the hemp plant, used not only to make rope and seed for caged birds, but also as cloth, a substitute for paper and even as an alternative to oil. It was a cartel of the paper industry, the newly-emerging synthetic fibres industry and the oil companies, that backed Harry Anslinger, chief of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics in his crusade against marijuana. What had been one of the world's main agricultural crops up until the late 19th century was annihilated.

In the anti-cannabis crusade, accusations were made that it led to violence, when all findings point to it calming and pacifying. Indeed many see it as a safer and non-toxic alternative to tranquillisers. So it comes as no surprise that many of the 4,000 'Families Against Marijuana'

PORNOGRAPHY AND THE SEX INDUSTRY

The ACF has opened up the pages of Organise! to the debate on the issue of pornography and the sex industry. As we have no 'line' on this issue we have included articles from different points of view. The first two anti-pornography articles were written by an ACF member and the interview with the Feminists Against Censorship could be loosely described as pro-pornography from a feminist perspective. The interview has been edited in order to keep it to a manageable length but this did not change in any way the arguments presented. We look forward to other contributions on this topic in future issues of Organise!

The Sex Industry

THE SEX INDUSTRY, today, is one of capitalism's major areas of economic growth. More and more people, particularly women and increasingly children, are being drawn into it as poverty bites harder. But what is the sex industry? And why is it growing?

The sex industry takes many forms — pornography, prostitution, strip joints, sex tourism and so on. Pornography is the propaganda wing of the sex industry (this is the subject of a separate article). It defines and disseminates sexual exploitation. For example, prostitutes say that punters will often bring pornographic magazines with them to show what they want to do. This is part of the sex industry's ideology that all women are essentially whores.

Often one thing leads to another. Women doing strip shows or posing for magazines may well find themselves making videos or working as prostitutes.

Throughout civilized history prostitutes have acted as a valve for releasing social pressure, and have consequently always suffered appalling abuse. More recently has seen the growth of sex tourism. As the industry has developed new perversions and greater financial rewards, so the need for more desperate people who are prepared to meet these demands has grown. So, now men buy their sex in the third world, where life is a little cheaper.

Our sexuality is deeply personal. While sexual acts with others are a basic act of communism, as we freely give ourselves in a mutual exchange of pleasure. Yet the sex industry seeks to commodify this and sell it to us, distorting and debasing it in the process. This is a fundamental attack on mutuality, turning our bodies into saleable merchandise.

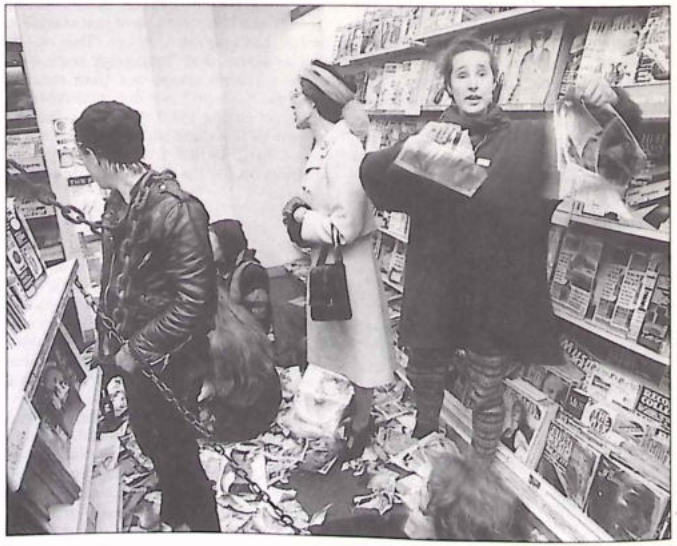
The sex industry is highly patriarchal. It promotes sex as a power relationship — the male as the fucker, the female as the fucked. Lesbians are merely 'wannabe men', providing titillation for real men. While homosexual men must play the male/female role with the he-man (the taker) and the she-man (the taken).

Obviously mutual sex by its very nature is an unsaleable commodity, so the sex industry seeks to destroy it and make sex into an act of individual pleasure through power. This manifests itself as the increasing identification of sexual freedom and pleasure with perversion and fetishisation.

While the sexual liberals extol the virtues of this supposed revolution, true sexual freedom is being curtailed all around us by 'our moral guardians' — the church and the state. Homosexuality is increasingly criminalised, any form of nudity or partial nudity is likely to get you arrested, our gender roles become ever more restrictive, and obscenity laws are used to suppress dissent.

Liberals defend the sex industry on the basis that people freely chose their own sexual preference. This is clearly rubbish. Those who buy their sex as a commodity may well be making decisions to use their economic power over others. Yet there is no such choice for the sex workers. The argument that they freely choose what they do is a lie, it is part of the myth of patriarchal relationships — that women want it, they can't get enough and that the male is merely doing them a service. Are we really supposed to believe that women (and some men) make a conscious decision that they would like to be raped by strange men for a few quid, for the foreseeable future? It is a disgraceful lie which ignores the coercion of pimps and businessmen, and the more-often-than-not drugs and alcohol dependency which sex workers developed from trying to nullify their senses.

It is a vicious circle — less sensitivity requires more drugs, which requires more money ie more prostitution, which requires more drugs and so on. It also ignores the reality of the vast numbers of women and children worldwide who are sold into sex slavery. The sex industry is not victimless. It ruins millions of lives and it destroys true sexual freedom for us all. We support the self-organisation of sex workers, both those within the industry and whose who have escaped it. We support its victims and those trying to rebuild shattered lives, and those who have fought back. We do not condemn sex workers, we condemn those who profit, exploit and rape them. We support sexual liberation and condemn sexual reaction.



Pornography, Sex and Social Control

PORNOGRAPHY IS THE propaganda wing of the sex industry. It defines the commodification of sex and promotes its saleability. It also promotes the patriarchal social relationship of male superiority over females, mainly through power and force.

Pornography's basic tenet is that 'all women are whores'. This implies that all female actions are geared towards sex and that men are the abused party as they try to fulfill the female's sexual needs. The 'logical' extension of this is that there is no such thing as rape, because when women say NO they really mean YES.

Within capitalism sex must be a saleable commodity, and as a basic human instinct it can also be used as a means of social control.

To sell sex, pornography must constantly change its product. To do this it promotes fetishisation and perversion, which have become almost endless in number. For example, French maids, stockings, high heels and so on. The objectification of women is a constant throughout all of this.

It is also racist in that it sees black/Asian/oriental women as specific fetishes. It promotes them as more primitive and sexually debased. It is also the promoter of international sex slavery and sex tourism where women and children can be bought and sold for loose change.

By commodifying sex, pornography reinforces the hierarchical power relationship between the buyer and the bought, through gender, through class and often race. This serves to reinforce the social position of individuals in society.

Social control, however, extends much further. Pornography promotes the freedom of individuals (to exploit others of 'inferior' class, gender or race), in private. By setting the agenda, pornography can control social behaviour, whilst the sex industry sells them the product. It is a powerful weapon, as isolated individuals or couples strive to be 'normal'. Without a voice of opposition, pornography passes itself off as the voice of normality. And once again we are told to lock ourselves away in our own homes, so while individuals are getting their kicks out of pornographic videos, they are failing to form relationships within their community, be they sexual or otherwise. It is obviously also much easier to buy a prostitute than form mutual relationships as we become increasingly socially inept.

This is also in keeping with the agenda of our 'moral guardians'. For example, the recent parliamentary debate on the homosexual age of consent, MPs arguing for a reduction to 16 years of age stated that what individuals do in the privacy of their own homes was their own business (the age was actually lowered from 21 to 18). Of course, as parliament has proved on numerous occasions recently, what homosexuals do in public is certainly not their own business. Once again we see liberated sexuality (in this instance homosexuality) being criminalised, while gender oppression is freely promoted by pornographers.

The pornographers' agenda has reached deep into society. In Hollywood movies women are always 'taken' by the male in the now obligatory sex scenes, which are thrown in as routine. Pop music heroes today are exclusively talentless 'pretty' boys and girls, with a pout and a panache for miming to songs of teenage sexual angst. This also provides the majority of copy for teenage magazines. Women's magazines have three subjects, sex, climbing the career ladder, more sex. Popular fiction of the Jilly Cooper type is obsessed with upper class sexual antics. Newspapers are filled from cover to cover with who's bonking who, sex ads, practically naked surgically altered women and handy hints to improve your technique. Television channels in their desperation for ratings throw in explicit sex scenes and masses of sexual discussion shows.

You may think that society is becoming more open about sex. But while we are being fed this facile nonsense, capital's continuing onslaught against us slips by without note. No questioning of genocide in East Timor, no acknowledgment of benefit cuts, or losses to worker's rights, or elderly people dying of hypothermia. In fact, nothing at all. We are fed a diet of sex and blissful ignorance.

It even serves to destroy our sexuality. What should be a voyage of discovery is for many teenagers a living nightmare. The onset of puberty is for children increasingly means a mad dash to lose their virginity, which is nothing more than a stupid, meaningless definition anyway. Allied to this are the increases in teenage pregnancies and the potential health risks (eg cervical cancer). And then having done this the sexual attitudes of society serve to make them, particularly females, feel dirty and cheap.

The sexual icons of the pornographers/mass media show us that we are not desirable. Again this is aimed primarily at women. And lo-and-behold waiting in the wings are the vivisectors (cosmetic surgeons) and the multi-billion dollar cosmetics/beauty industry to hook us to their worthless products.

But has the pornographer's agenda helped sexual liberation at all? On the contrary it has served to maintain low self esteem amongst women. It profits from women feeling worthless, inferior and inadequate. It has actively promoted the mindless macho posturing of many men, and has served to promote and maintain the patriarchal power relationship within capitalism. It promotes the marginalisation and oppression of homosexuals, bisexuals and lesbians. Our sexuality should be celebrated as an expression of ourselves in free commune with others. Pornography is an enemy of that freedom. It must be destroyed.

Interview with Avedon Carol of Feminists Against Censorship

Q: Why Feminists Against Censorship?
A: Despite the fact that feminists had been through the censorship battles against political material, against black culture, and against feminist materials and after seeing how little the state could be trusted, we had always been anti-censorship. But there was suddenly this anti-pornography movement claiming to speak for us and getting all the media attention, and everyone thought that's what feminists actually wanted. No one bothered to ask the women in this country who had been feminists since the late '60s, the Ruskin Hall conference, so those women decided to put a group together to remind people we were still here.

Q: Yes. I heard you say there that there was a problem with a legalistic approach because laws could always be used by the state or by men against feminists. What do you think of other activities there have been, such as pickets outside sex shops?
A: Well, we think it's a waste of feminist time. What's so terrible about pornography in the first place? Pornography is just pictures of people having sex. That's not where the problem is. There's sexism throughout the media. Why have they gone for pornography? Pornography's actually less violent and in many respects less sexist than a lot of other media. There are a lot of assumptions about violence and about women that never make it into pornography. Just as an example, most people, at some point in their lives, hear some man say something like, "If I find my wife's been with another guy, I'll kill her." You never see that type of ideology in pornography. Nobody does that type of thing. The idea that you'll kill a woman just because she has sex with someone else is the furthest thing from what goes on in pornography. Because in pornography sex is a good thing.

Q: So you're saying pornography is a diversion?
A: Pornography is a total distraction, it's a very dangerous distraction from real issues. We always used to talk about things like reproductive issues and how women's role as the primary caretaker distorts children's attitudes and keeps us out of the work force, keeps us pinned down, keeps us from having any economic power and keeps us making less money. And now we're not talking about the whole way the woman staying home with the kids has been institutionalised and kept women from having real power. And talking about pornography is just such a red herring. Because all pornography is about is: some people like to have sex. How does that stop women from getting into the work force and making money?

Q: I suppose the riposte to saying that pornography is a distraction, is to say that campaigning against the censorship of pornography is also a diversion.
A: No, it's not. Because unless we can address sexual issues, we cannot address feminist issues. One thing that's always been very important to the feminist movement is the fact that part of the stereotype of women is that we are sort of apart from sex, that it's something that belongs to men that men have to get from us. If we can't get rid of that, we can't get rid of a lot of the problems we have. And if you look at, for example, the studies of actual violent sex offenders, you discover that they have been people who have been taught negative images about pornography and about masturbation and sexuality which they project onto us. That is a principle source of things like rape and domestic violence. So we need to promote a much more positive view of sex and of women as real subjects in sex rather than just as objects. The moral right isn't going to let us do that. They're going to use their anti-pornography laws to stop us from doing it. So we not only don't see the point of wasting time campaigning against pornography, we consider it as giving fuel to the moral right. It's worked, too. You didn't hear much from Mary Whitehouse until the anti-porn 'feminists' came along, and then suddenly we have the Criminal Justice Bill with all that new power for the police to come into your home and take all of your media without a warrant.

Q: Presumably, they see your campaign as a threat against their power.
A: Yes. And it's very interesting that when we talk about domestic violence, the police tend to say they don't have the money and manpower to deal with this type of issue. They can't afford training people on the issue and things like that; but at the same time, we're seeing all this energy put into pornography, which for some reason they think is really important. And the Obscene Publications Squad has trebled its size and quadrupled its budget in the last few years. So they have money to launch these enormous campaigns against things they don't like. The classic example of time-wasting by the police: the West Midlands Police, who are of course famous for their popular behaviour, sent 65 cops to hang around a sauna for two years to see if any gay men were having sex there. What is this about? They're policing our sexuality, which nobody really wants, but they haven't got time to go after real crime and real violence. They have money to hang around in saunas chasing queers, to break into your house looking for lewd pictures or something. In spite of the image the National Viewers' and Listeners' Association promotes, most people do not want the cops to be wasting their time and taxes on this sort of thing.

Q: Going back to what you were saying earlier about sex-offenders, in November '92 there was a Channel 4 Dispatches Programme...
A: Ah yes, the famous Channel 4 Dispatches, the total misrepresentation of research on pornography. I really liked the part about when we ask boys where they learn their sex information, the ones who say 'pornography', believe in rape myths. They didn't tell you if the other boys had seen pornography, or whether the boys who said 'pornography' had seen anything else. They didn't tell you whether the boys were just saying the first thing that popped into their heads, or what kind of pornography they had been seeing. Playboy? That's probably what 12-year-old boys mean when they say 'pornography', and Playboy doesn't say anything about rape. Playboy is as opposed to rape editorially as any feminist is, so where do they get these rape myths? They didn't get it from pornography. They got it from their right-wing, conservative parents who didn't let them go to sex education classes, and who taught them that sex is dirty and women who like sex are tramps.

Q: One of the women on that programme had been shown pornography as a prelude to sexual acts and abuse.
A: Well sometimes people just talk about sexual acts, without any porn. If we're talking about sexual abuse, before there was porn men just used to force it on women and children. They would use the English language, but nobody ever tried to ban the spoken word on the grounds that it was used to coerce people into unwanted sex. A photograph of a sex act is a means of communication in those terms. You could be saying, "What do you think of this, I'd like to do it", and if your partner says, "It doesn't do anything for me, I'd rather not," that could be the end of it. What kind of a person you are determines what happens next. But, if you're the sort of person who says, "I want to do this, and you're going to have to do it," aren't you the same kind of husband who can't stand his wife talking to her friends, the kind of husband who knocks his wife around the house when she doesn't cook like Mom did and keep the house the way he likes? Abusive husbands don't stop at sex. Some of them are the other direction as far as sex: "What are you, some kind of tramp? You're always trying to have sex!" They do that too. But more women have been knocked around the house for other reasons, like not keeping house right, talking to other men.

Q: So the power relation was already wrong in that family?
A: The relationship was bad. This was a guy who was an abuser, who already has those repulsive sexist attitudes that make him think, "Oh yes, it's okay for me to treat my wife like she's an appliance who has to do things just so." And that's what we have to deal with: the attitudes that a lot of people still have about what a female partner is supposed to do in a relationship. But that of course will be dealing with sexism, which apparently the anti-pornography lot don't want to talk about any more.

Q: Catharine McKinnon has put forward the idea of using the law against material that is degrading to women or encourages attacks on them.
A: And now we're again back to arguing about the research. The research says it doesn't. But 'degrading' — this is a term that a lot of anti-pornography women use — Catherine Mackinnon and Andrea Dworkin use it a lot — and we're still trying to figure out what it means. As far as I can tell, where Dworkin and MacKinnon are concerned, any woman who takes off her clothes and/or has sex in front of a camera is being degraded. There are no circumstances a woman in her right mind, with free choice, would willingly do this. Therefore, it is impossible for a woman to actually consent to appear in pornography. Andrea Dworkin also believes that intercourse itself is degrading and oppressive to women. In fact it is the source and centre of all sexism. So any picture of a woman having sex is basically degrading to women. The Campaign Against Pornography and Censorship — which was founded by Catherine Itzin, who that programme was really about — they believe in something called 'erotica'. They're against pornography, but for erotica. Erotica would be pornography that didn't offend them, that isn't degrading. But again, we haven't been able to figure out what that is, that erotica stuff. They seem, when it gets down to cases, to think that all pornography, however defined, is degrading.

Q: My understanding is that the distinction is drawn around power fantasies.
A: No, because that distinction doesn't really come into play when you read what they talk about. Sucking cock is apparently always degrading. It's this kind of deconstruction that any image a man might look at and get aroused by — and of course it's always men, because women don't actually get aroused by anything — that any image that a man gets aroused by is de facto violent and therefore pornography. And that's an issue for us as well, because the definition of pornography in the dictionary is quite clear that it is any material that is intended to sexually arouse and anybody who goes into a porn shop knows that it is just about sex. That's what it's for. Even the stuff with a story, it's all going on in the context of the porn field, so it's not about people's other lives — it doesn't really say anything about their other lives — it's about their sex lives. But according to people like Dworkin, MacKinnon and Itzin and that crowd it's not about that. Pornography is a special word which means something else completely. It just happens to also be about sexually arousing material, but it's stuff that's degrading, violent and so on, right? But then you have to ask, well, things that are degrading, violent and somehow are bad, why single out the fact they are sexual? Why is it that we're not also going after other degrading and violent material? You can see people killed on television, and you have religious people saying horribly degrading and sexist things all the time. But you can't show people making love. That's the society we live in and that's the society that hates women.

Q: Linda Lovelace has spoken about being damaged by porn.
A: She was damaged by Chuck Traynor who was this really abusive partner she had. He was a real creep. And he did force her to do a lot of things, including act in pornography. But if you actually read her book, Ordeal, she talks about how being in the porn film is almost the best part of the relationship because even though he beat her up to be in it and she hadn't wanted to be in it, that was the one place she had a feeling of camaraderie with other people, because he'd allowed her to be in the company of other people, where she could talk to them from time to time. But she had to get away from this creep, and she didn't know how, because she knew she was in this part of society that people regard as scum. This woman felt she had no credibility because she's a porn star. She's nothing. She's dirt. Scum of the earth. Of course, she felt harmed and degraded. If it was considered a respectable profession, she would probably have done it without being forced. It would have just been a job. Of course there are people who are not cut out to be hookers and there are people who aren't cut out to be porn stars, but there are also people who aren't cut out to be office clerks, secretaries, factory workers, and frankly I don't know a lot of people who are inspired to go and do things like factory work. It's the kind of job you do when you can't get another job. I know women who've gone into prostitution to get out of office work. So it really depends a lot on how you perceive the job. For some women it would be a lot more degrading to have to do work in a factory than to be a porn star, which is why so many women try to be page three girls and glamour models and whatever. A lot of people make the mistake of looking at Linda Lovelace and assuming that there's a direct relationship between abusive partners and porn.

Q: I'll just end with a couple of allegations I've heard made against FAC.

A: Oh please, I love our allegations.
Q: One of which is that you're a sex industry front.
A: Ah yes, I love that one. We had a leaflet from the Cambridge Anarchists, thay call themselves. They aren't anarchists, I don't know whether they're from Cambridge. It said the porn industry is our largest media industry, bigger than the film, recording and video industries combined and it has a front organisation called Feminists Against Censorship. In fact we were THE front organisation, as I recall. Of course, none of this is true. First of all, it's a hallucination that the porn industry is bigger than all other media. This is figures from Mars. But aside from that, we're hardline feminists. When we got together we were old-fashioned women's liberationists from the late '60s and early '70s, mostly well-known feminist activists, people from Silver Moon, International Socialists, GLF, the anarcho-feminists, women who were at Ruskin Hall for the first feminist Conference in this country, the original Red Rag collective, the Feminist Review collective, Elizabeth Wilson and so on. These are the women who showed up and were dismissed as being in the pay of pornographers. We're not stupid. We're not people who don't know anything about feminism. We're people who in some cases risked our potential careers in order to promote feminism. And we're being told we cannot disagree with these anti-porn women unless we're in the pay of the pornographers. We can't think for ourselves. Is that patronising? Is that sexist? Yes of course it is. It's ludicrous to say that a woman would not have doubts about giving the state that kind of power to control what we can say about sex unless she was in the pay of pornographers. We didn't know any pornographers. The only reason we know any pornographers is that after we'd been around for a few years, a couple of women who worked in the porn industry heard about organisations set up in the USA are funded by the pharmaceutical companies, as well as — would you believe it? — the tobacco and alcohol industries.

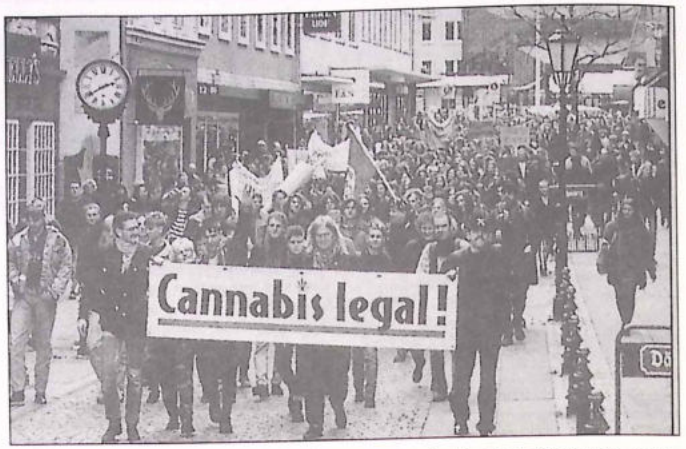
It is estimated that one and a half million people use cannabis in Britain. If you add the number who occasionally use it, have used it in the past or knowingly mix with people who do, then the scale of defiance of anti-cannabis laws is spectacular. This is one reason why some police chiefs are tentatively moving towards decriminalisation. They know the law is becoming increasingly unenforceable.

So why then is it not legalised? Several reasons. First, to legalise it would mean admitting that the charges against cannabis over the last half century were a tissue of lies and scare-mongering. Secondly, despite its widespread use amongst the aristocracy and other sections of the ruling class, those who administer the system still associate its use with non-conformism and rebellion and the 'permissive' '60s. Their hatred of it is the same as their other irrational fears and prejudices, their racism, sexism and homophobia. Thirdly, as we have already pointed out, it can always be used to start another moral panic, and to mount large-scale repressive operations, whether in the impoverished inner cities of America, Britain, or France or in Latin America.



The criminalisation of cannabis is a relatively minor item on the agenda of the ruling class. If necessary, the time may come when the ruling class does indeed legalise it, and turn it into an official product that could be another source of revenue for the State. Obviously, as anarchist communists we would welcome the repeal of any repressive laws that saved many from harassment, fines and prison. But neither do we fall into the trap of thinking that smoking dope is somehow a revolutionary act, as some people believed in the '60s and '70s and some people still do.

us and realised they'd finally ran into a feminist group that didn't treat them like scum, so they joined. But they didn't invent us, they didn't make our policy. It's nice that, unlike the rest of us, they don't have to hide their connection with FAC from their employers, but they certainly aren't getting anything from their bosses over it, either, for them or for FAC. They're just getting paid what anyone in the publishing industry is paid on any magazine. And certainly no one is giving me any money!

The other side thinks we're all collecting huge pay-cheques from Penthouse or something, but none of us gets paid for this. Mostly we're out-of-pocket.

REVIEWS

THE BATTLE FOR HYDE PARK: RUFFIANS, RADICALS & RAVERS 1855-1994. Published by Practical History. Donation/SAE.

ONE LINE THE ruling class likes to put over particularly when its armed thugs get a good kicking at the hands of pissed-off proletarians, is that violence is alien to British political life. Patently, nothing could be further from the truth. State violence has, as in all capitalist societies, been a permanent feature in Britain. Likewise, working class violence has always been bubbling under the surface, threatening to expose the facade of social peace. Hyde Park, London, has often been the site of the more spectacular eruptions of working class violence. The above publication outlines some of these.

Giving a brief history of the park, the anonymous authors set the scene for absorbing and often amusing accounts of the conflicts that have taken place there. What is interesting, though not surprising, is that often the ostensible motivations behind the demonstrations, which in 1855, 1866-67 and 1932 were somewhat less than revolutionary, were superseded by events and battles which often developed a semi-insurrectionary character and consciousness. Readers will also find the press reports echo down the years and yesterday's 'ruffians' had the same role in media demonisation as today's 'hardcore of 200 trouble makers'.

Particularly interesting are the reports of the 1855 'disturbances' by one K. Marx. Nice to think that he occasionally made it out of the British Library reading room.

All in all, this publication is a welcome contribution to our 'hidden' history. Available from: Practical History, 121 Railton Road, London SE24.

SCOTTISH ANARCHIST

SCOTTISH ANARCHIST IS the journal of the Scottish Federation of Anarchists (SFA), which formed last year and involves members of the ACF. The SFA places itself firmly in the tradition of class struggle anarchism and Scottish Anarchist reflects this.

Contained within its 28 pages are articles on the ongoing struggles around the Broughton Street self-managed centre in Edinburgh, closed circuit TV/state surveillance in Glasgow and an angry look back at the Timex strike in Dundee and its sabotage by the unions. There is also interesting historical articles on anarchism in Spain and in Scotland itself. Add to this several more well-researched articles covering a wide variety of topics and you have what will hopefully serve as a useful tool for agitation and medium for the discussion of revolutionary ideas in Scotland and beyond. We wish the project well.

Single copies cost a pound but donations are obviously greatly appreciated.

A donation will also procure some of the excellent three-colour agitational stickers produced by the Glasgow Anarchists. Write to: Scottish Anarchist, c/o Glasgow Anarchist Group, PO Box 1008, Glasgow G42 8AA, Scotland.

Kate Sharpley Library

THE KATE SHARPLEY Library, named in honour of a first-world war anarchist and anti-war activist, has been in existence for the past eight years and now has storage space in Northamptonshire.

The library is funded by private donations and bequests from comrades and includes works in over 20 languages, covering the history of the anarchist movement over the last century. The collection is probably now the largest in England.

The library is run by a working group, which is in the process of creating a complete database of the entire collection. The group is keen to continue expanding the collection and asks that all anarchist groups and publications worldwide add the library to their mailing lists. The library is also keen for comrades to donate suitable material, and can arrange collection.

All articles in the magazine are by ACF members unless signed. Some reflect ACF policy and others open up debate in undiscussed areas, helping us to develop our ideas further.

Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! — as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree with our A&Ps at all.)

Deadlines for next issue are 4th March for features and reviews, and 10th March for letters and news.

We had to hold over our article on Cuba for this issue, but rest assured, it will appear in the next one, as well as features on sport, and artists and anarchism. All contributions for the next issue should be sent to:

PRESS FUND

YOU'VE DONE IT! What a magnificent response from ACF members, supporters and Organise! readers! In issue 35 we launched a Press Appeal for £2000 to help Organise! grow in number of pages and in frequency of appearance. Not only did you meet the target by this issue, you've gone way above it!

Money received so far comes to £281. This month we received London WC1 £75; Northumberland £80; Liverpool £4; East London £75; Sheffield £60; Aylesbury £2; South London £115 and finally a generous benefactor in London, £2,000! That means we've received £2,692. An excellent and enthusing response.

But we can't get complacent. This is still a small sum set against the cost of getting new computer equipment for layout and to start to bring about the changes that we hope to achieve in Organise! Remember, no matter how small, any sum towards our Press Fund is very much appreciated, be it 10p, £5 or a million quid. Please keep the money coming in. Show us you appreciate the work we're doing and rush cheques, POs, IMOs to us as soon as possible! You can even send us a standing order to our account. All donations to London address.

HUMAN NATURE

THE QUESTION OF human nature is a fundamental starting point of any political and social philosophy. The major historic political philosophers such as Hobbes and Rousseau had very definite views on the subject, that shaped the nature of their proposed ideal societies.

Generally speaking, political standpoints which have a 'pessimistic' view of human nature are on the right of capitalism. 'Pessimism' in this context means that human beings (or at least the masses) are seen as morally weak, corruptible, greedy and deserving of leadership. Societies, seen from this approach, should be constructed on a hierarchical basis, with the weak masses being controlled by an enlightened, or otherwise superior, élite or ruling class. Fascism and conservatism share the view that leadership, the strong state to enforce the leadership, and economic inequality, are desirable, being in accordance with the reality of human nature.

Propaganda

It must be admitted that in British society as a whole, and indeed in many others, many working people share a pessimistic approach, by and large. Decades of propaganda have been swallowed whole through the schools and the media, and the need for social inequality and the impossibility of an egalitarian society are generally accepted. Human nature, we are assured, makes a just and equal society an impossible utopian dream.

Anarchist communism as a political doctrine involves an 'optimistic' view of human nature, whilst taking a very critical (some would say cynical) view of the realities of present-day social and political organisations involved within the capitalist system. We obviously reject the pessimism of the right, which we are convinced is nothing more than a justification of exploitation of most of humankind. How can such an optimistic approach to human nature be justified on the part of anarchist communists?

Firstly, we look to anthropology to show that human societies have been and are often organised on communistic lines. Here, Harold Barclay's People Without Government and Pierre Clastre's Society Against the State contain numerous examples of peoples living without classes or the State perfectly happily. Archaeology tells us that the State and economic classes only emerged in a number of places about 5,000 years ago (Iraq, Egypt etc) and that the rest of us coped without the State for a lot longer. The reasons why the State and classes did emerge are controversial issues, but the truth is that humans lived in classless societies for tens of thousands of years. If human nature was selfish, individualistic, greedy, mean etc, such societies could never have existed, never mind surviving for millennia.

Impossible

Now, it is impossible to 'prove' the anarchist communist case that people are basically cooperative and social in their approach to life. After all, there are daily examples of individuals acting in selfish and uncaring ways. Our reply to this is that the development of hierarchy, social classes, the State and capitalism have all taken their toll and have distorted our fundamental human natures. Human beings, unlike all other living creatures, have the capacity to act consciously against their natures (deliberately abstaining from food or sex, for example) and equally are highly flexible in their response to 'abnormal' social conditions which typify everyday life. What is remarkable is that given the fundamentally anti-human nature of capitalist society, so many people still retain any sense of cooperativeness, solidarity and caring approaches to life.

People also need security in their everyday lives within the context of community solidarity and cohesiveness. In inter-war Germany, conditions were so desperate that millions of people opted for the illusory sense of security that fascism offered, rather than bourgeois democracy (for an interesting discussion of this see Erich Fromm's Fear of Freedom). Today, the desperate need for security and community induces people to join all sorts of religious cults. The rise of alternative religions in the West is directly attributable to the essentially anti-human qualities of capitalism.

Along with the basic needs of community and security (both economic and psychological) humans must have a significant degree of personal autonomy, or if you like, freedom, if they are to develop according to their natures. Capitalist societies offer the illusion of freedom whilst enslaving millions in factories, shops, offices and the home. The political and legal systems fix the limits of freedom ever more narrowly, distorting and deforming in all sorts of ways the daily lives of working people. Exploitation and domination by capitalism has created an army of confused and lost people, unable to relate with others on a meaningful level.

Conformity

Children are moulded to conform to a sexual division of labour. Boys are cajoled into playing active, aggressive and masculine roles. Their sensitivities must be suppressed — "Big boys don't cry" — and they are conditioned to deny themselves. Girls in contrast are brought up to be passive and dependent, with the ultimate aim of motherhood, to achieve completeness as a person. Socialisation of this sort begins at birth. 'Masculine' and 'feminine' behaviour is not natural, but has to be learned through a long, and often painful, process. No wonder that so many people are fucked up, given that the process is imposed on all, regardless of their sensitivities.

Only anarchist communism allows f the full development of human beings. alone bases its approach upon the base of community, solidarity, personal autor omy and collective security within a non exploitative, classless society. Though human nature is necessarily very complex with the interplay of various desires and needs, only in the anarchist communist society of the future can it be revealed in all its fullness. Creativity, love, belonging and freedom are mutilated qualities in today's world. In the society of the future, they will be set free.

Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists.
We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.
2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class. Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.
3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.
4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.
5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.
6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.
7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc).
Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery.
Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may streng-then us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.
8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.
9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class.
However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise ourselves on a federative basis.
We reject sectarianism and work for a united, revolutionary anarchist movement.

An upsurge in struggle?

Postal workers

SOME 650 POSTAL WORKERS walked out of the sorting office in St Pancras Way, North London in January after a driver was suspended for refusing to drive a van he regarded as unsafe.

Senior Post Office bosses immediately gained an injunction from the High Court which ruled the strike illegal because no ballot had taken place. The same day the bosses backed down and offered to reinstate the driver. The following day a mass meeting of posties rejected the offer, defied the court order and the postal union, the Union of Communications Workers and refused to return to work. They stayed out for three days.

Wildcat action

On 19th January, 150 postal workers were suspended as a result of this. Wildcat action, outside and against union control, broke out involving 15,000 workers in North West and West London.

The action might have escalated to encompass the whole of Britain, when two postal workers in Glasgow were disciplined for refusing to implement new working practices. Terrified management quickly dropped charges against the Scots.

The UCW, of course, steamed in to sabotage the struggle. The national UCW leadership were terrified that they would be fined if the court order was flouted, in the initial action.

They again intervened to head off the 15,000 strong action. They made a deal that the strikers would have the suspensions dropped, and agreed with management that the speed-up practices, involving a computer-operated system known as CADRE should continue. They had already agreed its implementation in the first place. This did not stop the UCW getting a fine of £7,500 plus £100,000 legal costs for failing to control the workers. They know they must do better next time.

Discontent is simmering among postal workers, however, and even the most desperate measures of the UCW may not be able to head further action off.

The continuing defiance of the union by workers is highly encouraging and should be an example to those in other industries.

Health workers

The derisory one per cent pay offer to health workers has caused widespread outrage. Coupled with this is the attempt to split health workers by local bargaining, where a possible two per cent extra is offered.

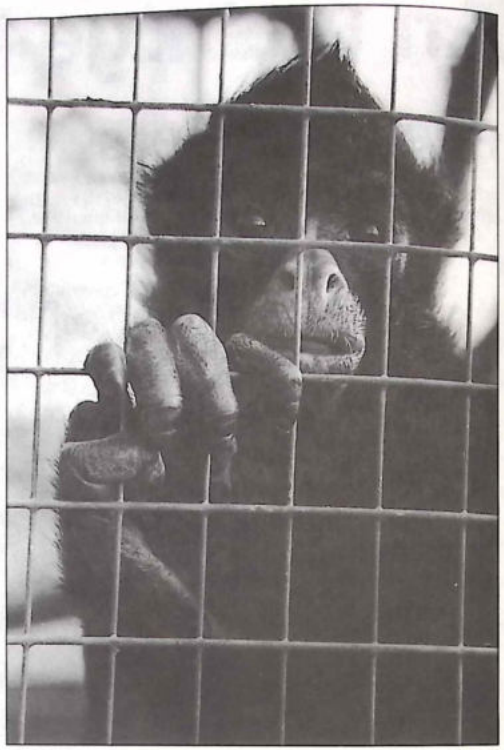
Part of the ludicrous pay rise will be withheld if too many, whatever that is, days are taken off sick. This sickness quota together with productivity targets is being forced on workers by local trusts. The South Devon NHS trust in Torquay has sacked workers who failed to give 'convincing' reasons for being off sick. Days off sick are a natural consequence of heavy workloads and stress suffered by health workers, as well as a healthy desire to avoid wage slavery! These vicious attacks coincide with the trusts paying managers bonuses of up to £10,000 a year. These were worth 6.2% to chief executives, 7.2% to directors and 5.8% to other managers.

The local bargaining is part of a national plan by the boss class to divide workforces. But the anger among health workers is growing by the day. This simmering discontent forced even the pathetic Royal College of Nursing and Royal College of Midwives to drop their no strike clauses. This is just window-dressing however. Both the RCN and RCM will continue to peddle the myth of 'professionalism' and to sabotage action, along with the more militant-sounding UNISON. This myth has a grip on many nurses and midwives, and is something that will have to be broken with if any effective action is to take place. Arrogance and condescension to ancillary workers by nurses will also have to be cast aside. Any future action for health workers must involve the development of mass meetings and action committeees that break with unions and unite all health workers.

Action in other workplaces is also developing, in particular amongst teachers and further education teachers. The strike at Southwark is an example of this. The possibilities of a winter, if not an autumn of discontent are stronger now than they have been for a long time. Revolutionaries must make sure that they support and attempt to radicalise these struggles.

Animal riots



MASS DIRECT ACTION that had widespread effects? We can't be far from a revolutionary situation, then, can we? Not if the issue itself is the transportation of calves to be slaughtered for veal on the continent.

From the start of the protests against transportation, much of the establishment press, including that which openly backs the Conservatives, initially took a sympathetic view. This was hardly because they thought that the politics of some of those involved met with their approval, but because here was another stick with which to beat the pro-Europeans inside and outside the Conservative Party. Another barbaric practice to be added to the record of those foreigners across the Channel, who weren't like us. Never mind the horrific animal experiments and factory farming carrying on as normal in Britain, here was a good opportunity for a bit of Euro-mugging. Witness the involvement of figures like Teddy Taylor and Alan Clark, who situate themselves on the Tory right.

Jill Phipps, who described herself as an anarchist, would have had no time for these scum (just as she would have had no time for the religious ceremony put on at Coventry Cathedral after her death).

Calf love

Many of those involved in the actions were genuinely sickened by the treatment of animals.

At Brightlingsea, practically the whole community mobilised against the transportations. Similarly in Shoreham 80 local people were arrested. What was important about these actions was the way the nature of the police was revealed for the first time to many hundreds. Tooled up in riot gear, the cops went in heavily in many instances against the demonstrators and hundreds of injuries were suffered.

But where is the same action protesting against the thousands of homeless sleeping rough? Against the continued arms trade? Against the hospital closures and mass redundancies?

The actions developed into a dangerous cross-class mobilisation with the Conservative right moving in to exploit the situation.

Barbarism

Of course the transportation of calves is barbaric. So is the factory farming of cattle and poultry carried out in Britain. So are the experiments in which 3.5 million animals are killed every year in Britain carried out by the drugs and cosmetics industries. A leading drug company Giba Geigy admitted that 95% of substances passed safe by animal experimenting are immediately rejected by humans.

But the reason these things happen is because of PROFIT. It's big money for the drugs companies, for the factory farmers, for the meat industry. The symptoms of a sick society, like homelessness, unemployment, alienation and boredom, wage slavery and war, will only disappear when that sick society is put out of its misery. That means not just taking a stand against the exploitation of animals, but against the exploitation of working class people and the destruction of the planet.

Not so jolly?

CHRISTOPHER BARRETT-JOLLEY owns Phoenix Aviation which transports calves from Coventry Airport (it was protests against this which involved the death of Jill Phipps) and is no newcomer to making a quick buck out of death and misery.

Arms and drugs

In 1993 one of his pilots was busted for smuggling large amounts of cocaine and heroin into Britain. Barrett-Jolley has extensive interests in West Africa, where the drugs are believed to have originated, not least through his arms dealing.

In June 1994 he piloted at least five flights to South Yemen to supply South Yemeni forces with arms. These included bombs, mortars and Kalashnikov rifles.

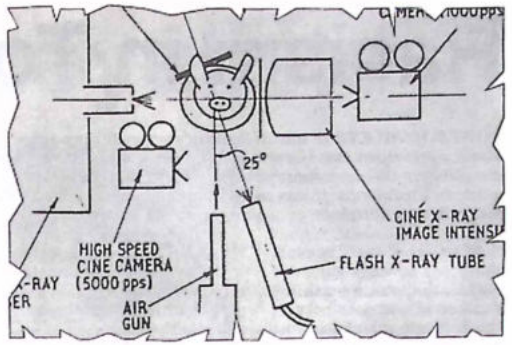
The following month he supplied UNITA forces in Angola with at least one 44-ton shipment. It is believed he made many further shipments to keep both sides in the civil war supplied with arms.

In November he attacked a 67-year-old woman protestor with a crowbar, beating her with it and smashing the windscreen of her car. He was involved in further violent incidents, driving vehicles at protestors — one of whom is still receiving hospital treatment.

'Honest' victim?

Funny then, that few charges have actually been brought against him by the police. Funny that Coventry police brought out 100 cops against just 33 protestors. Funny how he masquerades as an 'honest' (is there such a thing?) businessman victimised by extremist thugs, and how the press had a field day when a group of people angered by Jill Phipps' death, turned up at his HQ to smash a few windows. But then these are violent, rent-a-mob yobbos, whilst Barrett-Jolley only deals in death. Money doesn't talk, it swears.

Militarism and animals



AS WELL as killing and maiming millions of people, militarism has had disastrous effects on the environment.

Animals, both wild and domesticated, have also been victims of the military machine, through bombings, famines induced by blockades and destruction of forests and harvests. Animals have also been pressed into service in the armed forces and suffered accordingly. But a less well-known use of animals is in military 'research'.

Military scientists in the USA experimented with dolphins to carry explosive charges to use against enemy ships and submarines. These mammals would, of course, also have been blown to smithereens in the process. Countless other laboratory animals have died excruciating deaths as flamethrowers, germ, biological and chemical weapons have been tested out on them.

The latest sick use of animals by the military concerns the use of pigs at the secret biological and chemical research centre at Porton Down. Pigs under anaesthetics had silver balls sown on to the surface of their hearts and were then suspended above guns, which were then fired to test internal injuries. The pigs are only 600-750mm away from the mouth of the guns when they are fired. This, apparently, is to research 'protective clothing'.

The Ministry of Defence has increased animal experiments by 51% at a time when a general fall in animal experiments by 10% in Britain has been brought about by campaigns, including the use of direct action. Most of the animals die under anaesthetic, but some of the pigs are kept alive to "see how their wounds develop"!

Capitalism brutalises humans, destroys the environment, and turns animals into just so many products for profit and experiment. Time to dismantle it, and with it disband the armies!

Fight the Criminal Justice Act

THE POLICE ARE NOW using the Criminal Justice Act on a widespread basis against hunt saboteurs and demonstrations and mass trespasses against the Act itself.

The Act has been in operation for five months at time of writing, and already 100 have been arrested under its provisions. Mass trespasses took place in Edinburgh near Defence Secretary Rifkind's mansion, and at Windsor Castle, where 20 arrests took place. Opposition to the Act will continue, especially when the cops use the CJA against free festivals planned for the summer.

The arrests of seven — the Hackney 7 — at Hackney Town Hall in a demo against the CJA last July resulted in fines of up to £3,300 fines. These heavy fines were clearly political. With most of the defendants being acquitted, and discrediting the police in the process, the Crown Prosecution Service was looking for revenge.

Hackney Labour Council took out injunctions against the defendants which banned them from council property. This included the use of public toilets or housing benefit offices without written permission. When these injunctions were challenged, the Labour Council backed down.

Any donations to the fines will be gratefully accepted. Send to Hackney 7 Defence Campaign, c/o Hackney Community Defence Association, Colin Roach Centre, 10a Bradbury St, London N16.

READ OUR LIPS!

We said class war, not Clause 4!

FOLLOWING ON FROM our last feature on the Labour Party in Organise! 37, a few thoughts on Clause 4.

Modernising Labour

In his attempts to 'modernise' the Labour Party, Tony Blair and his supporters have made a big push to drop Clause 4, which apparently pledges that Labour will take industry into common ownership.

Much ink has been wasted, and much breath, in defending the sacred text, by both Labour Party left social-democrats like Tony Benn, Trotskyist entrists and Stalinists like the Morning Star team. We are called upon to defend CLause 4 by practically all the sorry range of leftists.

Irrelevant

Our attitude is that we do not give a damn about Clause 4. Every Labour government in the past, pledged to common ownership, has carried out vicious attacks on the working class, breaking strikes, establishing wage freezes, attacking workers' self-organisation and passing repressive legislation. As well as running down the health service, transport and other social services.

Apart from that, Labour's (false) idea of common ownership means that the State runs capitalism, or parts of it to be more precise, because Labour have always been committed to a mixed economy. This has always been and will always be for the benefit of the ruling class.

European nationalisations

The large-scale nationalisations carried out after WW2, were also carried out in other parts of Europe by, for example, De Gaulle, the military man in France. Capitalism needed to restructure and rebuild after the war effort and State intervention was seen as crucial in bringing this about.

For us common ownership, that is anarchist communism itself, means that the land and the means of production and distribution are looked after by the mass of the population, and administered through mass assemblies and workplace and community councils freely federated together.

To defend Clause 4 furthers the myth that somehow Labour is on our side.

Clause 4 was never meant to be implemented. It is a pious statement to camouflage the real nature of Labourism, that is a party there to fool, divert and when deemed necessary by the boss class, to govern us, the mass of the population, the working class.

Racism in Tower Hamlets

TOWER HAMLETS IS one of Britain's poorest boroughs, about as working class as you can get and you'd think this should give the area some potential for revolt. In fact it's achieved infamous status as the place where racial violence is commonplace and where fascists got elected.

Since the British National Party temporarily gained a seat in the local council, the number of racist attacks in the borough, mainly against Asians, has been rapidly rising. 'Incidents' range from verbal abuse and threats to near murder and the number of serious attacks has more than doubled in the past year.

Predictably, the police have been pretty lukewarm in actually getting anyone for the vicious attacks on Quddus Ali, Mukhtar Ahmed and Shah Alam. Also predictably, a lot of this claptrap is swallowed by a significant minority of white working class people. Then there's the middle class leftist do-gooders (Labour, SWP/ANL, etc) who thrive off working class disunity — some even make their careers out of it. They tend to loathe the white working class people and patronisingly look upon Asians and black people as their 'pets'. Though they have quite a high profile, they are generally distrusted by all sides.

The high level of racism among sections of white working class people is obvious. Housing has been seen as one of the main causes of this racism — the myth that if you're Asian, it's dead easy to get a council flat. In fact it's really hard to get a council flat whoever you are. If you take Millwall ward where the BNP got elected, you'll find Asians in a tiny minority — hardly a case of them taking all the houses!

Beackon and fellow specimens of the 'master race' spread their filth in Tower Hamlets.

And this possibly gives some indication of the source of the racism. Anyone who is familiar with the borough will notice in some quarters a kind of racial segregation not totally dissimilar from apartheid. Certain estates are almost totally Bengali while just round the corner you'll find another estate which is almost totally white. The same goes for local schools which are often unofficially segregated along racial lines. In other words, the local state has been involved in some pretty effective social engineering down here.

This all amounts to good old-fashioned divide and rule. In a borough like this, where working class people of all races could unite over poverty, housing, unemployment and poor wages, we end up squabbling over crumbs. Fascists like the BNP take advantage and serve the boss class well and help ensure working class division. The left don't help either with their patronising views and their dead end strategy of 'Vote Labour' electoralism to break the BNP.

Revolutionaries who live and work in the area (and indeed in other areas where the issues are similar) need to be pushing the idea that we have more in common with people of our own class whatever their colour, than with bosses, politicians, middle-class do-gooders, religious leaders, leftists and fascists who might be the same colour as ourselves. It is these parasites we need to throw off our backs. This may seem like a tall order but there are plenty of black and Asian people who are keen to get stuck in. What with recent rent and Council Tax rises from the Labour council, it may be possible to build resistance by organising around these issues as well as anti-racism/fascism. After all, it is a genuine combative working class unity which will weaken the stranglehold of racism and fascism.

they put in overtime in building a case good enough to convict the Tower Hamlets 9. (The Asian youths who fought to protect a community vigil, after the near murder of Quddus Ali, from police attack.) Quite rightly, local Asians are angry, with some young people prepared to use violence to fight the racists and fascists — and the police — while others appeal for calm and to trust politicians, community police and the obviously racist police.

In Tower Hamlets 'race' is a giant political football. Liberals talk in terms of the problems being six of one, half a dozen of the other (which it obviously isn't). I'd say quite a lot of white people possibly go along with this view. From the fascists you get the usual racist drivel — unfortunately, a

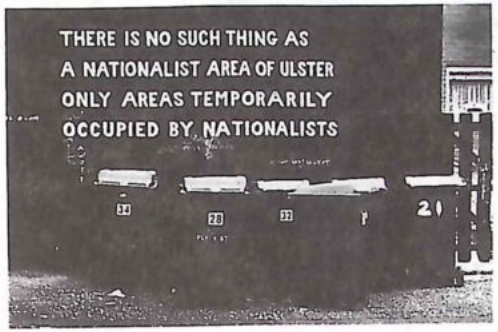
The 'new' Loyalists

IT'S FAIR TO say that rarely do revolutionary journals focus much on Ulster Loyalism (and Unionism in general). It's taken that Loyalism represents political reaction at its blackest. Our analyses of events in the Six Counties usually concern either the manoeuvres of the State or the politics of the Republican movement, the former as it is our explicit enemy and the latter because of its claim to be socialist. Loyalism tends to get dismissed because of its monolithic nature, its hand in glove relationship with the Northern Ireland State and its support for imperialism — why bother criticising something so definitely in the enemy camp?



Well, since the ceasefire, many people have been puzzled to hear Loyalist spokespersons talking about the need for a new, working class, perspective, a community politics beyond the sectarian divide and even of 'socialism'. This rhetoric has emanated mainly from the leadership of two 'fringe' political outfits, the Ulster Democratic Party and the Progressive Unionist Party. The UDP, the unofficial political wing of the Ulster Defence Association, originated in a late '70s Loyalist think-tank, the New Ulster Political Research Group. The PUP, formed in 1979, is the political mouthpiece of that other paragon of non-sectarian virtue, the Ulster Volunteer Force. Both parties have made a point of their opposition to the 'establishment' unionism of the Ulster Unionist Party and the 'religious fundamentalism' of the Reverend Paisley's Democratic Unionists, whom they accuse of having ignored the interests of their working class constituents. In return they have been attacked by some of the 'established' Unionists as 'Reds' in Loyalist colours.

However, despite the populistic vitriol thrown by both UDP/PUP at the 'fur coat brigade' of conservative Unionism, the fact remains that for all their socialistic rhetoric both parties are opposed to any independent working class self-organisation which might undermine their power base. Indeed the 'leftism' of their 'progressive unionism' is far to the right of even the sickly social democratic Unionism of the now long-dead Northern Ireland Labour Party. It should also be remembered that only a short time prior to the ceasefire and their media-fuelled propulsion into the limelight, these born again 'socialists' were amongst those who presented the UDA 'Doomsday' document of January 1994 with its (albeit empty) threats of ethnic cleansing via repartition. Nor should it be forgotten that the combined Loyalist military command had, prior to the ceasefire, been engaged in a ferocious escalation of sectarian slaughter against working class Catholics. In this context the anti-sectarian talk of Gary McMichael, David Ervine etc should be seen for the hypocritical blethers that it is.

So why have we seen the rise of the UDP/PUP since last Autumn? Neither party having an electoral mandate (a few councillors between them) they claim the mandate of the "silence of Loyalist guns". Their role as 'representatives' of grassroots Loyalist opinion has put them in a prestigious position but their 'moderation' and commitment to a 'New Northern Ireland' — never outlined in any detail of course — has meant that they have become media darlings just as Sinn Fein's leadership have. Indeed they are presented as the Loyalist mirror of Adams and Co, an image they seem quite happy with.

Their 'moderation', however, seems to some, even within their own camp, as more than a little suspect. The heavy British intelligence infiltration of the UDA and particularly the UVF, leads many to conclude that the shadowy hand of MI5 may be amongst those on the tiller of the 'new' Loyalist ship of the line. Whilst manipulating a political party may take more effort and involve more dangers than controlling a death squad, the rewards may be worth it.

This is not to doubt that there exists a confused and angry mood amongst many working class Protestants, but that the UDP/PUP exist more as recuperators of that disenchantment than its simple expression.

Regardless of the extent of Britsh State manipulation, it appears obvious that they are 'playing the game' far better than their Establishment rivals and the 'hard men of Loyalism' are duly reaping the rewards in the form of media attention. Their vague quasi-socialism (which has more in common with Strasserite left-wing fascism than social-democracy) may prove to be a vote-winner in some working class Protestant areas and the cause of a few sleepless nights for the UUP/DUP, but theirs is a politics of despair (their 'Ulster nationalism', half-hearted as it is, is pure nonsense — and they know it) offering little more than a continuation of the status quo under a different party flag and a new crew of political gangsters at the helm.

With working class Protestants disillusioned with their political leaders, the potential for populist demagogues is considerable, but the questioning of old certainties and the political state of flux, also opens up opportunities for libertarian revolutionaries to get their arguments heard in places in which a monolithic siege mentality had made it near impossible before.

Loyalist and other Unionist ideas can be challenged, just as other bankrupt nationalist ideas can. The non-alternative of the 'New Loyalists' must be as ruthlessly opposed as that of their elder brethren.

The Friends of Durruti

London ACF have produced a pamphlet on the Friends of Durruti, a much misunderstood group who attempted to defend and extend the Spanish Revolution of 1936.

In their criticisms of the leadership of the anarcho-syndicalist unions they represented an important moment in anarchist history. Included are an historical introduction written by an ACF member, and two political statements from the Friends themselves. This will be the first in a series of pamphlets in the Stormy Petrel series. Coming up will be a pamphlet on the Italian Factory Councils of 1920-21.

Copies of the Friends of Durruti pamphlet available from ACF(London) c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1 at 75p including postage.

Cuba, Castro and crisis

AS ONE AFTER another of the so-called communist states collapsed, the whole gamut of those who claim to be Leninists were thrown into disarray. Groups like the Socialist Workers Party were able to dodge the flying debris from the collapse because of their theory that these countries were state capitalist in the first place, and some more orthodox Trotskyists, like Workers Power for example, were self-contradictory, calling for a political revolution to overthrow the Stalinist dictatorship of Castro whilst at the same time demanding that the "degenerate workers states such as Cuba" be defended and that "should the present crisis result in any military clash with US imperialism, revolutionaries must unconditionally support the Cuban army and militias". As the army is part of the State directed by this Stalinist dictatorship, as any Marxist should know, these muddle-heads seem to have got their contradictions in a twist!

The bulk of those who claim to be Bolshevik, though, immediately saw Cuba as the last bastion of socialism and rushed eagerly to its defence. These included the Stalinists of the Morning Star, Communist Party of Britain and New Communist Party, the born-again Stalinists of the Revolutionary Communist Group (who have also discovered Shining Path of Peru as a saviour of the working class!) and fragments of what used to be the Trotskyist International Marxist Group, like Socialist Action and the Communist League.

Communists collaborate

In March 1952 Batista set up a dictatorship in Cuba. He received the support of the Communist Party which attempted to infiltrate the bureaucracy of Batista's State. He allowed them to set up an official union confederation, the CTC, with Lazaro Pena as its Secretary General. In return for this, the Communists ensured that no working class opposition would be allowed to develop against Batista. Two communist leaders became Ministers Without Portfolio in the government. In the tightly-controlled election of 1940, the communists were allowed ten seats in parliament and more than a hundred in the municipal councils. Attempting to fill the vacuum in the opposition to Batista left by the communist's support for him, a young lawyer and bourgeois politician called Fidel Castro launched an armed attack on the Moncada barracks in 1953. His programme was reformist and social-democratic through and through, but he succeeeded in uniting various political currents including some anarcho-syndicalists (one of whom, Boris Santa Coloma, died in the failed attack). Castro and his followers were imprisoned, and after having been pardoned in a few months, left for Mexico. The communists denounced this attack, by the way, as "bourgeois putschist".

Above: Glum Genralissimo-Castro prepares to change course.

By the end of 1956 Batista had alienated all classes, from big business to the working class and peasants. The anarchist ALC (Associacion Libertaria de Cuba — which grouped all the anarchists and anarcho-syndicalists who had survived the bloody repression of the '30s) decided to form an alliance with the bourgeois democratic opposition! (Another shameful failure of traditional anarchism, and anarcho-syndicalism in particular, to take a revolutionary position. This should be ranked alongside Spanish anarcho-syndicalist participation in the Republican government of Spain in 1936, and the Mexican anarcho-syndicalist Casa del Obrero Mundial's support for Carranza and Obregon against the Zapatistas).

From militia to army

Armed attacks now broke out on a wide scale. None of these were instigated by the Castroists. In one of them, an attack on the Presidential Palace, all the guerillas were killed, including their leader, Echeverria. Despite Castro's Moncada attack, he now denounced the Palace raid. After Castro overthrew Batista, Echeverria and his group were made martyrs of the Revolution and the date of the attack, March 13, is celebrated as a landmark of Castro's revolution. A naval mutiny broke out, and sailors distributed weapons to workers and peasants. This was bloodily crushed, but a second front had been opened in the hills, again not under the control of Castro. Fierce resistance broke out in the cities. In this situation, Castro disembarked by boat with 82 followers. The movement that developed, the 26 July Movement, was still not under Castro's control till later on. As Theodore Draper in his Castro's Revolution noted: "It included those who merely wished to restore the bourgeois constitution of 1940 and those who demanded a 'real social-revolution'. It attracted those who admired and those who detested the United States. It took in fervent anti-communists and ardent fellow-travellers". Castro began setting about gaining supremacy of this movement. As his lieutenant Che Guevara enthusiastically wrote: "It was necessary to establish a rigid discipline, organise a high command and set up a Staff... Fidel addressed the troops urging a more strict discipline...he also announced the crimes of insubordination, desertion and defeatism were to be punished by death". Thus, a militia was turned into an army. A volunteer grouping in which members who availed themselves of the right to withdraw were now called deserters and subject to be shot immediately.

Persecution

Once Batista was overthrown, Castro went about purging anarcho-syndicalists and social-democrats from the CTC union confederation, under the pretext of removing collaborators with Batista. In fact, many of these had been opposed to Batista and had been persecuted and imprisoned. The communists were rewarded by Lazaro Pena being confirmed as Secretary-General of the CTC. They had supported Batista up to the last three months of his regime, when they saw the writing on the wall and moved over to supporting Castro!

Castro, anxious to maintain power, now moved from his social-democratic programme to alliance with the Soviet Union. He turned Cuba into a huge sugar plantation for the Soviet bloc. He liquidated all the other resistance groups, accusing any who dared to oppose him of counter-revolution. Of course, many of the landowners, businessmen, army leaders and police chiefs who had supported Batista fled, but this cannot account for the mass exodus from Cuba, before emigration was virtually cut off, of half a million, which included tens of thousands of workers and peasants.

Early in 1960 the Cuban anarchists took a stand against Castro, and their publications were suppressed. They were driven underground and then into exile. They had seen what was being inflicted on the working class. The CTC under communist control signed away any gains that had been obtained — the right to strike, job security, sick leave, 30 days paid holidays, four paid holidays, 44-hour week with 48 hours' pay, overtime at time and a half, double or triple rate and much else — all this went in November 1959 — all in the name of 'voluntary' sacrifice. Those anarchists who cried out against the new regime suffered badly. Alberto Linsuain had joined the guerilla forces in the hills, in a unit commanded by Fidel's strongman brother Raul. He incurred the wrath of Raul even then, having violent disagreements with him. A vendetta was pursued after he began organising amongst the restaurant and food workers. He was murdered or died in jail. Sondalio Torres was accused of 'counter-revolutionary' activities. In order to force him to inform on other workers, he was dragged in front of the firing squad four times and four times 'reprieved'. Jose Acena, lifelong opponent of all the Cuban dictatorships was given 20 years, despite carrying scars on his body from Batista's torturers! Alberto Garcia fought in the ranks of Castro's 26th July Movement. He was given 30 years' hard labour.

Indeed, Castro quickly established horrific concentration camps. Mario Chanes originally supported Castro and was offered top government jobs. Already disillusioned with Castro's authoritarianism, he chose instead to work in a brewery. Shortly afterwards he was sentenced to 30 years in prison, for plotting to kill Castro, a charge which he denies to this day. He emerged from jail in 1992, becoming the longest-serving political prisoner in the world. On an offshore island, now a foreign tourist resort(!) Chanes notes that: "We were beaten religiously by the guards every day. Some prisoners were bayonetted or shot when they collapsed from hunger or tiredness. It was a concentration camp". Because he refused to wear prison uniform, saying he was a political prisoner, he was put into solitary confinement for six years. His wife had given birth to a son eight months after he had been imprisoned. He saw the child once before solitary confinement, and not at all during it!

Drugs

It is likely that the Cuban State engaged in widespread drug trafficking to gain much-needed cash. The Colombian drugs supremo Pablo Escobar, was given VIP treatment by Cuba and by its then ally, Nicaragua, under the Sandinistas. Then, in what has come to be the worst political scandal faced by Castro, General Arnaldo Ochoa Sanchez, who had been hailed as a revolutionary hero when he led the Cuban forces in Angola, was accused of drug trafficking and corruption. He was executed, along with Colonel Tony de la Guardia, a leading light in the special department of the Ministry of the Interior, charged with obtaining the vital foreign exchange necessary for international trade. The scandal brought down 14 top officials, five per cent of the Central Committee and hundreds of military officers. It is likely that those executed and imprisoned were sacrifices made to Castro's turn from state drug trafficking when pressure from the United States made it too risky. In its usual draconian fashion, the State handed out a 30-year sentence to De la Guardia's brother, for failing to denounce him, despite the fact that he was in Angola throughout the period of the drug trafficking.

House of Cards

The collapse of the Soviet bloc lost Cuba a $5 billion subsidy and most of its petrol supply. The East European countries also reduced their intake of Cuban sugar which Castro had exchanged for oil, food and technology. Like the East European states Cuba had supplied free housing, healthcare and education as well as some free food and transport. Indeed, compared to other populations in the region, Cuba was comparatively well-off. All this was to come to an end now. Many Cubans became hungry for the first time. The economic blockade that had been inflicted on Cuba by the USA was tightened.

Castro had militarised Cuban society from soon after he came to power. He had set up the Committees for the Defence of the Revolution (CDR) and the Organisations of People's Power (PPO). These are not genuine bodies of self-organisation as the leftists would have you believe. They are packed with Communist Party members and act as regional, local, street and block extensions of the state. They are patterned after the Russian counterfeit 'Soviets', there to rubber-stamp the decisions of the ruling bureaucratic class. They report on absenteeism, dissidence, even what they regard as immorality and sexual 'deviance'. Castro is a classic example of the repressed, prudish Leninist puritan. He detests homosexuality. In the '70s he denounced young people for wearing long hair and tight trousers in the case of boys, and miniskirts in the case of girls and for liking 'decadent literature'. Part of his response, apart from banning these things, was the introduction of compulsory military service. He stated that the high juvenile delinquency rate was due to 13-16 year olds being exempt from criminal punishment by the courts. In May 1973 he reduced the age of legal liability from 18 to 16, and introduced tough penalties up to life imprisonment for 'crimes against the national economy', and 'abnormal sexual behaviour'. The crackdown on homosexuality, and the forced segregation of AIDs sufferers, as well as the generally repressive attitude towards nonconformity of any kind, accounts to some great extent for the continued high number of refugees to the US.

In line with the old Marxist principle of the militarisation of labour, first elaborated in the Communist Manifesto and carried out avidly in Russia by Trotsky, the Castroist State used compulsory military service to provide military units to carry out work in construction, irrigation and production. In education the technical colleges were turned into military centres. Students lived under strict military discipline and completed their draft obligations whilst they studied.

The CTC recognised the partnership of the state, the Communist Party and the unions at its 13th Congress. These would cooperate to increase production, "promote punctual attendance at work", "follow the Communist Party directives". Wages are linked to work quotas. Purchase of TV sets, fridges, washing machines etc, is allotted to those who obey orders, overfulfil work quotas, are patriotic. Those paragons of wage slavery are also allotted the best holiday resorts and first access to housing. At the First Congress of the Communist Party in 1975 the slogan "From each according to his ability; to each according to his WORK" was displayed in huge letters.

In 1991, Castro added to his State organisations for the repression of the Cuban masses. The People's Rapid Response detachments were set up. These were groups of thugs charged with attacking any dissident. To their credit, many Communist Party members refused to serve in these gangs. A group of 150 attacked the home of Francisco Gonzales, chair of the National Council for Civil Rights, an unofficial group which monitored the number of Cubans who went missing at sea whilst trying to leave the country. Three months' later, an armed gang returned and threatened his life. (Since then he has been framed and now faces 15 years' prison).

Castro and his regime are immensely paranoid about any opposition. A group of working class people were imprisoned in the early '90s for daring to set up a Green grouping. In August this year, the Cuban military sank a ship hijacked by refugees attempting to flee, and forty died. In a wave of anger, riots broke out in Havana and Castro was forced within the week to lift the ban on emigration. In the next five weeks, 20,000 took to the boats. Castro had already had to pass Law 141 in September 1993, which allowed the regime to start introducing a mixed economy, and a new private sector in some trades. Income tax has been introduced, and depenalisation for Cubans to obtain, hold and use foreign currencies. Less emphasis is now being put on Marx, Engels and Lenin, and more on Jose Marti, the 19th century nationalist leader. The economy is in an appalling state. In a country rich in citrus fruit, no oranges can be found in the shops. The US embargo is blamed, but many are asking why, if trade from Mexico and South America is not affected by this, is the situation so desperate? In Havana there are power cuts of up to 14 hours a day. The power plants have been out of spare parts since 1990. Extreme rationing and huge food queues are the order of the day.

Meet the New Boss, Same as the Old Boss!

Now the Statist economy is opened up to the market, and with the end of restrictions on foreign currency, in entire sectors of the economy, US dollars are the only money accepted. Half of telecommunications has been sold off to a Spanish company. Canadian capitalism is moving in in a big way, and Canadian mining companies are penetrating the minerals sector. Spanish, Scandinavian, German and Italian tour operators are opening up a tourist trade of up to half a million people a year.

Castro and his fellow bureaucrats are prepared to open up to the market in the same way as their East European counterparts. They are doing this because they want to preserve their power and privileges. They are prepared to sacrifice state capitalism to the market and the mixed economy. In the process they will transform themselves into factory owners, entrepreneurs or remain ensconced in the state apparatus — that is unless they are overthrown in the process by the Cuban masses. Another possible scenario is a coup d'etat or attempted coup d'etat by those wedded to the old Leninist principles, found particularly in the military.

Whatever happens, whether the present bosses remain in charge or a new mob take over, the horrors of state capitalism will be replaced by those of market capitalism. The Cuban working class of town and countryside must begin to re-organise itself, learning from the old anarchist tradition in Cuba and from the many mistakes committed by the traditional anarchist movement. They will not fare any better under a new economy, as the sharks of international capital glide in to gorge themselves.

What is happening in Eastern Europe will be repeated in Cuba. The only solution is the development of a broad-based anarchist communist movement, which rejects both the market and the state forms of capitalism, and which starts to develop an independent working class politics.

Overpopulation — or a bit rich?

HUMAN POPULATION HAS skyrocketed in the last few centuries — in the nineteenth century the world population more than doubled. Population growth is a result of a decline in the death rate rather than a boom in the birth rate. The birth rate peaked between 1960 and 1965 and has been slowly falling since. The growth in the 'developed' countries of the West has been slowly grinding to a halt. As the birth rate slows it will catch up with the declining death rate — this could take up to a century or more in Africa and Asia at present rates, however.

Malthus

Are there too many people for the earth to support? Thomas Malthus (a 19th century clergyman) was the originator and populariser of 'overpopulation' theories. He maintained that human population exponentially outstrips food production — that it is always and everywhere pressing against the available food supply. War, disease and starvation for the poor were the inevitable result as: "Man cannot live in the midst of plenty. All cannot share alike the bounties of nature". These disasters were also the 'natural' solution to the problem. Malthus opposed contraception, or feeding people who would otherwise starve, as this would only lead them to ~~~ate more, worsening the general misery. The overpopulation ideology emerged with the beginning of industrialisation and the resulting immiseration of the common people and class conflict. People were driven from their lands and dispossessed of the commons (a traditional source of food in hard times) by wealthy landowners and sheep farmers, and shovelled into the mills and mines. This class brutality was sanctioned by the application of Adam Smith's theories of a self-regulating political economy to 'natural law'. The surplus of workers kept wages down, which was good for business — this translated into a 'surplus' of population. Society was held to consist of Hobbes' "War of all against all". This Social Darwinism, combined with eugenics (the genetic control and 'improvement' of breeds) was used to justify colonial conquest and legitimate reactionary immigration policies at the turn of the 20th century. Ultimately it led to the eugenics-based extermination of psychiatric inmates, Jews, Gypsies, homosexuals etc, by the Nazis in their death camps.

Overpopulation theories are currently used by the Development Bank to justify the industrial development of sensitive wilderness areas such as Western Brazil, and economic planners using tirage analysis (a battlefield medical operation where certain of the wounded are left to die so as to concentrate on those with a better chance of survival) Millions of people in Africa and Asia are left to starve in order to restructure capital and pay off the national debts of countries such as Mexico and Chile. Since the Cold War, the American State's strategy to 'contain communism', control political developments and resources has been to use population control to prevent nationalist revolt in Africa and Asia. This is done through collaborating with local elites through military aid and the establishment of state-dominated institutions for population control. The US agency for International Development is the biggest single funder of population control activities in the South. The anti-abortion stance of the Reagan administration was a sop to the Right, and was only for domestic consumption. The focus of the present population control establishment is authoritarian and technocratic. Sterilisation, intra-uterine devices, the Pill and other risky forms of fertility control are preferred to traditional methods and barrier techniques. The ideology is based on three tenets:

1. Rapid population growth is the main cause of the South's development problems, particularly hunger, environmental destruction and political instability. Development ie capital accumulation, is the main thing and people are 'units'.

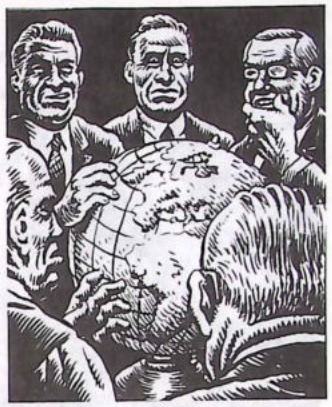
2. People must be persuaded/forced to have fewer children (in Indonesia the Army has forced IUDs on villagers at gunpoint) without fundamentally improving their impoverished conditions.

3. With the right combination of finance, personnel, technology and Western management techniques, birth control can be delivered from the top down, without basic health care systems.

Hunger

There are 900 million dying of starvation a year in the world, but no global shortage of land. The UN estimates that there is enough land to feed a world population of 14 billion people (more than double the present total of nearly six billion). As in the 'developed' North, large landowners control the vast majority of land. In 83 countries, three per cent of farmers control 79% of farmland, much of it left unplanted in order to maintain profits. Their yields are also consistently lower than small landowners. Brazil has an area of farmland the size of India left uncultivated while 20 million rural poor are landless; the richest one per cent owns 15 times as much land as the poorest 56% of Brazilian farmers. In Guatemala two per cent of landowners owns 66% of the land, in the Phillippines agribusiness producing sugar, cotton and pineapples for export has pushed 12 million peasants into the lowland forests.

Drought in Africa was part of a millenia-long cycle. Cash crop exploitation, the market economy and taxation have led to starvation rather than drought. During the hunger crisis in the 1970s, ships in Dakar port which brought in supplies of 'relief' food, departed with peanuts, cotton, vegetables and meats. Of the hundreds of millions of dollars worth of agricultural goods in Sahel exported during the drought, over 60% went to consumers in Europe and North America, and the rest to elites in African countries.



In Bangladesh, often cited as the model for the Malthusian argument, 90% of the land is worked by sharecroppers and labourers. Many starved after the 1974 floods while hoarders stacked up four million tons of rice while the majority were too poor to buy. Multinational companies made over seven billion dollars a year profit from the South in 1990, and probably far more through transfer payments. They use their economic power to force down rice, coffee, sugar, cocoa and cotton prices. Average prices in 1989 were 20% down on those of 1980. This leads to an increase in foreign debt for Southern countries with consequent increased economic hardship for the majority poor (higher taxes, inflation, etc).

Cash crops go to feed the global supermarket, and yield higher profits for international capital to industrialise the planet. Mexican soil and labour supply 50-66% of the US market for many winter and early spring vegetables. The result is that agriculture for local consumption is squeezed out and the prices of staple foods rise. One third to a half of the total meat production in Central America and the Dominican Republic is exported, mainly to North America. An increase in poverty is accompanied by a rise in cereal production (the main component of the poor's diet). So the 'Green Revolution' which it was claimed would feed the hungry has been used by the ruling class to supply the global supermarket.

Resources

One justification for population control is pressure on resources shown by deforestation, desertification, water pollution etc. Yet fewer people do not necessarily consume fewer resources. The industrialised North with about 20% of the world population (1.2 billion people) consumes over 80% of its resources, 70% of the energy, 75% of metals, 85% of wood, 60% of food. These figures obscure the vast disparities of wealth both within the South, and in the North. The world's largest companies control 70% of world trade, 80% of foreign investment and 30% of Gross Domestic Product. Multinationals are also directly responsible for 40% of the world's greenhouse gases.

Mitarism is the most environmentally destructive modern institution. It's cumulative effects far outweigh the effects of population pressures — the Allied bombardment of the Gulf and Saddam Hussein's oil fires for example. War directly damages the land and air, and destroys the environment through destabilising traditional communities, creating refugees who flee and settle on fragile soils which cannot support them. In Africa between 1955-1985 there were over 200 attempted coups, creating over eight million peasant refugees who fled their villages to escape terror in Ethiopia, Mozambique, Angola, Sudan and Uganda. In the last 40 years there have been over 125 wars fought in the South (many of them proxy wars for the Superpowers) leaving 22 million dead. Over 60% of global arms go to Africa and Asia; this military spending kills and damages many more through the waste of resources. The American Pentagon produces more toxic waste than the five largest multinational chemical companies combined: a ton of toxic chemicals a minute. A B52 bomber consumes over 13,000 litres of fuel an hour; an armoured division (348 tanks) over two million litres of fuel a day.

Women

An agrarian revolution is required, as part of a social revolution, which must liberate women. Women are the poorest of the poor, the largest group of landless labourers in the world — even in co-ops and land distribution they are frequently excluded. Women produce almost half of the food crops in the world. In Africa they contribute 66% of all time spent in traditional agriculture, in Asia they are over half of the agricultural labour force, in Latin America over 40%. Commercial farming has favoured men at every level, and industrialisation and urbanisation also hurt women most, destroying their handicrafts and worsening the unjust division of labour with the double day of wage labour and household work. Some 80-90% of low-skilled assembly jobs in Africa and Asia are done by women.

Women's reproductive choice depends on their role in society. Their lack of choice is a direct result of their lack of autonomy, personhood and their economic domination. If women have fewer children they suffer for lack of labour power, if more they are over-burdened and their health undermined. The population question can never be addressed until having fewer children becomes a reasonable option — thus freedom for women from male domination, and an agrarian social revolution reuniting agriculture and nutrition, renewing self-reliance and subsistence, and creating equality. Such a revolution will overthrow high-tech agribusiness methods such as those of the Green Revolution discussed earlier: part of the problem, not the solution.

Reason to celebrate?

Anniversary of the end of World War Two

Above: Stalin, Roosevelt and Churchill — preparing to carve up the world between them.

THIS YEAR MARKS the 50th celebration of both VE-Day and VJ-Day. The Allied Powers' celebration of victory over Nazi Germany and then Japan. As usual speeches will be given by European and American statesmen in which phrases like "the struggle against Nazism", "the struggle against fascism", "the liberation of peoples" etc will be liberally peppered. But is this really the truth?

Mussolini's rise to power in 1922 made Italy the first fascist country. In 1928 Salazar set up his dictatorship in Portugal. Hitler came to power in Germany in 1933 and Nazism opened its first concentration camps. In 1939, after the defeat of the Spanish Revolution, Franco established his murderous regime.

During more than 10 years the Great Powers — France, Britain, USA and the supposedly communist USSR maintained political and commercial relations with these states. All of these powers accommodated themselves, and none of them sanctioned, these regimes.

At Munich in September 1938 Chamberlain for Britain and Daladier for France signed an agreement with the Nazi regime, allowing it to occupy the Sudetenland, a part of Czechoslovakia with a German-speaking population — a rich prize for Germany because of its economic and industrial riches. Even when the German Army invaded Poland in September 1939 the Allied bourgeoisie did not flinch. The European Allies declared war on Germany, certainly, but this consisted of a few French units invading Germany to reinforce its first line of defence, the Maginot line (November 1939). The Western European ruling clases couldn't care less about the rise of Nazism, just as much as they were not bothered by the rise of Francoism or Salazarism. Order reigned and that was all that concerned them. What they had been worried about was the social unrest and the popular revolts which had deeply disturbed them since 1917. They were pleased that strong and stable regimes had been installed that would break working class revolt and resistance.

Chain reaction

The Russian Revolution of 1917 had set off a chain reaction throughout the world — the workers' councils in Germany, followed by those in Italy and Hungary, and then the revolutionary collectivisations in Spain. These movements were bloodily destroyed and fascist regimes were installed during or after these defeats. These fascist regimes were to be preferred by the Western allies to the spectre of working class revolt.

Churchill — the great 'democrat' — who was deeply racist and considered blacks as sub-human — never concealed his admiration for Mussolini. What was important for Britain was that its trade routes through the Mediterranean to its colonies in the Middle East stayed open. The fascist regimes installed throughout the Mediterranean area went along with this and the fate of the populations under their boot-heels were of no concern. The British ruling class refused to welcome refugees from the Spanish 'civil war'. France, for its part, set up concentration camps in the Pyrenees to imprison the Spanish refugeees, and these were joined by other refugees from fascism in Germany, Central and Eastern Europe. The Western allies knew the fate of the populations under Nazi and Fascist domination, whether in Ethiopia or Poland, and they knew from 1933 that the Nazi regime was deporting Jews, Commmunists, homosexuals and gypsies. For its part the United States continued economic and commercial relations with Germany. even during the blockade decreed by France and Britain. These continued after the alliance treaty between Germany and Japan. The US traded with everyone, no matter who they were. They entered the War after Pearl Harbour (December 1941) not to 'liberate' the populations of Europe but to safeguard their economic interests in both Asia and Europe.

The Stalinists

The Stalinist bureaucrats were no more 'anti-fascist' than the Western leaders. The USSR had never stopped trading with Nazi Germany. The non-aggression pact signed between Hitler and Stalin was linked to an economic agreement: Poland would be carved up between them and Stalin would take over Lithuania and Estonia. The Jews of the Soviet part of Poland were as much delivered up to the Nazis as those of France. The Soviet leaders only became 'antifascist' when the German state broke the pact by invading the USSR in June 1941.

Just another war

The ideology of antifascism was pushed among the working class in order to divert it from its autonomous class objectives and interests. This mystification allowed the ruling classes of each country to get the allegiance of their populations and to turn them into cannon fodder. Under the banners of antifascism and the defence of threatened democracy, the managers of capitalism stopped at nothing — 38 million dead to defend their interests! The Dresden bombing, the Atom bomb attacks on Hiroshima and Nagasaki! The entry of the Allies into the War was only motivated by the need to stop at all costs the new powers that were emerging in this period of world economic crisis (the Wall Street Crash in 1929) Germany, Italy, Japan menaced the vital interests of the Western ruling classes and their colonial empires, that is, the sources of raw materials necessary for their economies. The new powers needed these resources and natural wealth in order to develop their own economies.

Out of this crisis sprang a new world order: the USA (the West) versus the USSR (the East). Once the war was over, the victors concentrated on oppressing and massacring the populations who refused their new order. For example the French murdered up to 80,000 in 1947 during the insurrections in Madagascar, many through being gunned down, many more through hunger caused by French blockades of the insurgent areas. In May 1945, just after the Allies had won in Europe, repression began in Algeria which resulted in the deaths of up to 45,000 murdered by the French. In the repression unleashed by the British in Kenya in 1956, 10,000 were killed and 90,000 interned in prison camps.

Each of these powers in its own colonial or neo-colonial sphere of influence, set up dictatorial regimes as bloody as each other, who defended the interests of their 'antifascist and democratic' masters to the detriment of the working class and peasantry world-wide.

IT'S A WHOLE NEW MALL GAME!

The following two articles were produced by Communist Headache. We are reprinting them to gain them a wider audience and to further contribute towards our investigations into culture.

Football and architecture: The control of pleasure vs. the pleasure of control

A RECENT SINGLE issue that has dominated a large amount of the local media space afforded to this region [Derby], and a large amount of my thinking and concerns, has been the proposed move of our local football club ('my club') from its traditional ground to a new purpose-built stadium/leisure complex.

This hasn't had the form of the classical single issue problem that we are familiar with, mostly due to the 'negative charge' it carries as a political generator. There is some political opportunism within football supporting (corresponding to the growth of a highly-visible and very cleaned up independent football supporter movement) but this doesn't encroach into all areas of problems and debate. The other feature of this single issue is the local media handling of the problem — this has been incorporated into the fans' phone-in hour each week on the radio, where callers have the opportunity to adorn the manager's trenchcoat for five minutes and have their say about the running of the team or the club. Thus, we have a sophisticated communication channel (in terms of visibility) and a lack of a vested interest, producing unusual developments.

Almost immediately an approach of considering concessionary measures was taken up, but with a positive outlook. In the past the strategy of developing concessionary measures could be considered as solely reactive to cases where a lock, stock and barrel fight for a cause is totally turned over. The negative aspects of this strategy are most evident when a vested interest occurs, that is, we are kept blindfolded by the actual campaign. This usually takes the shape of a denial of examining the form and function of the campaign itself, as the parties with the vested interest would be exposed, and the taking of concessionary measures in this case is usually campaigning just as blindly but with slightly lowered sights.

The positive aspect of the strategy is the development of a springboard for assessing all points of our arguments, how these arguments are interpreted by our opponents, the dynamics of the campaign and, not least, its relevance in wider spheres beyond the normally impenetrable barriers of the campaign. The strategy is either negative (and worthless) or positive, and cannot be a combination of the two. In this case, the absence of a political opportunism and the blossoming of the theoretical base of the campaign are obviously related. To stress again, a useful approach would be to aim for clarity and fluidity, to pinpoint relevances and irrelevances, and to examine moves and motivations of people and parties involved.

Returning to the issue at stake, the resiting of a football ground, it seemed that initial response was that the move was a necessity and a progressive measure, a view mainly fostered by the club itself and some of its influences in the local newspaper. However, debate and dialogue on the local radio station (initiated by a programme presenter who was prepared to question the move from personal opinions) gave an airing to a few other ideas, and allowed the issue to expand into a more complex form. At the basis of the disagreement was the question of atmosphere, such that a move would be okay if the atmosphere of the original ground could somehow be preserved or recreated in the new stadium. Thus we have the concessionary measure: atmosphere, but arising in such a form that it immediately demands further inspection as to what atmosphere actually is, and how it arises, is maintained, and is possibly preserved.

This further inspection is still at a fledgling stage, particularly as the heat has been taken off the issue due to financial problems at the club putting the move into doubt. But the potential to challenge and to form a total critique of football as an act in the cultural circus has been activated. These are my ideas on the health of our game taken from the standpoint of where we left the issue — that is the preservation of atmosphere.

Atmosphere

There are many points to consider in this proposed move away from an old ground, but to many the subject of atmosphere is the most important, and also the most difficult (and dangerous) to pin down. There is a danger in refusing to understand what atmosphere actually is, and so leave the negotiating of this concession of atmosphere to the professionals, to the architects who promise to give us an INSIDE of pitch-hugging stands and tight corners where we are able to breathe down the necks of players. But such a move invites them to dictate their definition of atmosphere, and we are back to a strategy of hoping for the best and trusting that some party has all our best interests at heart. How can we pin down the make-up of atmosphere beyond simple architectural factors relevant to the inside of a ground? In the case of our old football ground atmosphere is related directly to tradition, and this tradition is partly constructed from specific instances on and off the pitch in years gone by. Goals, saves, moves, skill, decisions, comedies, fights, pitch invasions. These cannot be preserved, and are uniquely tied to the history of the old ground, but to use this as an argument for staying behind leaves one susceptible to attack. Indeed, it is plainly stated that a new ground will bring new instances and so will begin a new history and tradition, and that the old history will live on in memories even as this new history unfolds. People who cite famous instances from the past and argue the injustice of losing them, are labelled traditionalists, Above: Sport — the rugby scrum is not the only struggle. Like everything else in society the class struggle at play.

and are dismissed as likeable, but laughable, cranks. However, tradition does not accumulate solely as a sum total of instances on or around the pitch, it is something that is deeply ingrained in football culture, a culture that is linked strongly to the working class. So we have moved on from the idea of atmosphere, the role of tradition in creating atmosphere, and finally to culture in propagating the active role of tradition. It is here that we can take up our negotiation of concessionary measures.

Where are the pies?

Football culture has grown out of the escapism that Saturday afternoon brings, following the enforced division of work and leisure time. The attack on this culture arises as the ruling class try to colonise our leisure time, to control us and spy on us. Leisure time controls our attitude to work, and so it must be constructed in a way to satisfy many tastes and demands. Football supporting offers many other things than an escape from domestic duties, it has a tribal link and the bad-boy image, thus the strict yet diverse fashion trends and accompanying machismo. It is a constructed part of leisure that has fostered some degree of dangerous autonomy — as a system of control it is dangerous as the autonomy that it fosters is both a reason for its popularity and a danger to the authorities. Without concerning some of the fringe activities of football supporting we have a base of putting aside your problems at home or in the workplace, and channelling your energies into watching, shouting and arguing about your team. The packed terrace is the ultimate meeting place where you can yell at the top of your voice, exercise your wit and wisdom, and summon forth an honesty and unrestricted flow of expressions that you have to suppress in everyday life. The situating of football grounds within dense, run-down urban areas adds to this atmosphere, as you can leave the glitz and glare of the manufactured cityscape and its consumption zones, and slowly re-adjust your thoughts to focus solely on the time ahead and the football game itself. Programme and fanzine sellers perched on street corners, local shops stocked up with crisps, biscuits, fags and tins of drink, the joy of knowing that all these people weaving their way to the ground are thinking the same as you; team selection, last week's performance, midweek comments and rumours, this week's opposition.

And so atmosphere does not spontaneously appear, exist and die within the 90 minutes of the match and confines of the ground, it grows from the apprehension as you approach the game and lasts into the joy or suffering after the match, as you cautiously weave your way home chancing a short cut with the thrill of a chase.

Fringe

The fringe activities arising from the autonomy of football culture presented the authorities with a decision to make. In the 1970s hooliganism was put under the spotlight and so intensified as a reaction to this, in turn feeding the media onslaught. The game was attacked with swift moves to intimidate and control supporters, the media having done its job of replacing the identity of the football supporter with that of the hooligan (eg the emergence of phrases such as behaving like a football crowd). What began as frogmarching to the ground soon turned into extensive and visible surveillance and list compiling. I remember my early away matches where we were unloaded from the football special and marched from the station to the ground only to be stopped en route, lined up against an old factory side and scanned by a hoolivan that crawled alongside us! This onslaught of 1984-style surveillance and infiltration culminated in the identity card bill which was eventually defeated. A possible reason for this could be the rise of the independent supporter movement who redressed the balance of identity back from hooligan to the more generic football supporter. The actual winners here are hard to pin down, though without doubt the authorities benefited. The independent supporter movement peddled a semi-notorious image (or half-decent as the figurehead magazine calls itself) that was allowed its own media space to flourish — the fanzine market. For a while the fanzine movement was the be all and end all of football supporting, but its popularity has waned over the last few years as the zines themselves have been filled with academic ramblings lyrically praising the merits of mildly warm bovrils and stodgy pies, and the clubs themselves have tried to take a cut of the action by allowing sales of certain zines within their official marketing mechanisms. However, the authorities haven't given up (indeed hooliganism is on the rise again), they have just changed their line of assault, and the design and situation of stadiums is the new angle.

We now move from a culture that has grown within the working class that brings people together while supporting autonomy, to a culture that has been thrust upon us, a manufactured culture that goes hand in hand with the classless society we are supposed to live in, that is the culture of the shopping mall. Here we are offered the pleasure to slip around from one orgy of consumption to another. Bright lights to glorify images, marbled floors and high gloss to reflect to the point of infinity, an immersion into the air conditioned nightmare. Shop till you drop, all the names are here. Pig out on any delicacy from fast food to the faddest flavour of the month (but still fast), entertain yourself in our bowling halls, cinemas and amusement arcades... this perfected spectacle is seamless. Bad weather? We can take care of that by eliminating weather all together, a constant temperature maintained and ample carparking underneath to shield you from getting wet

I live quite close by to Meadowhall, the grand-daddy of all shopping malls, and often find myself gauging (and gagging on) the atmosphere of the mall, from the frenetic attempts of store assistants to get you to buy (the space rent is monumental — no charity shops or second hand outfits here) to the glamour, technology and global mix of the coca cola food oasis. But the atmosphere (as in the positive sense of the word) is not there, thousands of people avoiding eye contact and communication (but maintaining style checks on each other), a mixture of lethargy and a gluttony of excess. Not just a million miles away from my football ground, but a million miles away from the morning markets in town hawking cheap vegetables and second-hand clothes.

The 'mall'ification of football grounds would be a shrewd move in the attack on football culture. Why try to control the actions of people who are in an agitated and threatening state of mind, when you can control their state of mind directly? The all-seater stadium and the purpose-built leisure complex is a direct attack on the mental set of the supporter, using the convenience of run-down amenities (run down by the greed of the clubs themselves) to justify itself. The media talks about the positive aspects of the Taylor report which is little more than using the Hillsboro disaster to shit on the people most concerned and horrified about the disaster itself. We must never forget that nearly a 100 supporters died, and many others suffered immense pain, because of a foul up between the football authorities preventing the possible loss of some of their income and the police dealing out the type of treatment they have been getting away with for years. How would this 'mall'ification manifest itself? The keywords are shopping and leisure (the new forms of leisure)... arrive at some wasteland project out of town and connected by a fast new road, a guaranteed parking place within five minutes of the stadium-complex) what do you mean you enjoy walking to the ground?, the chance to do a bit of shopping in the club shops (new team fleeces and a fourth away strip just in stock!) or any of the similar sports shops, the chance to grab a bite to eat at the latest 25-till computerised Macdonalds/Pizza Hut, and then you can plonk your backside in a bucket seat — a splendid view just beneath the main stand executive boxes — to take in the pre-match entertainment. But don't worry, we can keep the atmosphere by building the stands close to the pitch and letting the corners hug the pitch perimeter! But what about that exquisite state of mind that you used to acquire while making your way to the match, the feast of communication transmitted and received, the buzz that lasts well into the evening?

Clout

It is this culture that gives clout to the sense of tradition that we try to explain, a tradition that enriches the atmosphere at our football matches. Personally I do not think that the atmosphere will be recreated in a new super stadium on some re-developed wasteland, because the atmosphere is so much more than the 90 minutes' playing time. But we are heading into the whole new ball game era, where money, products and brand names do all the talking. The old is being cleared out for the new, making it safe for the business faces and media moguls to vest their precious millions in.

And so is there a realistic concessionary measure of atmosphere within all of this, as this is what the original argument for and against the move was based on? In truth it is a difference in definitions, on the one side we have a rich vein of autonomous and mutated culture, and on the other we have the new culture of total entertainment (to mask total control).

The latter will always have the ability to try to appeal to the former, opening some dialogue around architecture and design, under the auspices of the democracy we are all lucky enough to live in. And anyone not happy will be dismissed as 'traditionalists' longing for a bygone era that hasn't quite passed by. Well, not yet anyway.

We will have further articles on sport in the next issue.

Class War and sport

IN THEIR ENDLESS pursuit of the perfect romance with all that is working class (be it 'genuine' or stereotyped) Class War have no hesitation in appealing to the football fan as part of its political platform.

Their coverage used to consist of reports of hospitalised coppers and imaginative terrace chants, and this used to sit quite merrily alongside stories of the queen mother being a werewolf etc. As the paper tried to develop an ideological angle it opted for a program of working class 'culture' and community-based struggles, and the fight of football fans against government proposals (the ID card bill) and greedy chairmen (eg Maxwell at Derby) encapsulated both culture and community. Can we really expect a political autopsy of football without facing contradictions, and how can we consider, as communists, the difference between supporting football teams as a community of interest and engaging in the class struggle against evil boardrooms. At most clubs throughout the country the boardroom is under fire because it won't spend vast amounts of cash on transfer fees and huge wages, and on the surface this seems to annoy the fans as much as the boardrooms that impose increased admission prices and yuppified stadiums. @Reclaim the game@ is nothing more than sheer populism which falls apart at the slightest analysis. I enjoy spectating on a team of wealthy superstars as much as I enjoy my twice-weekly kickabout with my mates, but I don't see any logical similarity between the two and I certainly don't want to reclaim one into the other.

Recent events have been even more surprising: Class War described the rumpus at Millwall v Derby as not a particularly good night out, it bloody wasn't, as Derby fans were ambushed with baseball bats and black players were showered with a torrent of racist abuse. They also declared the highlight as the trashing of Radio Derby's van... well how much of football culture involves dependence on the local radio for those matches you can't get to? Does it logically follow that come the revolution Brian Moore will be first up against the wall?

Class War have also taken to defending boxing due to its working class tradition. Certainly one of the most amusing spectacles recently occurred at the NEC during the Mac Cracken Foster fight when the boxing was held up as rival football gangs were at it hammer and nail in the aisles using fists, boots, chairs and steel bars! Oh well, all in the name of reclaiming the game.

Dear Organise!

The article in Issue 37, warning against 'moral panics', ought to have been shown to the individual responsible for the pieces on pornography and the sex industry. Then we might have been spared two pages of unadulterated crap and could have read something up to your usual standards. Having let off steam, I can face the gruesome task of picking through the rubbish piece by piece.

"Punters often bring pornographic magazines to show prostitutes what they want to do". Apparently this is because the 'sex industry' thinks that all women are whores (shock horror). Listen, E.T... on this planet practically everybody is a whore of one kind or another. That is, they will do all sorts of disgusting things for money. Some people sell or portray sex for money. Others sell food, medical care, housing, drugs, weapons, religion for money. Why is it the sale of sex especially outrages this clown?

"Our sexuality is deeply personal. While sexual acts with others are a basic act of communism, as we freely give ourselves in a mutual exhange of pleasure". Well that must be fine for s/he or it on their planet, but in the real world this wonderful state does not exist for a great many people. Sex being a basic human drive they must therefore either go without (easier for some than others) or settle for whatever compensations they can get.

"The sex industry is highly patriarchical. It promotes...the male as the fucker, the female as the fucked". Yes and sometimes the other way round too. But that fact is inconvenient isn't it? If the sex industry tried to sell any fetish or 'perversion' that customers didn't want, it would soon be out of business. You can't change sexual tastes by propaganda. But apparently only politically correct 'mutual sex' is permissible to the writer.

The double-think in the next paragraph is truly classic. Having displayed all the human understanding of a fundamentalist bible-thumper, the writer warns us against our 'moral guardians' the church and the state. What about the 'moral guardians' pictured below who apparently believe that liberation will be achieved by ripping up harmless magazines containing pictures of naked women? It does not occur to these morons that any sort of literature can be ripped up. The price of freedom to distribute our own ideas is tolerating other peoples. What if Playboy or Penthouse were to suggest their readers went around trashing feminist literature? That's what I would do if I were them and they have a damn sight more readers than any feminist or anarchist mags do.

The gist of the rest of the first article, that all prostitutes are conscripted by a combination of force and drug addiction, and that any act committed by a client is rape (I wonder what victims of real rape think of that idea) is so ridiculous that I'm not going to bother to argue with it.

I'm not trying to pretend that the sex industry is some sort of humanitarian social service or that it does not damage some people. But why should it be singled out? Don't practically all capitalist industries damage their workers, destroy the environment and exploit poverty?

As for the piece on pornography, if you want to argue porn leads to rape and other sex-crimes, it's a theory, but it doesn't explain why countries like the Netherlands and Japan, where pornography and prostitution are more freely available than in the UK, have lower rates of sex-crime.

The second piece seems to be trying to blame pornography for every evil under the sun. Racism — apparently a preference for black, Asian or Oriental women is a 'fetish'. What about a preference for blondes, brunettes, red-heads? If only white women appeared in pornography would that be non-racist? Sorry, I forgot, we aren't allowed sexual preferences any more. Come the revolution we will be assigned sexual partners by anarchist-feminist social workers after demonstrating that we perform only permissible acts in the approved non-sexist way. (Yeah, I'm getting carried away).

The point I'm really getting to is that the average punter, attracted to a re-cycled copy of Organise! by the naked man and 'pornography' on the cover (you wouldn't have dared to use a naked woman would you?) will turn to the article in question and find themselves confronted with the ravings of a sex-obsessed crank. Another piece of mostly worthwhile propaganda bites the dust. It would have been better to put the far more sensible Avedon Carol interview first and used the other as an example of the kind of lunacy she was talking about.

Depriving people of sex-magazines and videos will not lead to individuals going out to form 'relationships' in their 'community' or to protest about East Timor etc. Most of the evils attributed to the 'sex industry' are due to something else, poverty. That being so, it would be more useful for Anarchists and Feminists to direct their propaganda or even some of that famous direct action into campaigns for realistic benefits, pensions and minimum wages than to preach the sort of moralistic delusions worthy of the right wing press.

By the way, I'm not a rapist, pornographer or pimp, I'm on the dole. You've no idea what a hassle it is to get your giro cashed in Bangkok!

Yours etc, JW, East Ham

Article writer replies: This, unfortunately, is fairly representative of the level of debate on this subject. Personal abuse is not argument. Also, the idea the sex industry is being singled out for criticism when everyone is abused by capitalism is nonsense. Organise! covers a wide range of subjects, why pick on one? It's called analysis. All exploitation outrages me, not just the sexual kind, but few workers are quite so blatantly exploited as sex workers.

Punters using porn to direct prostitutes are not differentiating between the two groups, but using them all as their own sexual tools. There is very little porn where women are in a dominant position unless of course the man wants it that way, and then they are not really dominant at all. Porn commodifies sex by fetishising differences, for example hair colour, race or clothing. Porn uses racist stereotypes implying that coloured people are more animalistic. This is not sexual preference, it is sexual commodification.

Porn does not cause rape, but it is often a contributory factor because of the way it portrays women. Most rape takes place in the home where these ideas affect people's attitudes. Also many serial rapists and killers have fixations with porn, though many other factors are involved in their behaviour.

Capitalists spend billions on marketing/propaganda to influence ideas and demand. Media barons are hugely powerful because they control ideas. Sex for capitalism is a commodity. The product is constantly updated and customers are encouraged to find their particular niche in the market. People get their sexual ideas from society, porn influences these ideas.

The mass media controls thought and opinion pretty effectively, porn magazines do attack feminist ideas if you read them. It seems to be okay to forcibly silence the likes of fascists, so why not porn? Whenever action against porn is mentioned its apologists immediately start screaming about free speech and censorship. Defending the 'rights' of capitalists is liberal crap. They are only harmless in your opinion, which is not an opinion held by many other people.

The article illustrated how sex is increasingly used by the mainstream media to titillate while providing no real information. While we are being told about the irrelevant sexual antics of minor celebrities, the capitalists are left free to plunder.

Using other people for your sexual whims is blatant exploitation (try masturbation instead!) Given a real choice would you choose to sell your body? People are forced into prostitution mainly by economic necessity and also sometimes by violent partners, and many prostitutes do use drink and/or drugs to desensitise themselves, because believe it or not they don't enjoy being fucked by anyone with a few quid.

You cannot deny exploitation merely by dismissing every indicator suggesting exploitation. That is just conscience salving. If you actually have an argument then substantiate it, this letter is merely excuses and opinion without substance.

If we are ever to see an anarchist communist society then people are going to have to take responsibility for their own actions and consider the effects they are having on others. Sex is not an exception to this!

Dear AFC, [Sic]

In your issue No 36 Oct-Dec 94 you published an article entitled 'The Working Class Against the ANC', in it you attack groups and parties on the far left as being "Capitalism's last line of Defence" and also of enthusiastically supporting a vote for the ANC-SACP-COSATU Alliance before the election, then suddenly discovering after the election that this alliance was betraying the working class.

While we cannot speak for other groups or parties, we must protest at this description being applied to the WRP (Workers' Press). Not only did the Workers' International of which the WRP (Workers' Press) is the British Section stand candidates against this alliance, but for years before fought internationally against the ANC's torturing of their own members who disagreed with their policies. See the enclosed pamphlet Mutiny in the ANC 1984. We have included some back copies of Workers' Press containing articles and statements with the relative dates and passages highlighted from before, during and after the election attacking the ANC Alliance. See also the Election Manifesto of the South African Workers' International in Workers' Press dated 26th February '94 and the election issue of The Worker (Workers' International of Namibia) with solidarity statement and statement on the ANC-SACP Alliance highlighted.

Our comrades who were candidates in the South African and Namibian elections were at times threatened with their lives and showed great courage in their stand against the ANC-Stalinist Alliance. The comments in your publication do you no credit. While we do not expect agreement on our respective policies, printing lies does not take the working class forward one inch. If you have any political principles, you will print this letter in your next issue together with your correction.

NB I am a member of the WRP (Workers Press)

Eds reply: Yes, we did make a serious mistake by saying that the WRP supported the ANC-SACP-

COSATU alliance. We can assure our readers that everything else in the article was accurate! However going back to the WRP — or the Workers' International as they insist on calling their South African section, standing their own candidates in the election, let's look at some of the positions they stood on. The WI calls for the withdrawal of COSATU from the government alliance. This is meaningless — the COSATU leaders are almost completely members of ANC and/or SACP and would not allow this to happen. Even if they were not members of these parties, the fact that COSATU is co-managing South African capitalism shows how the trade unions are as much a part of heading off working class revolt in South Africa as anywhere throughout the West. Such a demand creates illusions in the trade unions as indeed does the electoralism of the WRP and its sister sections. They give credibility to bourgeois democracy by participating in election farces (incidentally the WRP have consistently called for a 'critical' vote for Labour in this country — not a last line of defence for capitalism? — who are you kidding?). On to some of the other demands like the call for a revolutionary workers' state and nationalisation under workers' control. The illusion that somehow the State is a body that can be captured and successfully used as an institution of liberation goes against all that we have seen in the past century. Do you really think that nationalisation of the land, farms, banks and all other sections of big business means that the working class will collectively own and control them? No, it is the capitalist State that will control them. Finally, it ill behoves the WRP to accuse us of lies (lack of research — yes!) when from the cost of developing and maintaining the military in peacetime (how many jet fighters equal a hospital) the cost in war time is measured in blood. Workers' blood. It is an undoubted truth that anti-war movements organised by official trade union and labour movements have usually at best been hopeless failures and at worst, complete betrayals. The ignominious collapse of the Second International's policy to oppose the so-called Great War of 1914-18 comes into this category.

It is perhaps the constant and subtle techniques of mass persuasion which accounts for the apparent enthusiasm for wars by large sections of the working class. This misplaced faith in the State and the Nation has had disastrous consequences. Given the current capacities of the nuclear war machine, a future major war could prove to be diabolical. The war against militarism has never been more important.

it is a remnant of the gangster organisation led by Gerry Healy, and counts Cliff Slaughter as its leader. This was the man who slavishly followed all of Healy's instructions, who devotedly churned out hatchet job after hatchet job on the WRP's political enemies, who sat on the WRP Central Committee that year after year chose to ignore Healy's sexual abuse and rape of young female Party members, the self-same Central Committee which turned over scores of Iraqi workers to be horrifically tortured to death by Saddam's secret police so that it could get funding.

Dear Editor

Last December ten women from our group, Bristol Women Against Pornography, held an action at Menzies in Temple Meads Station during rush hour. This involved ripping up the pornographic magazines on the station forecourt. Some women handed out leaflets and talked to the public who were generally sympathetic.

Five of us were arrested and charged with criminal damage. We are pleading not guilty because we believe that by our actions were preventing greater crimes from being committed. Pornography causes the rape, torture, sexual abuse and murder of women and children.

In compiling our defence we are trying to raise funds for expenses; child care for defendants, general administrative costs and potential fines. If you would like to support us please send any donations with cheques made payable to Bristol Women Against Pornography, Box 13, Greenleaf Bookshop, 82 Colston St, Bristol BS1 5BB.

Thank you

Ticket to poverty

Dear Organise!

Anyone tempted to play the National Lottery might be advised to consider the political implications. A lottery ticket is the ultimate capitalist commodity. It costs £1 and is an absolutely worthless piece of paper to all but a small percentage of 'winners'. Such is the nature of all capitalist commodities to a degree. The consumer pays for profits to make the board members, owners, investors etc very rich wherever possible. The surplus value on a lottery ticket is virtually 100% for most tickets. The fact that a percentage is given to charity is virtually irrelevant. No charity could ever cover the costs of the capitalist profit/poverty syndrome.

AA (Edinburgh)

Eds reply: We draw readers' attention to the following quote from George Orwell's 1984: "The Lottery, with its weekly pay-out of enormous prizes, was the one public event to which the proles paid serious attention. It was probable that there were some millions of proles for whom the Lottery was the principal if not the only reason for remaining alive. It was their delight, their folly, their anodyne, their intellectual stimulant. Where the Lottery was concerned, even people who could barely read and write seemed capable of intricate calculations and staggering feats of memory. There was a whole tribe of men who made a living simply by selling systems, forecasts and lucky amulets."

Canadian confusion

Dear ACF,

Greetings from Canada! First of all I'd like to say that I think Organise! is a great magazine. I always look forward to reading it and it is always full of information and revolutionary spirit.

Secondly, continuous revision of our ideas is necessary for any revolutionary process. I believe that the ACF and many other anarchists need to change the way they look at national liberation movements. You must realise that people of colour have their own cultures of resistance. Many so-called anarchists have been openly antagonistic towards national liberation movements like Black Nationalism and native sovereignty. Being opposed to national liberation struggles means being opposed to Puerto Rico's struggle against Amerikkkan political, economic and military domination. You are also opposing Palestinians' fight for a homeland. What about the national liberation movements that freed Africa from European domination? What about the Vietnam war of liberation against French and Amerikkkan imperialism? Why do some anarchists oppose national liberation struggles? Is it because they can't control them, or is it because of a subtle kind of racism? Revolutionary anarchist and ex-Black Panther Kuwasi Balagoon once explained why anarchists should support national liberation movements: "It is not only racism but compliance with the enemy to stand outside the social arena and permit Amerikkka to practice genocide against the 'Third' World captive colonies because although they resist, 'they' don't agree with 'us'". As anarchists, if we ever want to advance the revolutionary process then we all should support national liberation movements, fight white supremacy, and work to bring about communities that respect cultural diversity.

KK, Ontario, Canada

Eds reply: Well in fact, the ACF is in a minority in its positions on national liberation. Too many anarchists are either ambivalent, confused or take a favourable attitude to national liberation. Why is the guilt-trip of "You must be racist not to support national liberation" always brought up? (See previous correspondence in Organise! in particular No 32.) Are you really serious when you talk about Africa being freed from European domination? Don't you think that the European powers, and indeed international capitalism, still dominate Africa directly through armed intervention — the French within their very wide sphere of influence in their old colonies, and the US and France-Germany through their intervention in Somalia? Don't you think that Africa is still dominated by the commands of international capitalism, through the World Bank and the IMF? Do you think things really changed when 'independence' was achieved in the African countries that had been European colonies? Take Kenya for example — one of the first colonies to break from the British. Now an alliance was formed between the European imperialists and a class of newly-propertied Africans, and the exploitation continued (read Ngugi wa Thiongo's novels on Kenya — an African not blinded by guilt who can see the reality of exploitation). This was the pattern all over Africa. Many used the genuine desire for liberty and equality amongst peasants and workers to come to power. Kenyatta could not denounce the Mau Mau forest fighters and the peasant insurrection without committing political suicide, but he neither wished to support it or be compromised by it, only to profit from it for his own political ends.

The nation-states built on the frontiers decided by the colonialists saw the immense cultural richness and diversity of Africa as weaknesses, and new forms of authoritarian rule were perfected to keep these artificial nation-states together.

National liberation movements were movements of the newly-emergent or about to emerge ruling class. They sought to channel the forces of peasants and workers to their own ends. Inevitably there were those who wished to establish capitalist models immediately, and those who adopted Marxist-Leninist rhetoric to establish command economies more or less on the East European model. This reflected the power struggle between the two major power-blocs at the time.

We do not support national liberation precisely because we are revolutionary internationalists. We support the actions of the Palestinian masses where they break with the politics of the new ruling class under Arafat or with the rival would-be ruling factions under the control of Syria or Iran, and where they break with the forces of Islamic fundamentalist obscurantism and reaction. We support the actions of the working masses wherever they fight both the forces of colonial occupiers and the home-grown ruling class and attempt to create a free communist society. But this is not national liberation but international revolution. As it says in the latest Proletarian Gob: "It is condescension or a form of racism that allows anarchists to support national liberation movements in other countries, when they should know that the interests of these movements are opposed to those of workers (us!)".

It's only natural!

Dear Organise!

I fear that the writer of the Aspects of Anarchism article on Human Nature (no 37) has grabbed the wrong end of the cliché. If human nature is fundamentally good and can be ameliorated by increasing knowledge then we all could sit back and leave the onerous task of running our lives to the great and good, their heads overflowing with brains. Alas and alack, the history of hierarchical societies shows that leaders seldom exhibit greater benevolence to others than to themselves. In fact anarchist communism is pessimistic in outlook, mistrusting the nature of both leaderships and individuals in the form of the market whose self-interest decides against theoretically combining to give an outcome of optimal utility for all. The unemployed, homeless and impoverished are well aware of this.

Of course human nature is not all of one colour, either good or bad. In fact our view of what human nature is predisposed to, is more determined by our political beliefs than the other way round. Human nature is not a quantifiable fact and if it were, we should still be wary of the naturalistic fallacy of deducing what ought to be from what actually is. Aristotle for example, thought slavery natural because all the societies he studied had slaves. Neither does anarchist communism come from idle speculation of abstract concepts that would make an 'ideal' society. Where anarchist communism's theory and practice ultimately differ from other political theories is that we are not propounding a view of human nature or form of future society but inviting people to make it themselves.

MILITARISM

OF ALL THE 'ISMS', militarism is the most poisonous, destructive and dangerous. When active it destroys people, cultures and rational thought. When relatively passive (though it is never truly passive) it enters the minds and value systems of society in a way which reinforces conformity and obedience.

Military values require uniformity, not only of appearance but also of attitude and values. The armed forces expend considerable effort in ensuring that the soldiers at all levels accept without question the inherent and unquestionable superiority of their methods, aims and ideology. In the heat of battle there is no scope for questioning of the validity of the campaign or particular assault. Robot-like acceptance is paramount.

Militarism, the glorification of military values and methods, has a long history. In Europe, Asia and South America that undoubted symbol of militarism, the military uniform, and with it distinct armed forces, have existed for thousands of years. Witness the carved reliefs of the Assyrians looted from Iraq and currently at the British Museum which show the disciplined armed ranks engaged in warfare. These are well over 2,500 years old.

Military values also accept without question the validity of hierarchy. Orders start at the top and are passed down to the ranks. Whilst there is scope for individual decision-masking — no large organisation can cope without imagination and initiative — this can only be permissable within the strict and rigid structure of the chain of command. Despite scepticism within the ranks, in the final analysis orders are there to be obeyed. Obedience is an essential feature of the military approach and, in wartime, failure can lead to severe punishments.

A further feature of the military approach is discipline. The soldier, sailor or airforce person must act as part of a team, exercising self-discipline in all circumstances. And this self-discipline must be an extension and internalisation of the wider military discipline. Discipline, hierarchy and obedience combine to realise most effectively the ultimate aim of military values, the activation of violence.

Since the days of the spear and bow, military technology has pursued a single goal, the most effective destruction of the enemy with the minimum losses to one's own side. The armed forces of the world's most powerful nations possess killing capacity that make Dresden and Hiroshima look like tea parties.

Militarism is the application of military methods and values to the wider society. This is done most effectively when it accompanies some other so-called truth such as religion, racial purity, imperialism and nationalism. In its most effective expressions — Nazi Germany and Stalinist Russia — all opposition was either eliminated or cowed and the whole society subjected to military methods and organisation, leading ultimately to war. Whether racial nationalism in Germany or 'socialism in one country' in Russia (leading to the 'Great Patriotic War') the identification of nation with militarism was a powerful concoction. More recently there have been pale imitations such as Saddam Hussein's 'adventures' in Iran and Kuwait, with the resultant impoverishment of civilian life in all senses.

With the re-emergence of religious fundamentalism as a significant force, combined with nationalism and militarism, a truly powerful cocktail of destruction is being concocted. This is not new, imperial Japan used it to good effect, but it appears to be on the rise again. Imagine a Christian/imperialist/militarist USA saving the world in accordance with professed religiously inspired values!

Militarism is not restricted to dictatorships. It insidiously permeates many corners of life in so-called democratic societies. Young boys in particular are subtly and not so subtly inculcated into militaristic approaches of behaviour and thought. Organisations such as the Scouts and the various cadet forces all apparently stress individual growth and adventure but also promote military ideas and values. Should anyone be sceptical on this point, one should compare the uniforms, 'adventure', camps and other methods of building group uniformity of the Scouts with those of the Hitler Youth. The similarities are remarkable.

Whilst not wanting to over-exaggerate the importance of militaristic youth organisations, they are symptomatic of an underlying militarism in capitalist society. Violent video computer games are seen as a threat, whilst kids fingering sub-machine guns and clambering over tanks in armed forces publicity events is widely seen as OK.

The British military presence in Northern Ireland has further deepened and extended public acceptance of militarism. The fact that the British armed forces have systematically used repressive violence to maintain capitalist order has barely raised a murmur on the mainland. Problems are only perceived when a British soldier is killed or maimed (or imprisoned for gunning down an unarmed civilian). The British soldier is raised up on a pedestal, and even when convicted of murdering a civilian is considered to be innocent by the Establishment and mass media.

The annual poppy day rituals at war memorials throughout Britain remind the populace of official recognition of the importance of the armed forces. Whilst they are hypocritically designated as honouring those who were killed or wounded in war (whilst insulting the widows and handicapped by poverty level allowances) they effectively glorify war. In particular they make sacred the whole system of the military machine by investing it with a religious/patriotic/emotional/ quality. War, all war fought in 'British interests' is thus legitimised and placed beyond criticism.

Spectacles such as these keep public interest in things military at a fairly constant level, ready to be mobilised in time of the ruling class's need to go to war. They, and the accompanying propaganda are a part of a mythologising process which legitimises all past British military actions. And, by extension, serve to do the same for any future conflicts.

Militarism, whilst low key in the so-called liberal democracies, has been given a new dimension and magical quality in its association with advanced technology. There are no limits on what technology and science are supposed to be able to offer. Never mind the fact that so much military advanced technology does not seem to work or results in the wiping out of the 'home side'. Death by 'friendly fire' is unfortunate but it is quickly forgotten compared to the crimes, real or invented, of the enemy.

Not only is technology presented as an ever-improving means of overcoming the future enemy but it is our technology which is presented as superior, thus reinforcing the militaristic arrogance of the gullible population.

Strangely, for weapons of mass destruction, the never-ending additions to the military arsenal are often presented in a benign manner. Fascination with new technology has been harnessed to give the state's murder machines a sexy quality. Look at that fighter bomber, admire its curves, its smooth lines, its power, its performance.

This ties in with the cult of masculinity which reaches its height in the armed forces. The parody of what males should be like is shown in the hardness, the brutality, the excessive drinking, the segregation from women in many parts of the armed forces in every country, which lead on to brutal attacks on civilians, as seen recently with the Paras in Britain, the Greenjackets in Cyprus, and the torture and killing of a Somali by Canadian Paras keeping the 'peace'. It leads on to the mass rape by soldiers — witness the systemised rape by Serbian soldiers as a form of terror, the rape of tens of thousands of women by Red Army soldiers when they invaded Germany at the end of World War 2, only just admitted to. Any idea that the Armed Forces are institutions which women should participate in, is dangerous rubbish. The best thing that working class women can do, to benefit themselves and their class, is fight to dismantle the Armed Forces!

Fortunately, but not always effectively, militarism has usually been countered by anti-militarist movements. Indeed revolutionary anarchists have always taken a lead in anti-militarist activities. It should be obvious to everyone (but isn't) that the people with the most to sacrifice and the least to gain from militarism are working class people. Apart

Magazine of the Anarchist Communist Federation

Aims and principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists.
We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.
2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class. Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as a political level.
3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.
4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.
5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.
6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.
7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trades unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc).
Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation of the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery.
Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may streng-then us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves. 8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.
9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation. We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceeded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method. We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise ourselves on a federative basis.
We reject sectarianism and work for a united, revolutionary anarchist movement.

ACF NEWS

No. 3 of the Irish ACF bulletin Irish Resistance is now out. See article in this issue. We've produced No. 2 of London Resistance, our free newsheet, available from London address. You can get this free by writing there enclosing cost of postage or SAE.

The newly-formed Liverpool ACF have produced their own free newsheet Merseyside Resistance.

You can get this by writing to PO Box 110, Liverpool L69 8DP, enclosing cost of postage or SAE.

A new ACF group has sprung up in Hastings in East Sussex. If you live in the area make contact by writing via the London address. Ditto if you want to make contact with comrades in the Basildon/Barking Romford/Dagenham area.

Active Resistance the youth magazine of the ACF should be appearing during the Summer as should our cultural magazine devoted to all aspects of culture, art, film, literature, sport and music. Watch out in the pages of Organise! for details.

Posters and stickers

Bundles of this poster can be got from our London address. Please send a donation. Or get a single copy and photocopy 'em.

London ACF have also produced a leaflet explaining the basic ideas of anarchist communism. Again, send a donation for a bundle to the above address.

We still have the ecology sticker available, and by the time you read this we should have four new stickers available — on homelessness, anti-capitalism, etc.

Clegg sprung by media

AS WE EXPECTED, Private Clegg has been released from jail after an orchestrated campaign by the ruling class media.

Clegg is a member of the Paratroopers, elite corps that are a feature of most military set-ups. They are composed of the hardest, the most psychopathic elements in the Army. Horrific training, designed to break the individual and then build them up again as an efficient killing-machine, is used to squeeze out any humanity, and make the Para an obedient order-taker, an obscene parody of what males should be. They are detested and feared by other Army units. If indeed any unrest develops in the Army — yes it could, in the right circumstances, even in a professional Army — the Paras would be used to quell any mutiny, as indeed they would be used to smash any large-scale social unrest (but the equivalent of the Paras couldn't save the Shah of Iran from being overthrown by mass action, despite the extraordinary brutality of these thugs). The Paras were responsible for the massacre of 13 on Bloody Sunday in Northern Ireland, as they were for other shootings and beatings there.

What is the hidden agenda of this campaign? Is it to organise resistance in the ruling class among sections opposed to the peace talks with the Republicans? Or is it designed as an excuse to allow for the release of Republican and Loyalist prisoners? As yet this is unclear. What it did spark off was massive rioting among the Catholic working class, not completely orchestrated by the Republicans.

Looting in Luton

Talking about rioting, the three days of riots in Luton, followed by a riot in Leeds, pointed to the depth of rage amongst the working class. Particularly among the young, involving both white and black, who demonstrated a determined resistance to the police. The simmering discontent in British society is ever more apparent to the boss class, who will attempt to hose down the flames of revolt by calling in the social fire brigade, the Labour Party at the next election.

The Conservatives

The divisions within the ruling Conservative Party that helped oust Thatcher came to the fore again with the leadership contest. With the backing of the pro-European wing of the Party, Major remained in the saddle. But the contest revealed the depths of the crisis within the Conservative Party over Europe, a crisis that may yet tear it apart. This split in Tory ranks effects the whole of the British ruling class. The needs of British capitalism continue to dictate that this pro-European wing, whether in the Conservative Party or the Labour Party, will end up triumphant. Those sections of the boss class, pining for the days when Britain was a first league World Power, will be outgunned by those who recognise that involvement in the European Union may help hinder the French-German alliance, or see the creation of a European bloc as an alternative to backing the USA, seeing clearly that they must hitch their wagon to the EU; or again salivate at the thought of a free-trade area covering most of Western Europe.

The Labour Party, sensing victory at the next election have not ruled out an alliance with the Liberal-Democrats in order to gain power, summoning up the spectre of a coalition government along the lines of the National Government of WW2 years. Alongside this are further signs of ruling class backing for Labour. As we noted in a previous Organise! Sainsbury, a backer of the Gang of Four, was moving to give support to Labour. This support is now confirmed. The press baron Murdoch is making it more apparent that his press will back labour. Meanwhile the Labour leadership continues to flirt with the bosses' organisation, the CBI.

Above: Private Clegg.

Part of the 'modernisation' process in the Labour Party consists of limiting the pull the union barons have. This characterised the recent struggle for leadership of the Transport and General Workers Union between Dromey, a loyal supporter of Blair, and Morris, representing the old school union bureaucrat, tied to Clause 4 and 'traditional Labour values'. The Socialist Workers Party, who make a habit of coming out with anti-union bureaucrat rhetoric, decided to give their support to Morris in the contest, demonstrating once again that they are one of the external wings of Labourism, and loyal supporters of trade unionism. Of course, once Morris won, he made sure that the T&G was seen as loyal to Labour, making televised announcements of support and paying for ads in national papers. Despite their rhetoric against the bureaucrats, the SWP are prepared to back one bureaucratic faction against another!

An autumn of discontent

The nurses' and midwives' unions RCN and RCM have for the moment headed off any industrial action among their members, agreeing to the derisory pay offers. Unrest is still on the boil in the health service. This may boil over in the autumn, as other sectors in the health service prepare to fight. The unions will do their utmost to head this off, playing on the many divisions between health workers, especially utilising the myth of professionalism. Despite this, discontent is beginning to alter the attitude of many sections up to now not deemed as militant.

The strikes on the trains and underground planned for the summer are firmly under the control of the rail unions RMT and ASLEF, who again will exploit the artificial divisions among the workforce. RMT have already sabotaged all-out action, by using the recent ballot as justification. A repeat of the signal-workers 'victory' may take place. Against this, London tube workers now have a tradition of independent organisation, that may once again break out of union control. If tube-workers can do this again, they must make sure they link up with similar elements among the railworkers, and spread any independent action, so that united all-out strike action takes place.

JOY GARDNER

IT COMES AS not much of a surprise to see the acquittal of three cops charged with the death of Joy Gardner.

Joy, a 40-year-old Jamaican woman, died in July 1993 after immigration police broke into her flat, tied her up with a body-belt and wrapped 13 feet of adhesive tape around her head. As a not very surprising result, she died of asphyxiation and brain damage. This method of 'controlling' people who fought back against the immigration cops was used on a regular basis, and reveals the racist basis of the whole clamp-down on immigrants.

Liberals might be shocked that the cops got off. But how

HIDDEN HISTORY

IRELAND HAS NEVER been regarded as a hotbed of working class militancy. All too often the focus has been on the actions of Loyalists and Republicans and the sectarian conflict has overshadowed the few instances of workers' unity that have occurred throughout the 20th century.

We feel that as class struggle anarchists it is part of the revolutionary process to publicise our true history: not our history as Nationalists or Unionists, but as oppressed workers.

A major landmark in Irish working class history is the 1932 Outdoor Relief Strike in Belfast, in which people from the Falls and the Shankill fought together against the Unionist government and the police.

When the Wall Street Crash occurred, Northern Ireland's economy was hit harder than most countries, as its principal industries felt the effects of America's financial instability.

Around 100,000 people in the North lost their jobs. Only 42,710 were receiving benefits and the rest had to survive on partial benefits or nothing at all. Many thousands who were unemployed were simply not registered. Due to the poverty (which hit the working class of Belfast hardest of all), outbreaks of TB were commonplace and basic items like food, clothes and fuel were in short supply.

Protest and organisation spread in both the North and the South of Ireland. In Belfast demands made by the Outdoor Relief Workers Committee for an increase in relief rates and abolition of task work were rejected by the Stormont government. As a result a strike was called in October and on the 3rd of that month 30,000 people went on the march.

On Wednesday the fifth, the RUC attempted to block a march to the Lisburn Road Workhouse which failed as demonstrators entered the workhouse and began to disrupt its operation.

The Unionist government was surprised by the actions of their 'loyal' workers who were openly in revolt. They attempted to come up with some paltry concessions which were rejected by the strikers. That night workers called a rent strike and lit bonfires all over the city. On Tuesday 11th the government banned a huge demonstration and then issued the RUC with rifles and brought in units from the Army. Fighting broke out when police tried to break up the meeting and that night workers from the Falls and the Shankill fought side by side against the police. A Protestant called Baxter was shot dead while fighting beside fellow workers from the Falls. Barricades were built and the police redoubled their efforts to break the strike.

Unfortunately, the tactic now employed by the Unionist establishment proved to be an effective one. They encouraged rumours of an IRA plot to destroy the Northern state. They effectively rekindled sectarianism and so laid the way for the defeat of the unemployed workers' movement.

However the workers won big cash increases in relief pay and the city erupted into celebrations as the strikers marked their victory over the government.

The working class of Ireland has proved time and again that they can overcome sectarian barriers and fight together as workers against the State and against the bosses.

The Irish Anarchist Communist Federation tries to keep this tradition alive by reminding people of the hidden history of Ireland.

With examples of class unity like this behind us the sky's the limit!

The above article appears in Resistance No. 3, bulletin of the Irish Anarchist Communist Federation. Send five first class stamps to receive five issues of the bulletin from IACF c/o PO Box 505, Belfast BT11 9EE.

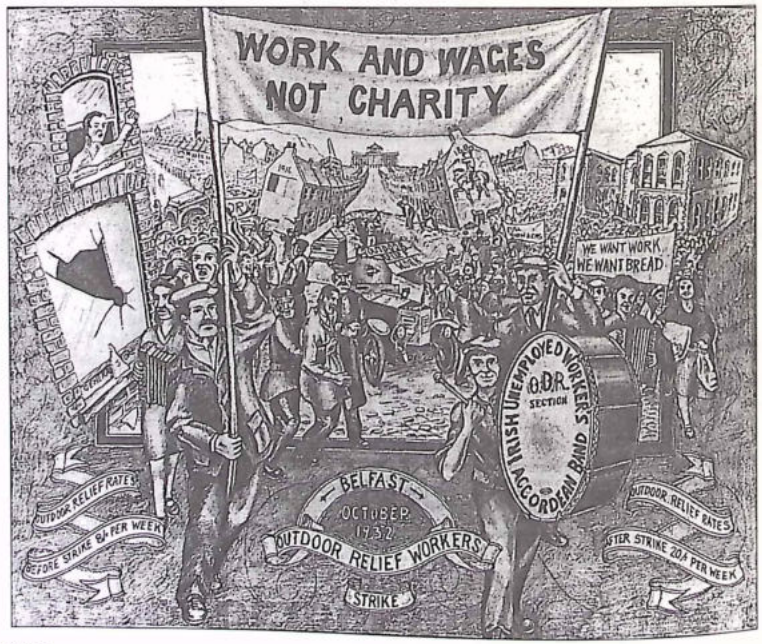
many of them or their counterparts in the armed forces have ever been charged, or when charged, found guilty of the murder, beating up or framing of working class people, especially blacks and Irish. Cast your mind back to the deaths of Kevin Gately, the framing of the Birmingham Six and Guildford Four, of Stephan Kiszko, the murders of 13 on Bloody Sunday in Northern Ireland, as just a few examples. No one was ever convicted for these brutal deeds. We cannot expect there to be justice under the capitalist State. Any reversal in the verdicts on framed prisoners was the result of sustained pressure, and even then, judicial whitewashes made sure that those who planted 'evidence' got off with maybe a reprimand. As the old saying goes "One law for the rich, one law for the poor".



Dictator of Baghdad versus the masses

SADDAM HUSSEIN HAS faced several threats to his bloodthirsty regime over the last few years. In the Western press these have been described simply as a 'Kurd' insurrection in Northern Iraq and a 'Shiite' insurrection in the South.

These insurrections received different treatment in the pages of their newspapers. There was widespread coverage of the 'Kurd' insurrection, with little information on the 'Shiite' uprising. The spokespeople of the Kurds, in exile or inside Iraq, were widely reported, whilst those of the latter were largely ignored. There does exist an official 'Shiite opposition' in exile. This opposition has benefitted from the popular insurrection in Southern Iraq.

The Western media, when it wanted information, naturally turned to this grouping. The information which the Western press was supplied with, outside of that given by the Shiite opposition, originated mainly from Iran. It was not difficult to fabricate a 'Shiite insurrection'. Contrary to the Kurd insurrection, there was no documentary film showing this armed 'Shiite' opposition, and it was easy for the Shiites to hijack the insurrection in the media, thanks to an absence of information, the little there was being supplied by Iranian sources (in other words a Shiite state that supported the opposition).

Southern Iraq is made up of marshy lowlands covering an immense terrain around the delta of the Tigris and Euphrates. There are vast areas of water rich in fish and with thick reed-banks. They are an ideal place for refuge. Tens of thousands of Iraqi deserters who had fled the butchery of the Iran-Iraq war, and opponents of the regime, had formed themselves into groups there and were a thorn in the side of Saddam. This region has always been a hiding place for those fleeing repression, long before Saddam. The area is difficult for a motorised army to penetrate. Deserters, militant workers with a price on their head, members of the Iraqi Communist Party, young people fleeing from the various forced labour brigades modelled on those developed by Lenin and Stalin by the Baathist organisations, came here from all over Iraq, and were generally supported by the local population. Saddam attacked the area in the '70s, destroying villages in order to smash support for the refugees of the marshes. When the war with Iran broke out, the local population got some relief at first, Saddam's regime having other matters to worry about.

But very soon, after the first victories, repression intensified. This period was marked by a massive influx of deserters. A resistance was organised which attacked trains, ammo dumps, and military convoys. The number of deserters was estimated at 20-30,000 in 1983.

It is rare for a war not to be followed by a popular insurrection. (Paris Commune 1871, the revolutionary wave after 1918 and after 1945 to a lesser extent). The Gulf War and the defeat of Iraq by the Western powers was no exception. Hardly was the war over than the insurrection broke out. Its intensity and the speed at which it spread were atonishing.

Horrific

Many people remember the horrific photos of Iraqi soldiers fleeing north from Kuwait, burnt to death by incendiary bombs of the American warplanes. President Bush rendered a great service to the dictator of Baghdad by exterminating this long cortege of soldiers, of whom a great part would have joined the deserters in the marshes or the insurgents in the southern towns. Their retreat cut off, those surviving soldiers were thrown into the clutches of the elite Republican Guard, whom the Allied Powers had gone out of their way not to attack. The United States did not want to destroy the Iraqi Army, only to weaken it. They stopped the war in time in order to leave Iraq enough military potential to maintain power. The collapse of the Saddam regime would have destabilised the whole region.

Defeated

It seems at first surprising that a defeated Army managed to deploy itself against two insurrections, one in the North, the other in the south. But on closer examination it was apparent that the Iraqi Army had not been so defeated. In reality the Allied forces had deliberately avoided destroying it. The troops who had been annihilated by the coalition were in the main young conscripts, including immigrant workers (mostly Egyptian) who had been forced into the Army.

Beginning in August 1990, the regime had cleaned out the prisons, massacring the political prisoners, and sending the others — deserters and 'common criminals', to the front. The elite of the Army, the Republican Guard, was placed in the rear so that it could fire on any who attempted to leave the front. The victory of the Allied powers over Iraq was in reality a joint victory of the Baathist dictatorship and Western imperialism over the Iraqi masses.

In the North, the Kurdish guerillas, that is to say the armed forces of the Kurdish nationalist parties, themselves put down the popular uprising, which involved both Kurds and Arabs, liberating Iraqi forces to concentrate on the insurrection in the South. Up to a hundred shoras (workers councils) had sprung up, refusing to acknowledge the authority of the nationalists. One nationalist leader, Talabani, was refused entrance into Sulaymaniyah, whilst another, Barzani, had two of his bodyguard killed by the people of Chamcharni.

Above: Saddam's smirk may yet be wiped off his face!

In the outskirts of Baghdad, in the neighbourhoods of Kazyma, Shouala and Thaoura, insurrection broke out on 2nd March 1991, then again on 13th March, but the centre of power was too close and on the 23rd there was violent repression.

At Basra, revolt broke out on 3rd and 4th March, led by the young men conscripted into the Army, and quickly joined by many deserters. In two days repression smashed this uprising. This was to be repeated at Najaf and Karbala. The Iraqi airforce, with the permission of the Allied coalition, were allowed to use napalm and phosphorus bombs on the insurgents. Helicopters, which had never been deployed during the war, were used to 'pacify' Basra, where fighting ceased on 17th March. The flames of revolt continued to flicker here and there over the month of April, but by the 16th March Saddam had gained the upper hand and showed himself on TV.

The Bush administration wanted to replace Saddam with someone who was more compliant to their commands. Bush explicitly invited the Baathist party to remove Saddam. The insurrections forced the Baathists to close ranks.

Uprising

The uprising was represented as a religious movement, when in fact the Basra region, with strong traditions of Stalinist militancy and Arab nationalism, has a low level of attendance at mosques. The destruction of the Iraqi Army and an occupation of Iraq by the coalition would have meant that it would have had to suppress the uprisings, which would have met with widescale protest both in the United States and internationally. It was easier to leave Saddam in place to crush the revolts. The Allied massacre of the fleeing soldiers on the road to Basra protected the Iraqi State by destroying columns of armed men who would have reinforced the rebellion.

The war ended not so much because of a victory of the Allied powers, but because of one of the largest mass desertions in history and the refusal of the Iraqi masses to fight, whether they were conscripted in the Army or in forced labour squads.

Between May and December 1990, a large number of strikes had paralysed the economy in every sector: at Mosul, Baghdad, Irbil, Tikrit, Sulaymaniyah, Basra, and Kirkuk. The strikes were against austerity, the unpaid working days 'for the country', rationing, delays in paying of wages, wage cuts and an increase in hours of the working week.

From January 1991, large numbers of deserters took refuge in Basra, Al Amarah, and An Nasiriyah. Hundreds of local government officials, Baathist Party functionaries and secret policemen were shot dead, prisoners were freed, and there was a real pre-revolutionary atmosphere. If the world media obscured all of this, both the local and international ruling classes were aware of the real situation. The war between States was transforming itself into a war between classes, and it was time to form an alliance against the masses. The Dawa, an Islamist organisation in opposition, spoke of the Southern rebels as: "an unprincipled crowd of anarchists, atheists and saboteurs drinking whisky and making love in the holy places". It established contact with the Americans and the Saudis, which up to then would have been unthinkable. The Baathists flirted with the nationalist and democratic opposition. An accord was signed with the Moudjahiddin of the People, Islamic oppositionists in arms, to crush the revolt in the South. Accords were also signed with the Kurdish nationalist leaders Barzani and Talabani to deal with the unrest at Mosul, Kirkuk, and Irbil.

The crushing of the uprising was characterised as destruction of Shiite villages in the Western press, and the resistance has been systematically characterised as such. Despite repression, this resistance continues. Saddam has resorted to a mass draining of the marsh areas, an ecological disaster up to the standard of the regime's firing of the Kuwait oilwells during the war with the Allies.

Sanctions

The sanctions imposed on Saddam by the West caused great suffering for the Iraqi masses, and in many ways strengthened Saddam's position, as he took advantage of the siege situation to portray himself as a national hero, ready to take on the Western powers.

In the long term, however, the deteriorating situation forced many into crime, as they turned to theft and the black market to make ends meet. Saddam resorted to the introduction of Sharia laws — strict Moslem laws — last June, which included amputation of a hand for theft and death for armed robbery. Iraqi TV showed an amputated hand and what appeared to be an unconscious thief in a hospital bed in close-up. Most Iraqi doctors disagree with this amputation, which they were being forced to carry out, and a strike by several hundred doctors was only stopped by the threat of imprisonment. There was widespread anger at these sentences which was vented on the medical profession. Six months ago a crowd stormed the Baathist HQ at al-Amarah and cut off the ears of several Party officials in retaliation for the punishment ordered for draft dodgers and deserters. In al-Nasireyeh a man with a machine gun killed a doctor who had amputated his right hand for theft. Saddam has also jailed several hundred money changers over the last four years.

Elite

As well as the popular opposition to Saddam, rifts in the ruling elite are beginning to emerge. Saddam has clung on to power by relying on Sunni Moslem clans in his heartland of central Iraq. The Dulaymi clan for example is heavily represented in the army, Republican Guard and secret police. The torture and execution of a Dulaymi air force officer jeopardised this support, resulting in a mutiny in the armed forces in the Baghdad region. This was smashed by the Republican Guard, but cracks have now appeared in the solid support Saddam still has among the Sunni elites.

If this disillusion grows, then Saddam can be seriously weakened, and a popular insurrection, which would have to take in central Iraq as well as the North and South, could take advantage of the divisions in the ruling classes. Set against this are the two Kurdish nationalist parties, each fighting for control of the North, ready with their own prisons and execution squads to crush any genuine mass uprising (3,000 have already died in fighting there).

Also ready to intervene would be the Shiite oppositionists, and the Iraqi National Congress controlled by Ahmed Chalabi, a wealthy banker. Behind him stands the Saudi regime and the Americans. These would agree to a return to some form of bourgeois democracy and a deal with the Kurds if this meant the stabilisation of the area and the sabotage of any working class uprising.

And in Iran...

DISAFFECTION WITH THE clerical regime in Iran is increasing as the mullahs are shown to be as corrupt as any secular rulers, and as willing to put the screws on the working class.

In June a slogan appeared on a Tehran flyover calling for "Death to the Mullahs!". Last August serious riots broke out in the northern city of Qazvin in response to the worsening economic conditions. And on the 4th of April of this year, discontent erupted again with riots in the shantytown of Akbar Abad, 18 miles southwest of Tehran.

Discontent

Several hundred migrant workers protested about price rises for public transport and fuel. They overpowered the police sent to quell them, taking their arms. The clerical militias, the Revolutionary Guards, were then sent in, firing on the crowds indiscriminately. As many as 50 were killed. Crowds converged on the area from surrounding shantytowns chanting, "Down with the Islamic Republic, Down with Rafsanjani (the Iranian President), Down with Khameini (the heir to Khomeini, the supreme religious leader)". A news blackout was imposed and thousands of Revolutionary Guards sealed off the area.

The ruling regime is hopelessly split between the 'moderates' who want to open up to the West, and the fundamentalist clerics. A revolution of the masses could overthrow the whole sorry crew. It was mass action that overthrew the Shah and that had the potential of developing in a revolutionary direction with the appearance of workers' committees, before it was hijacked by the clerical reactionaries under Khomeini.

A plague on both their houses — The civil war in Algeria

SINCE THE MILITARY takeover in January 1992 after the Islamic fundamentalists of FIS won a majority at the elections, Algeria has been plunged into a civil war that has claimed at least 30,000 lives. Caught between the two factions, the Algerian people have been subjected to the napalm of the Army and the bombs of the fundamentalists.

As usual, the Western press have obscured the situation, reducing it to a simple fundamentalists v military. Take one example. A general strike against the government took place in February. The same day, an Algerian woman was murdered by the fundamentalists. The Western media reported only on the last event. Who profits from this? Well, institutions like the International Monetary Fund who congratulated the Algerian government on the first successes it had won in "its strategy to integrate its economy into the international economy in liberalising its foreign trade... in giving a more important role to market forces". Yes, a very great victory, with unemployment at 27%, inflation at 27.8% and the situation set to further deteriorate with the government pursuing the same course.

The IMF has presented a plan for structural adjustment accepted by the military regime. Hundreds of nationalised industries have been privatised. This will lead to mass sackings.

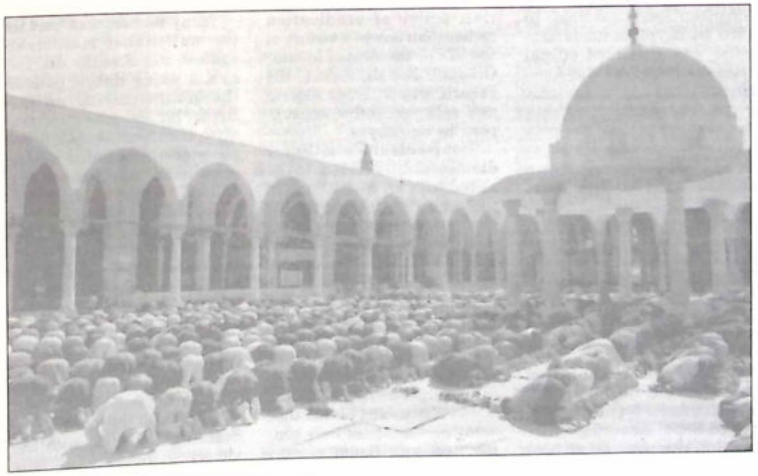
The nationalists who came to power in Algeria did so after a bloody war of independence against the French colonialists. This war had certain aspects of a 'civil war' about it: the struggle between two nationalist factions — the FLN and the MNA — and with the pro-French Moslems. Within the FLN itself, power struggles raged and people like Abane Ramadane, member of the Coordination of the Maquis of the Interior were murdered by their own comrades, as well as founder members of the FLN like Ben Boulaid, who it was claimed at the time was killed by the French.

After independence these struggles continued. The Army led by Boumedienne made sure that Ben Bella of the FLN came to power, and those who objected within their ranks were exiled or imprisoned. Oppositionists were hunted down and shot in West Germany and Spain. The regime has been characterised by frequent 'car crashes', 'plane crashes', 'suicides', 'breaking necks whilst getting out of the bath', among both the military and government officials, signalling internal power struggles. Even the murder of President Boudiaf in recent years, allegedly murdered by fundamentalists, is now thought to be the result of internal power struggles.

Packed

All the institutions — the Press, the single Party, police, unions, mass associations, and of course directors of industry, have been packed with people the regime can depend on; with allies, relations and friends. President Chadli installed practically his entire family in important positions.

It has been claimed that President Chadli deliberately provoked the mass demonstrations of young people in 1988 in order to call in the Army to reestablish law and order. He was thus assured of a united power base, by implicating the Army leaders in a bloody and brutal repression.



The civil war has involved the systematic murder of those very close to the regime by the fundamentalists. But along with these murders took place those of many intellectuals whose death would have suited the military as much as the fundamentalists, like the greatest Algerian playwright Abdelkader Alloula, whose throat was cut in 1994.

The secret police group SM (Securité Militaire, nicknamed Sport and Music) was trained in the USSR, where they learnt torture, manipulation of crowds, infiltration and counter-insurgency. The demos of 1988 were the fruit of one of these manipulations. The demonstrators were then machine-gunned by men in plain clothes. These events were the result of power struggles between different clans in the ruling regime.

The SM has infiltrated the fundamentalist groups and is manipulating them. It was definitely involved in the strikes called by the fundamentalists. Following these, the military agreed to a free press (but who are the journalists authorised to create this 'free press'?). 'Free' elections were organised, but the military had not imagined that the FLN would have such a disastrous result. The military had to annul the elections, and imprisoned the fundamentalist leaders and MPs.

The fundamentalists made their first big public appearance in 1988 on 7th October at Belcourt, a neighbourhood of Algiers, on demonstrations led by the religious leaders, the imams, with 6-7,000 people. Another fundamentalist demo on the 10th was fired on by the military, resulting in 25-30 dead.

The FIS managed to hijack the vast discontent seething in Algeria. Far from being a united organisation it based itself primarily on a rejection of the regime. Since independence, a succession of leaders like Ben Bella to Boudiaf have imposed Western solutions "inadapted to a country of Moslem tradition" according to the FIS. It has grouped together the most impoverished, the marginalised youth, small shop-keepers and traders and artisans, alongside the Arabising functionaries, with a reactionary and religious programme. It employs an anti-imperialist rhetoric (but not a practice!). It has denounced the deal between the government and the IMF as treason.

There are two main tendencies within it — the Salafists (the dogmatists) who recall the time of the Prophet, and the Dzaraists (Algerianists) who advance an Algerian Mohammedanism and are legalists. It was they who led the FIS into the elections. The Moslem movement is itself disunited. Alongside the FIS are the 'moderates' of Hamas, and the Armed Islamic Groups, led by veterans of the war in Afghanistan: uncompromising, extreme fundamentalists.

The fundamentalists started a campaign of violence in 1989 by burning alive a nurse who had physical contact with men in the course of her work, and the fire-bombing of a flat belonging to a teacher in a women's liberation group. In February 1990 women students were attacked at Constantine University. At Blida a woman student was flogged in April 1990, and the flat of four divorced women firebombed. This did not stop them winning the municipal elections in June 1990.

What of the other political currents in Algeria? For its part the PAGS (Party of the Socialist Vanguard), the rechristened Communist Party, took the side of the regime as it had habitually done in the past.

At its last conference in 1993 it saluted the Army and Police, going on to say that the market economy was the way forward and supporting the measures imposed by the IMF. It transformed itself into the Ettahadi (Party, State, Progress and Modernity). This did not stop its leader being shot dead! Significantly the regime failed to condemn the murder. Soon after a militant of the Workers Party (Trotskyists) was shot dead. The police refused to accompany an ambulance to the scene of the murder. A journalist wrote about a fundamentalist who had been acquitted after planting a bomb. He was arrested for insulting the judge! It is difficult to tell whether a murder is carried out by the fundamentalists, by the secret services who have infiltrated and are manipulating fundamentalist groups, or by Army and secret police units masquerading as fundamentalists!

The fundamentalist terror has been used as a smokescreen and a pretext for the State to remove all obstacles to the austerity programme of the IMF. Many militants of the Workers Party have been imprisoned. At the same time the regime enlisted the help of the Algerian democrats like Ettahaddin, the Front des Forces Socialistes led by Ait Hamed, the Movement for Democracy led by Ben Bella, and the Assembly for Culture and Democracy of Dr. Said Sadi, to condone the repression.

For a long time, fundamentalism has been used by the Western powers as a weapon against the Soviet bloc. The French President Giscard admitted this in 1980. Sayed Kobt, one of the leaders of the Moslem Brotherhood in Egypt, spent three years in the USA from 1949-51. At this period he was used to destabilise the Arab nationalist regime of Nasser, in the Soviet orbit and as a source of inspiration to Arab and African nationalists. In 1967 he was executed for plotting with the American secret services. In 1980 an Egyptian fundamentalist was appointed official religious leader by the Algerian State. He was the only person apart from the President to address the nation on TV.

Another country plays a key role in the development of the FIS — Saudi Arabia. Through its World Islamic League it set up a religious school in Algeria. One of the FIS leaders, Ali Bonhadj, was one of its pupils. Abassi Madani, another FIS leader, attended the school for a period. The head of the school, Abu Bakr, was consulted on the creation of the FIS, and it was thanks to him that it received Saudi financing. After the Gulf War when Saudi Arabia and the FIS parted ways, the Saudi Minister of Defence declared that his country "had generously aided these ingrates". The Saudi Red Cross helped Algerian fundamentalists enter Afghanistan, where they gained valuable military training during the war against the Soviets and their client regime.

Above: Wall slogans call for an Islamic state.

Cut off by its sugar-daddy, FIS turned towards Iran. Saudi Arabia now switched sides, giving support to the military regime.

The USA also initially supported the FIS regime against the regime. Part of the US administration still does so, but on the other hand many American businesses are prospering in Algeria because of the new petrol agreements.

On top of this, the Republicans now control Congress. Their views are reflected in a report by one Perlmutter, close to Bush, who stated: "It would be preferable for the Americans to support an Algerian policy of eradication rather than accept a victory of the FIS or the Armed Islamic Groups". For their part, the French, who still see Algeria as a sphere of influence, support the military.

Boumedienne's military dictatorship decided to go ahead with an Arabisation of the country. Algerian Arabic was considered as a dialect and Middle Eastern Arabic was seen as true Arabic and promoted in the schools. It was during this period from 1965 until well into the '70s that large numbers of fundamentalist preachers were brought in to teach this 'real' Arabic, from Egypt and Syria. It was also in this period that many new mosques were constructed with Saudi money. The fundamentalist clerics pushed this Arabisation in the schools, mosques and universities. Islam has always been used by the regime to make the masses swallow the worst social and economic medicine.

The Berbers

The first meeting of the Algerian region with Islam was a very bloody one. Islam was introduced into North Africa by a process of colonisation, where Arab soldiers massacred and pillaged the towns and villages that refused to surrender. They met fierce resistance in the Algerian region from the local population, a non-Arab people, the Berbers. Hundreds of Berber revolts took place against the central Arab power that was established, but finally many Berbers began to collaborate and to accept Islam and the Arab language.

Many Berbers took part in the nationalist movement against the French. Ali Yehya, a young Kabyle (one of the groups making up the Berber people) denounced the myth of an Arab Moslem Algeria within nationalist circles organised in France. He gained a majority in Paris. What followed was a series of expulsions, fist-fights, knife-attacks and attempted assassinations, when those in favour of an Arabo-Islamic orientation of the movement, under Ben Bella, won the upper hand. The FLN won the war against the French using religion and the myth of a united Arab nation.

As soon as the new nation-State was installed with the victory of the FLN, assaults began on the Berber language and culture, with a series of humiliations for all the Berbers — the Kabyles, Chaouias, Mozabites and Touaregs.

This resulted in a mass uprising in Kabylie in 1980 against the oppression of Berber language and culture. This uprising also advanced ideas about women's emancipation and it is no surprise that today the movement for women's liberation in Algeria is the most advanced and combative in the 'Arab' world. The Army was sent in resulting in 700 wounded and more than 500 arrests.

Failure

The radicalisation of the Islamic groups in Algeria is a direct result of the failure of Algerian nationalism in all its forms — whether reformist, 'revolutionary', or militarist. The 'revolutionary' currents have been predominantly Berber, often calling themselves Marxist, and concealing this because of the nature of the period. Many came from a modest rural background, keeping their links with the Kabyle countryside and the working class immigrants in France.

The fundamentalist reaction was in part a response to the Berber revolt, and the regime initially hoped to use the fundamentalists to tame this resistance, as the standard-bearer of Arabisation. Because they are non-Arabs, they are a main target of the Arabising FIS.

In response, many armed defence groups have set up in Berber areas. Unfortunately, the State has made efforts to integrate this grass-roots resistance into their own war against the FIS.

Despite the civil war, strikes have taken place in the docks, and the gas and oil industries in response to the measures of the regime. This has decided that the repayment of the debt was a priority over the feeding of the people. For example, the prices of coffee and sugar have gone up 50%, and it has been decided that only limited quantities of certain foodstuffs should be on sale. For example, only 800,000 tonnes of milk compared to 1m in 1991, at a time when the population is increasing.

Other products regarded as superfluous or of secondary importance have been banned from import, like mushrooms and meat. Also banned from import have been textiles, clothing and shoes.

Favour

It pleases the Western powers, in particular France, that the FIS are in favour of a market economy, that they are against emigration to the decadent West, for the return of Algerians living and working in Europe, and for a strong rule over the masses. This was the tactics of the Socialist administrations in France, but as noted earlier, the Gaullists now in power favour the military. Whether the FIS or the Army, the Western powers want a strong regime that will meet their demands that emigration from Algeria, and through Algeria from black Africa, be limited, and that the masses be controlled.

As revolutionaries, we see the only way out coming from independent initiatives within the working class, and within the womens' organisations and Berber defence squads, that can break with both the military and the fundamentalists. Knowing the strong traditions of revolt and, despite everything, strong libertarian impulses amongst the Algerian masses, we do not think this is completely impossible.

Anarchism in Arabic

Lebanese libertarians Al Badil al taharouri have translated Anarchism by Daniel Guerin into Arabic. Despite some flaws, this is still considered by many to be the best introduction to class struggle anarchism, written by someone actually active in the movement for a change, the late Daniel Guerin, veteran libertarian communist. ROMANIA

The fall of Ceaucescu led to his replacement by another bunch of bureaucrats who had been part of his regime!

As elsewhere, the regime is attempting to impose austerity programmes on the working class and peasants. Simmering discontent has led to a general strike on April 11th of this year. The first to strike were health workers in Cluj Napoca, a town in Transylvania. This had been preceded by a strike of 5,000 Tube workers in the capital Bucharest on 3rd April. The government was forced to concede pay rises and improvement of working conditions.

The Cluj strike was followed by a telecommunications workers' strike in Hargluda and Ploesti, where there was also a large demonstration of petrol workers. There were major demos in towns throughout Romania — in Arad, Ploesti, Birlad, Vaslui, Constanta, Cluj, Iasi, Buzau, Calarasi, Timisoara. Out on strike were petrochemical, metal, health, car and telecom workers. A demonstration of 70,000 assembled outside Victoria Palace, the home of the Romanian parliament. This is massive by Romanian standards. Slogans chanted were "Down with Iliescu!" (President of Romania) and "Down with Vacaroiu!" (the Prime Minister), "Who will Execute the Government?", and "Thieves!"

The goverment were forced to make concessions through the mediation of the trade union bloc CNSLR (National Confederation of Free Unions) led by Pavel Todoran. Despite the orchestrated action by the unions, a number of actions, including strikes and blockades of railway lines were spontaneous.

The class struggle in prisons

An interview with Graham at Swalesdale

ACF: What forms of resistance take place in prison?
G: There isn't much these days. The great days of the '70s, '80s and early '90s are well gone. After Manchester, people saw the results. We all resist in our own little way, using the system for what we can, getting what we can out of it. But major resistance, no.

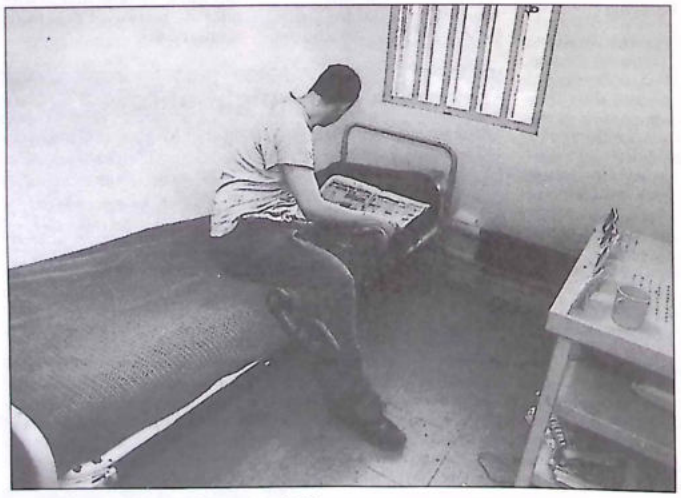
But resistance is good because I am looking at the results right now. In my cell there's a toilet and a sink and while it's not very nice living in a toilet, it's a lot better than having to shit in a tin bucket; and having washing facilities with hot and cold water is a lot better than having to wash with just a jug of cold water... and the reason I've got those facilities is because the lads who rioted at Manchester put their liberty on the line for me... and every other prisoner, which we should never forget.

For resistance to be good it's got to be something big like that, where there's a lot of publicity behind it and there are enquiries and so on. But petty resistance, arguing with the screws and refusing to go to work etc, get you nowhere. We've got a whole wing here that's extended into a punishment block, but because the authorities can only give up to 14 days punishment, the governor will say, "OK, I'm not giving any punishment for this offence but you'll be transferred to 'A' wing." There you are locked up 23 and a half hours a day and you get nothing: no association or television. And in some of the cells where former prisoners have smashed the toilet and the sink, then they are taken out completely and we are back to the old prison piss pot. And this is a brand new prison, it's only been open five or six years.

So, resistance, there's no such thing because there's no class solidarity in prison these days. Drugs are the rulers in prison on the one hand, and parole is on the other. If you're not worried about where your next fix is coming from, if you're not a heroin addict, then you're worried about what the screws are going to put down on their report. We now have a system of SI reports. These are confidential (to the screws) notes that are put into your record. Often, if they want to be funny, they put down what they want about you. Everything you do is noted and written about. To get away with anything is almost impossible.

I thought I'd got away with it in Nottingham prison when I refused to work in the tailors' shop. They put me in the punishment block where I stayed for three months. They came down and tried to have a little go at me with the result that I smashed up the cell and it cost them £18,000 to put it right. The immediate result was to put me back on my original wing and to say I could have any job I wanted, "just keep quiet". I thought I'd won. I should have known a lot better because the result of that is that I'm sent to Swalesdale. This is the class of prison I was sent to when I started eight years ago, so I've really gone back to my bird. It hasn't deterred me, I'm still the same person I was, but it just makes me a bit more wary. I think before I act now and make every action effective rather than just for a laugh. There's no laughs in this game, especially when doing a life sentence.

So resistance is out because there's no class solidarity. None whatsoever. You might get two or three people who will stick together but you won't get the whole prison going on sit-down strikes anymore. That's all finished; so there is no resistance, not as such.



React

ACF: How do the authorities and prisoners react to stories of prison rebellion?
G: Usually the screws just go out and sulk and the lads sit by the television cheering it on. I don't think it adds to or incites riots in any other prisons because it is very much 'dog eat dog', I'm afraid, in prisons today. The prevailing view is that if my comrade is getting the shit kicked out of him in some other prison, "what's it to me?". I'm alright here with my feet up and a fag in my hand. That seems to be the attitude. The only time when prison riots go from prison to prison is when they are prison officer-instigated. Prison officers may have a grouse with the Home Office and work to rule etc, and they make it quite plain that if we smash the place up a bit and help them, then our visits go ahead and so on. So, every prison tends to go up at the same time. The situation is coordinated by the Prison Officers Association. Sometimes rebellions are isolated. There's a gaol up North which got destroyed as bad as at Manchester. That was prison officer-instigated but the POA refused to back them on the matter, so they just made as much trouble in that gaol until it went up. So, a riot in one gaol being reported in the media does not affect the next gaol to the extent that the gaol will 'go up'. In fact, it relieves the tension. If you are walking around bored and fed up and a prison goes up when you are all sitting round watching television, jeering and shouting, it relieves a lot of the tension! Then you go out and take the mickey out of the screws. I think the screws are a bit relieved when riots occur in other gaols because it lessens the chances of there being one in their own particular gaol.

ACF: Could you describe the hierarchies that exist in prisons?
G: The top dogs are the heroin sellers, the purveyors of death. I hate them as much as I hate any other oppressor. But, they have the money, they have the heroin and everybody wants it and they're looked up to. Heroin is now boss and it's filthy.

There isn't much of a hierarchy, except that a decent thief is considered OK and a sex offender or a grass is at the bottom of the shit-heap.

ACF: Could you say something about prisons and costs?
G: Well, what you've got to remember is the aim of this government is privatisation, to sell off the gaols. So, the more prisoners you have got and the longer you have them in, the more viable a proposition the gaols are. In this prison, for instance, one of the aims is to keep the costs down because this prison is virtually unmanageable in the way it's built. It's one that the government has got to get shot of as quickly as possible.

Somewhere like Nottingham, which is a nice little prison and holds only 200 prisoners, is being extended so as to hold 500. It has to hold at least that number before the private sector is interested. It's all geared up to the private sector and career management. It's got very little to do with prisons as such. Prisons are such a difficult issue that the government wants to put them on somebody else's back, ie the private sector.

ACF: To what extent are basic human dignities allowed or denied?
G: I think I should tell you about visitors being strip searched at the gate. In some prisons this is handled with a bit more dignity than others but I don't think it can be handled with dignity as far as prisoners are concerned, eg a prison officer looking at his wife's intimate parts.

As far as prisoners are concerned, we are locked up in our cells overnight. If I want to use the toilet I can. Unlike the old-fashioned spy holes in the cell door, we now have slits which are about a foot long and three inches wide, from which the screw can see the whole cell. We are not allowed to cover this up. So if you want to go to the toilet, I have to do so in full view of a prison officer. And don't forget, there are a lot of female staff here.

Also, what we used to do is wedge the door shut so that it can't be opened. In some prisons, with more relaxed regimes, they will allow this if you explain that you are on the toilet. Here it is an offence, so any officer can see what you're doing. During the day, anyone, prison officers, prisoners, welfare officers etc, can walk in at any time. There is, in short, no dignity whatsoever in prison. In this prison, officers regularly enter the cell, order you to strip and then search your cell. Prison officers want to look at your private parts, they say they want to see what you are hiding in your Y-fronts! It's very hard for some people to take if they're shy.

Assault

The reason for stripping people is done under Home Office Psychiatry Team recommendations. According to them, if an inmate is forced to display his genitalia to a prison officer, he is not so likely to assault him. He is more likely to be made to feel small and kept in his place. It's just psychological control. They're not interested in what you are hiding.

A person can only be internally searched by a medical officer. A person who is suspected of having swallowed drugs given during a visit is taken to a room with no facilities whatsoever and the contents of his crap are examined. I think that is a little undignified — of course real drug smugglers don't bring in the stuff like that. It's part of the silly little games that the authorities want to play with you.

When you get sentenced to prison the state owns you. You are no longer a human being. At the moment we are regarded as commodities. When the private sector gets hold of us, we will revert to being slaves. At the moment we are treated like farm animals, so long as we do as we are told and are where we're supposed to be, that's all they are concerned with.

ACF: Could you tell us about prisoners' political awareness?
G: Prisoners are a reactionary bunch since survival is the key in here. There is scope for political development; there are people who are willing to learn why their lives are buggered up. The prisoners who are into politics are mainly in the top security prisons, eg the provos. Even then such prisoners are not that interested in politics in gaol since survival is the key question. We tend to see it as two different worlds: prison and out there. And when people out there start lecturing us, telling us how to live, we say, "You come and live in here, you bugger and you try it!"

Reactionary

Prisoners can only be reactionary. Management over the years, over to the fine tuning stage now, have so perfected their control that anybody trying to educate people politically is just moved from prison to prison. The maximum any long-termer stays in one prison is two years. The authorities don't want you to get permanent friends; they don't want you to start trusting people and they don't want you to start fighting back most of all. There isn't much scope for political development except for people who were politically aware before they went into prison, like myself. But you're very much on your own and you have to do it by using the govenment's weapon, ie paperwork, not by violence or any other means. Violence is no use in prison. The only time that violence is any good is when you can get away with it. You can't get away with it easily in here as you are completely trapped. There is nowhere to run, in here you have to use intelligence, not force. Not many people can do this as prisons are substitutes for our closed-down mental hospitals.

ACF: Are you forced to do any work?
G: Yes, comrade, we are forced to do work and the work is onerous. The work in most prisons involves textiles, working at sewing machines and light assembly work. if you aren't involved in something else then that is what you do. The work is repetitive and only one operation is done by one man throughout the shift. It is soul-destroying and the pay is pretty low. Prisoners aren't allowed to practise their skills. Engineers, for example, would be made to work in the kitchen because you are not allowed to know more than your instructor.

Here are some pay rates. Light textiles pays £5.60 a week, education £5.10, light assembly work £5.60, gardening £5.10, orderlies £6.10, kitchens £8.10, unemployed nil and retired £4. Given the costs here in prison, it is impossible to live on a prison wage. Everybody has a fiddle.

ACF: Could you tell us something about the internal prison economies?
G: The black economy is based largely on heroin today. People can bring in a small supply of heroin easily and it is taken to the cell and mixed with other substances to stretch it out a bit and then sell it. One prisoner told me that a bag of heroin mixture sold here for £10 has about 50p worth of heroin in it. The big money-maker today is heroin, whilst before it used to be tobacco. Cannabis is very extensive too.

Heroin

Also, there is the buying and selling of clothing. Somebody with a good supply of money from selling heroin will buy nicer clothes than others have got. Some of the younger lads hooked on heroin will sell their backsides which again is part of the unofficial economy. The amount of money to be made out of heroin means that it is virtually uncontrollable.

ACF: Would you say something about your own situation?
G: My own situation was that I was called to assist a young girl (aged 14) who was being beaten up and her clothes were being removed by a large 23-year-old man. He was wielding a pick-axe handle and in fact he whacked her over the head with this because she was black. When I went to ask him to stop so I could take the girl to hospital, he attacked me. Rather than let him hit me I took out my knife and stabbed him in the nose, upon which he collapsed. I didn't kill him, it only went into his nose (extremely painful, I should think). He died of a sub-achranoid haemmhorage which is near enough by natural causes. And I am still appealing after eight years.

ACF: Any final points?
G: It doesn't pay to stop crime; it pays very well for the people who run the penal system, judges and so forth. The cannon fodder are not only the prisoners but also the prison officers. If prisons were empty and there was no more crime, there would be a lot of people out of work and with privatisation going through, it would be rendered a dead duck. This is a vast industry. Each governor gets a good bonus, about £20,000, if there are no escapees from his prison, and the top dog gets even more than this.

What is important is that you people involved in the revolutionary movement keep it alive. Your business is propaganda or whatever, but it's important that people like me in here can keep up with current affairs by reading your magazines. When I've read them I can leave them on the landing or pass them on so they are read and people can see an alternative, a way out. A great deal of prisoners in here are not criminals but social inadequates. But it should be realised that they have no opportunity to be anything else. Everyone is a human being and can be educated and pointed in the right direction.

The above is an edited version of an hour and a half taped interview, which contains much more information than space allows here. If you would like a copy of the full, often humorous and insightful version on audio tape, please write to Organise!, enclosing a cheque for £5. All proceeds go to the prisoner.

Mumia Abu-Jamal

BY THE TIME you read this, Mumia Abu-Jamal may be dead, executed by the State of Pennsylvania.

Mumia Abu-Jamal started political activity at the age of 13, in 1967, when as a school student he protested against the 'education' in Philadelphia's segregated schools. Frank Rizzo, Philadelphia's police boss, led busloads of baton-wielding cops to smash the protest, arresting 57 and seriously injuring 22. Mumia was among those arrested. He was again arrested in 1968 when he took part in a demonstration against a presidential rally by the champion of segregation, George Wallace. He was yet again arrested the following year when he was among those rounded up in HQ (by now the 15-year-old was the Panthers' Minister of Information). Later on in the year, he was the first speaker at an event to commemorate the murder of Panther leader Fred Hampton in Chicago by the police and FBI. In the '70s he broadcast as the "voice of the voiceless" over local radio.

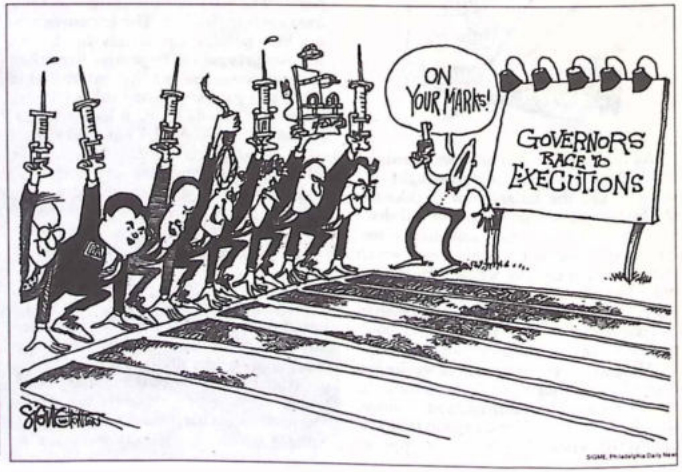
All of this attracted the attention of Rizzo. When Mumia spoke against the murder of 11 MOVE members, he went to the head of the list of those Rizzo wanted put out of action. Rizzo had orchestrated the siege of the MOVE commune house which culminated in the death of 11 members. The MOVE was a group of black activists who were moving towards anarchist positions. Rizzo personally warned Mumia that: "...one day, and I hope it's in my career, that you're going to be held responsible and accountable for what you do".

The opportunity came in 1981 when Mumia was shot in the chest by a cop, who was found dead. He was sent to Death Row. Whilst critically wounded, he was beaten and kicked. At the trial he was denied the right to represent himself or have an attorney of his choice. Despite four witnesses stating that someone else had shot the cop and fled, Mumia was sentenced to death, his political past being used as evidence that 'proved' he was a 'cop-killer'.

In prison he has been denied the use of a typewriter or much library time, yet continues to write articles and essays on a wide range of political issues. The Philadelphia police managed to get 12 broadcasts by Mumia cancelled on National Public Radio, but failed to stop the publication of his book Live from Death Row. (Despite the cops hiring a plane that flew over the publishing house flying a banner that attacked the decision to print).



Death

The election of Tom Ridge as Governor of Pennsylvania in 1994 was to be a turning point in Mumia's long suffering. Ridge is a supporter of capital punishment. He has already signed five death warrants and has now signed one for Mumia. Unless the level of protest can be raised, he risks being murdered by the State in August.

In Britain the campaign against the judicial murder has been taken over by the horrific Stalinists of the Spartacist League, who are invested in the Partisan Defence Committee, along with Trotskyist grouplets like the Revolutionary Internationalist League. The pickets of the US Embassy have been used as an opportunity by the Spartacists to chant their robotic Party-building slogans. Nevertheless, it is up to everyone to attend the pickets and marginalise them. We urge all libertarian revolutionaries to attend the picket and try to get as many as possible at them.

Similarly you can show the video From Death Row, this is Mumia Abu-Jamal that the Partisan Defence committee have, by phoning 0171-485 1396. Say you're interested in the Mumia case and ignore any Spartacist recruiting.

Prisoners' support:

ANARCHIST BLACK CROSS

Prisoners' Justice Day: August 10th

IN 1975, prisoner Eddie Nalon was left to die after a suicide attempt. The panic button in his cell was disconnected. Fellow prisoners at Millhaven Maximum Secure Unit in Canada went on hunger strike in protest.

So was born Prisoners' Justice Day. it is a day of protest when people remember those who have died in prison, whether from the routine brutality of prison life, murder by screws or other prisoners, or suicide.

It spread throughout Canada and is now an International Day of Action, involving both prisoners and their supporters. Actions have included work-strikes, demonstrations and hunger strikes. It is also about building solidarity between prisoners and increasing support from the outside.

In Britain, the Anarchist Black Cross (ABC) began supporting Prisoners' Justice Day in 1992 and since then an increasing number of demonstrations and events have taken place here. This year it will hopefully be bigger still and everyone who can support it should do so. Various actions and demonstrations will take place around the country; the more that are organised, the better!

John Perotti

John Perotti, the anarchist prison activist, has again been set up by prison authorities and placed in an isolation control unit. His work for fellow prisoners has long made him a target of the prison authorities. He was intending to start a hunger strike from May 1st, 1995, unless he was released from isolation and transferred to a prison in a different state.

John is asking that letters be sent protesting at his treatment and demanding that Director Wilkinson transfer him out of the state immediately.

David Bowen

David Bowen was a remand prisoner at the time of the Strangeways prison uprising in April 1990, awaiting trial for stealing a pair of curtains. In December 1992 he escaped from custody while being transported from Hull prison to Manchester Crown Court. He was found guilty in his absence of conspiring to commit grevious bodily harm on prison officers (which he denies) and sentenced to nine years. He subsequently received a further three years on a trumped-up charge of perverting the cause of justice and has recently lost an appeal.

He is now being tried for escaping from lawful custody, for which he is pleading not guilty. He is presenting a defence of duress, citing his treatment in prison, including verbal and physical abuse from screws at Hull prison.

David and the 22 others convicted at the Strangeways show trials are scapegoats for the prison system and a warning to other prisoners not to make trouble. They deserve our support.

WHOSE HERITAGE?

THE LAST FEW years have seen the growth of the so-called 'heritage industry'. It found a fertile soil in the social climate of late '80s Britain and has continued to flourish as the commercial maNagement of our social life expands still further. The heritage industry is not just a commercial phenomenon, though. It is part and parcel of attempts by the British ruling class to use a visible past to construct an image of enduring traditions, to promote national unity and to hide class conflict.

The roots of this political presentation of the past can be traced to the last century. In the late 19th century, capitalism and the established institutions of the Crown, the Church and the aristocracy were perceived to be threatened by working class militancy and republican and revolutionary ideas. Sections of the ruling class had a broad cultural response to these pressures to accompany the usual legal sanctions and police violence. This included the invention of grand royal ceremonies, the promotion of patriotic and imperial themes within ceremonial music and the architectural remodelling of London in keeping with its status as imperial capital. The overall intention was to emphasise the traditional, 'enduring' aspects of the governing institutions in order to overawe, enthuse or intimidate the mass of people.

One facet of this cultural offensive was the Ancient Monuments Protection Act of 1882, proposed by Sir John Lubbock to "preserve from demolition or decay works of ancient times that are tangible evidences of the gradual establishment of the great institutions". Under the Act a Royal Commission was formed and an Inspector of Ancient Monuments was appointed. The first Inspector, Lubbock's father-in-law, General Pitt-Rivers, elaborated on his role: "The law that Nature makes no jumps can be taught... in such a way at least to make men cautious how they listen to scatter-brained revolutionary suggestions".

Power and Prestige

The primary focus of the Act was the preservation and presentation of castles, mansions, abbeys and churches — all visible expressions of the power and prestige of the Church and the aristocracy. The National Trust, formed in 1895 to encourage the appreciation of 'national treasures' among the lower classes, developed a similar bias towards celebrating the ill-gotten gains of the British ruling elite, their 'gangsters' castles' built on slavery and oppression abroad and exploitation at home. The kind of national unity and sense of natural order that such displays were intended to underline required amnesia or ignorance of past exploitation on the part of those it was supposed to impress. Even today we are invited to marvel at the good taste and sophistication of a class that continues to prosper at our expense (heard the one about Lord Muck who left his stately pile to the National Trust so that he could still live on site while NT members pick up the tab?).

The manipulation of the past has continued to be a preoccupation of the ruling class. In 1975, as if to echo the anxieties of a hundred years before, a Department of the Environment document, What is our Heritage?, stated that "heritage would give a feeling of continuity and a sense of security to face the difficult years ahead". This was published at a time when the confidence of the capitalist class had been severely shaken by a tide of working class militancy. The DoE document shows that the idea of a 'national heritage' was being tied explicitly to the promotion of social cohesion and stability. Meanwhile, a new counter-offensive against the working class was in preparation.

The policies pursued by the Thatcher administration were to a great extent the continuation of the austerity policies pursued by the previous Labour government. The social and political climate of 'Thatcher's Britain' proved to be the catalyst for the growth of the heritage industry. It would be wrong to say that there was some grand design behind this development, especially as there were certain contributory factors that might not have been predicted, but the 1975 DoE document does look strangely phrophetic.

One contributory factor was the leisure industry. Increasingly, capitalism has required us to make profits for capitalists in our free time as well as in our work time. US capitalism pioneered such developments with covered shopping complexes, private spaces designed to attract consumers at the weekend. The packaging and selling of less tangible commodities via 'theme parks' was to follow. Wild spaces became national parks, devoted to a more subtle but nonetheless real encroachment on self-generated activity. The commodification of the past would be just one more step in this process, helped along by government policy in the eighties.

Below: Stoke Newington pumping station is to be turned into a climbing centre.

State-manipulated social disintegration and a sense of loss and disorientation on the part of many people reinforced an attachment to things old. There was a vein of nostalgia here to be tapped by the leisure industry. As fast as the familiar anchors of everyday life were removed they reappeared as 'heritage'. Look at how recession-hit factories and warehouses have been turned into leisure attractions, eg the soon-to-open Castle climbing and sports centre in North London (previously a pumping station), the turning of slate mines in North Wales into tourist attractions and the various developments in Docklands. Changes in employment patterns accelerated this process as the government promoted a 'candy floss economy' based on the selling of services from which the leisure and tourist industry were ideally suited. 'Heritage' was to remain a major theme for the ruling class, but with a more commercial bias in keeping with Thatcherite ideology. With this 'market-led' approach there was less emphasis on the pomp and circumstance of the aristocratic past in favour of a broader, more populist emphasis, but with a restricted set of interpretations in tune with a Daily Mail view of the world.

Natural Order

Museums and heritage parks appeared that sought to portray the everyday life of working people in the past. At first sight it would seem to be an acknowledgement of working class history, but at a deeper level it is about representing working class people as fulfilling pre-set roles and subordinates in the 'natural order'. It is about presenting a communal or national past with an absence of class conflict. Such critical distortions of working class experience can be found at the Beamish open-air museum, which aims to show Geordie life at the turn of the century, complete with trams, pubs and an apparently harmonious community in period costume. It's an all-singing, all-dancing Hovis advert with no hint of the grinding poverty or bad working conditions. The Ironbridge Gorge museum also glosses over the harsh realities of the Industrial Revolution with its emphasis on the 'nuts and bolts' of technological achievement and not the misery that existed. HM government has nominated Ironbridge as a 'World Heritage' site.

A sinister twist to the heritage saga is the proliferation of mining museums around closed-down collieries. You can almost see the grin on the face of government ministers as their mortal enemies, the miners, become museum pieces. Through the heritage process it is as if we are being told that the working class is no longer making history, it is history. It tallies with the oft-repeated idea that the class struggle is somehow a thing of the past. One slate mine museum in North Wales even sells a pamphlet which tries to argue that a major strike in the mine's history was one of the main reasons that the mine is no longer thriving.

The promotion of nationalist ideology through heritage is just another step in reinforcing a perception of social cohesion and class peace that our rulers want us to share. The Mary Rose, Henry VIII's ill-fated tub, was dredged out of the Solent to the accompaniment of post-Falklands hysteria. The nationalist overtones of such icons as HMS Victory are inescapable, while the old Royal Naval College at Greenwich will be declared a World Heritage Site in time for the Millennium celebrations to be held there. Added to that we've had the nationalistic jamborees around the D-Day and VE Day anniversaries.

We've seen the visible past used to construct an image of enduring traditions in stained glass and stone, to promote patriotism, national unity and class peace. It is an idealised past that in recent years has been turned into a saleable commodity, diluting to an extent the message that sections of the ruling class might want to get across, but still affirming the values of wage slavery, hierarchy and the market. It also reinforces a view of culture as 'English', encouraging the white working class to identify with their white rulers and to see ethnic groups (the Irish, Afro-Caribbean, Asian etc) as being outside this common cultural 'heritage'.

What are the possible working class and revolutionary responses to this cultural offensive? Because heritage is such a diffuse quality there are a number of different areas susceptible to conflict and subversion. On a practical level class struggle can flare up at any time and in any place. For instance, while 'living museums' celebrate an industrial or rural past there is an industrial present of job insecurity, shit wages and conditions within the heritage industry as much as anywhere. So the potential for conflict is there. There is also a conflict in the interpretation and use of the past, a conflict which this article is intended to encourage. The past is important in gaining a sense of working class tradition, not to discourage struggle but to inspire us in the present. There is also the 'quality' of historic things and places, which are not 'precious', having as much potential for use today as any day. Look at what's been done in the 'old town' districts of many British cities where streets have been cobbled and 'Victorianised' with railings and bollards. Plenty of ammunition there for present-day conflict!

As for the aristocracy, it has been said that they have been largely insulated from everyday class conflict both because of their social distance and the spatial distance imposed by their deer parks and grounds. Historically it has been their agents further down the social scale who have got it in the neck from a vengeful poor, eg the bailiffs, gamekeepers etc. In view of their continuing influence and the important place the architectural expressions of their wealth have in the heritage spectacle, then the purely accidental fires at Uppark House and Windsor Castle provide food for thought. The monumental architecture of the rich and powerful has often been a target of attack. During the Zapatista rebellion in Mexico last year, peasant rebels undertook the demolition of town halls using sledgehammers. As they said: "Our thinking is that we have to build socialism".

These are just preliminary thoughts on the subject of heritage and the possibilities for its subversion. No doubt others can add ideas and observations of their own.

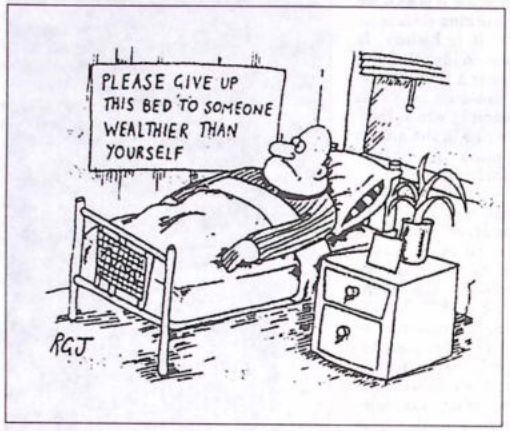
UCH Hospital strike



Occupational Therapy: The incomplete story of the University College Hospital strikes and occupations of 1992/93/94

THIS PAMPHLET was put together by a number of participants in the struggle against closures at the University College hospital in central London.

It consists of an account of the fight against the management and union tactics (and the manipulative antics of the Socialist Workers Party) by the UCH Community Action Committee, plus an analysis of the continuing assault upon the NHS, and by extension upon the entire working class, on the part of the State.

Direct action

From the outset, the Action Committee was organised autonomously of the union involved (UNISON) and encouraged a direct action approach, utilising occupations, demos and strategies to extend the struggle.

This inevitably meant a conflict with the 'official' structures. It also brought them up against that self-proclaimed vanguard of the working class, the SWP, whose hacks, prisoners of their leftist ideology, were committed to keeping the struggle within the confines of trade union practice; not surprising, when these Trots often actually constitute the lower levels of the union apparatus itself!

It is a clearly-written pamphlet which rejects the triumphalism of the SWP and doesn't pretend that the struggle ended in a workers' victory.

It didn't, though not for want of trying. The events around the UCH occupations do, however, supply revolutionaries with valuable experience and lessons to learn from.

Resurgence

We may be looking at a potential resurgence of struggle and resistance in the coming months as workers in the health service reject the Government's pay offer.

If those in struggle can unify and extend themselves, taking on the nature of a counter-offensive against austerity and cut-backs across the board (though not in the boardroom!), then we may yet see a working class victory for a change. We need one!

We strongly recommend that comrades read this pamphlet.

Copies are a mere £1 each, including postage and packaging and are available from: News for Everyone, Box 14, 138 Kingsland High St, London E8 2NS.

NEW PAMPHLET!

London ACF are proud to announce the appearance of a new pamphlet in the Stormy Petrel series: Malatesta's Anarchism and Violence. Complete with a new introduction by an ACF member, this important document in the history of anarchist theory refutes the common misrepresentation of anarchism as mindless destruction while restating the need for revolution to create a free and equal society.

Copies of this pamphlet, and the previous Stormy Petrel, The Friends of Durruti, are available from ACF (London), c/o 84b Whitechapel High St, London E1 at 75p including postage.

The Friends of Durruti were a much misunderstood group who attempted to defend and extend the Spanish Revolution of 1936. Included are an historical introduction from an ACF member and two political statements from the Friends themselves.

EE Cummings

The Enormous Room by EE Cummings. £8.95, Liveright.

Treason

IN 1917 THE AMERICAN writer and poet EE Cummings, whilst serving in France as an ambulance driver, was arrested for treason and imprisoned in an internment camp for three months.

This happened because of his correspondence with the American anarchist Emma Goldman.

He published his account of his experiences five years later in this book.

Warmly human in its appreciation of the prisoners and scathingly contemptuous of the guards, it is a highlight of 20th century literature, suffused with an anarchist spirit. Who can forget Jean Le Negre, the pimp who impersonated an officer, Emile the Bum, the Schoolmaster, Monsieur Auguste, and a host of others like The Bear.

"A big shaggy person... an anarchist, wrote practically all the time...; wrote letters (which he read aloud with evident satisfaction to himself), addressing 'my confreres', stimulating them to even greater efforts, telling them that the time was ripe, that the world consisted of brothers etc... He had, I think, —

Vive La Liberté tattooed in blue and green on his big, hairy chest. A fine bear. A bear whom no twitchings or muzzle nor any starvation nor yet any beating could ever teach to dance...".

Drawings

This new edition has previously-suppressed material and includes the drawings Cummings made in the concentration camp.

WHAT DRIVEL! I refer to your 'Article Writer Replies' to a letter from JW, East Ham in number 38. Some remarks:

1. It seems your nameless writer wishes to confirm the working class in apathy and disillusion by branding all sex workers as 'victims' of society (so (s)he can enlighten us and lead the powerless to a better life, perhaps?). I'm sorry to inform you that many of us work in the sex industry because the pay is better than most of the other jobs we might be forced to do. Credit us at least with the intelligence to be able to choose where, when and how we sell our bodies to capital. Please do not stack your words of empowerment on top of all the shit we already bear. This is a 'real choice', made by real people, every day.

2. Perhaps your dealings with prostitutes have always been to use us as sexual tools; you cannot envisage respect and fair exchange in anything you do.

3. To say that pornography is racist and implies that coloured people are'animalistic' says more, I think, about you than the subject matter.

4. Why do you admit that the distribution of porn has absoloutely no bearing on the incidence of rape — and then insinuate a sentence later that it does!

Middle class femininists tried for twenty years to find a link (and have been — and still are — aided by big business, government and CIA donations and grants). They failed. Miserably. To see this myth repeated in a magazine that agitates for human liberation is appalling.

Since the majority of working class women have left the feminist movement — in digust — to the fate of its would-be middle class leaders, only careerists, college lecturers, the state (and now, it seems, Organise!) still peddle this pseudo-sociological claptrap.

5. It seems your reading has been as limited as your social life as you infer (fifth paragraph) that all pornography is produced by capitalists. I would refer you to Eidos magazine for starters. And this is as good a point as any to ask that, since you provide space and monetary appeals in your magazine to those who would burn and destroy magazines (letter from Bristol Women Against Pornography, same issue), perhaps you will allow me the space to inform your readers of work with the British State wish to ban and burn also: Eidos magazine's editor Brenda Tatelbaum intends to come to Britain to challenge Customs over its arbitarily enforced powers of seizure and would like donations towards the cost of travel and offers of overnight accommodation.

Eidos covers all aspects of sexual liberation in every issue of its (huge) newspaper, as well as one of the best review sections of internationally-produced radical and subversive literature around. I'd suggest the best way to show your support — and see what's going on in the sex industry to mash up capitalism — is to send off $18 for the latest issue, to Eidos, PO Box 96, Boston, MA 02137-0096, USA.

6. I'd also like to ask: do you tend to beat up everyone who disagrees with your moral standards? And suppress all culture that you don't own? And make us all get married way so as to make life worthwhile, secure and free.

CRIME & PUNISHMENT

In capitalist society there are huge differences in wealth and power, so it is very likely that its victims turn to violence and robbery in ways which are similar to the working of capitalism itself. Anarchist communism in contrast is based upon social justice, equality, freedom and the abolition of money. Given these circumstances many of the preconditions which give rise to crime and, consequently, punishment, will disappear. Similarly, the abolition of the concept of victimless crime will remove a whole category of acts from the realm of wider social involvement.

The classical anarchist approach to the problem of anti-social behaviour is to remove them from the community and put them out of harm's way — in other words exile. How feasible this approach would be in the modern world is debatable. Why should one community have to cope with the social rejects of another? On the other hand why should a community have to put up with the anti- social actions of certain individuals? The issue of self-defence arises here, for surely every community has the right and responsibility to protect itself from internal and external threats.

It would be foolish to argue that anarchist communist society would implicitly mean the abolition of anti-social behaviour. Another anarchist approach to punishment is to empower the 'medical model'. In other words, wrongdoers are not bad but maybe mad. A danger with this attitude, despite its well-meaning approach is that different behaviour might be deemed to be unacceptably bad and a suitable case for treatment. In capitalist societies like Britain so-called 'secure' hospitals are no better than prisons. Perhaps they are worse.

There are no simple solutions to the problems posed by serial rapists and killers etc. However, two, hopefully not incompatible principles will apply, namely the justification of individual and communal self-defence and protection on one hand, and the freedom of the individual on the other. A caring approach, applied in a humanitarian and non-harmful way must in the end be the basis of an anarchist communist alternative to punishment.

and do it only in the missionary position? Maybe you should rename yourselves Red Action and go out and relive your days of schoolyard bullying — you are, after all doing the state's dirty work.

Yours in disgust
DL, London.

Organise! Oh dear, oh dear. It's sad to see that irrational insult hurling isn't restricted to the knee-jerk anti-porn tendency. Firstly, the pages of Organise! regularly carry articles meant to open up debate, rather than simply reflect ACF policy. The articles on pornography and the sex industry in number 37 were the opinion of the individual author as was the reply to JW in Organise! 38.

For the record, the bottom line for the ACF is total opposition to all forms of state censorship. We have no desire to give the state any more power than it presently enjoys and experience shows that the first victims of censorship are invariably those 'on the margins' or who represent a threat to 'conventional' morality. Therefore people like Eidos get hit rather than Paul Raymond, for example.

Over and above our opposition to state censorship the ACF does not take a position (missionary or otherwise) on the question of pornography. Needless to say we support sexworkers' self-organisation just as we support the self-organisation of all workers.

Sexworkers are engaged in alienated labour as much as any other group of workers working for wages/salary/money and the 'choice' to be exploited slaving in a sweatshop, slaving in an air-conditioned office or slaving in a strip-joint is a 'choice' imposed by capital, ie no real choice at all.

Your suggestion that a 'fair exchange' can exist (point two) is, we think, a dangerous illusion.

Rather than a 'fair day's work for a fair day's pay', surely we need to fight for the abolition of the entire market/wages/exchange system. That, however, implies a communist perspective, something which many involved in the porn debate, being essentially liberals, aren't likely to defend.

Scapegoats

Following on from the acquittal of cops for the death of Joy Gardner, came the news that they would not face disciplinary charges from their superiors.

Surprise! surprise! (Remember how the judge at the trial told the jury not to concern themselves about race or politics?) Yet another insult to black people in this country, to be followed by many more. The questioning of the commitment of Test cricketers Devon Malcolm and Philip DeFreitas. The allegation by Police Commissioner Condon that 80% of muggings were committed by young black men, for which no evidence was offered.

Condon is attempting to please the racists in the Metropolitan Police Force who were affrighted that any of their officers could even be brought to trial for tying up a black woman and wrapping tape around her face while she suffocated.

Pattern

On a larger scale, this is just part of a pattern where those at the lowest levels of society are scapegoated for all the wrongs of this society. The crisis brings out all the evils of racism and nationalism.

In France and Italy, the threat of Islam is summoned up to justify crack-downs and raids and to strengthen the ramparts of Fortress Europe. The old cry of 'Women back to the home!' is raised and single mothers are targetted as scapegoats. Another easy target 'Dole and social security scroungers' is taken out of mothballs.

Against this we continue to argue for the unity of all the working class against these attacks.

Obituary

We note the death of George Seldes, American radical journalist at the age of 104.

Born in 1890 in an anarchist colony set up by his father in New Jersey, Seldes got a job as a journalist. One of his first jobs was to report on the rape of a saleswoman by the son of a department store owner. The story was never used, and the space was used to sell the store more ads under the threat of blackmail.

Recalling this 80 years later, Seldes' voice still shook with anger. Working in Italy, he was able to gather enough material on Mussolini to write a hard-hitting biography Sawdust Caesar.

Returning from Spain after the Civil War, he was so disgusted by the American establishment press that he decided to set up his own newsletter In Fact. The paper published a suppressed study in 1939 on tobacco: 'Tobacco Smoking and Longevity', and Seldes often crossed swords with the tobacco industry, as well as taking on the American Legion's strike-breaking activities and Lindbergh's fascist sympathies. The paper was witch-hunted out of existence in 1950. Seldes is the father of independent radical journalism in America. He will also be remembered for reminiscences in the film 'Reds'.

Cold, cold heart

CEDRIC BROWN, chief executive of British Gas, is paid an enormous salary. Recently, salivating over quarterly profits of £605 million, he said: "Hopefully, we'll soon be getting some nice cold winters. That's what we'd like."

For him, cold winters mean huge profits for him and his top staff and the shareholders — as well as 8% VAT for the Treasury. For the old and the poor, cold winters mean rising bills they cannot afford. It means more deaths from hypothermia, in a country which has the highest death rate from this cause already. It sums up what this sick society is all about — the callous greed of the boss class.

Crime and punishment

THE DESIRE FOR punishment — the inflicting of pain on perceived wrong doers — has a long and inglorious history. Religions which are the hand-maidens of authoritarian rule are full of accounts of the most horrendous punishments dished out by God and his followers. An eternity of hellfire awaits even minor offenders against God's (and by extension rulers') order. It is an essential fact of punishment that it is imposed by people in power upon those who are relatively powerless — parents and teachers against children and the State against its citizens. It is equally true that punishment is ineffective in achieving its aims.

Anarchist communists have serious and fundamental objections to the idea of punishment on a number of grounds — moral, ideological and practical. Kropotkin, for example in his pamphlet Prisons and their Moral Influence on Prisoners demolishes all of the arguments used by the State to defend human incarceration. In what seems remarkably up to date arguments, he writes in 1877 that "Once a man (sic) has been in prison, he will return. It is inevitable, and statistics prove it. The annual reports of the administration of criminal justice in France show that one-half of all those who yearly get into the police courts for minor offences received their education in prisons... As for central prisons, more than one-third of the prisoners released from the supposedly correctional institutions are reimprisoned in the course of twelve months after their liberation" (from Kropotkin's Revolutionary Pamphlets, Dover Books.

"Anything I say will be taken down and used in evidence against you..."

Pathological

The picture in Britain today is hardly different, indicating a pathological lack of imagination on the part of the State. In Britain around one person in a thousand is currently in prison — and crime is said to be continually on the rise! So much for their effectiveness in combatting crime.

There are a number of arguments which are used to support the idea of punishment. These include the idea that a given action deserves a certain reward or punishment. So, good children deserve rewards and naughty children deserve to receive a punishment. This may seem fine in principle, the problem arises in allocating a just and deserved punishment. What punishment is deserved for armed robbery for example, a slap on the wrist, community service, or execution? The punishment meted out in practice will vary according to the prejudices, values and attitudes and irritation of the judge in a given case. But the fact remains that whatever the punishment, it involves the imposition of suffering on the individual by the State on, usually, the lower orders. Since most laws are designed to protect private property and social inequality in defence of the rich, it is not suprising that most punishments are inflicted on the lower orders who do not share in the pickings.

Another standard argument for punishment is that it deters people from carrying out criminal and anti-social acts (again defined in terms which support the status-quo). The problem with this approach is that it does not work. As Kropotkin pointed out earlier in this article, prisons are full of persistent offenders who have frequently been punished. In the 17th Century in England, prisoners were executed in public for stealing silk handkerchiefs. Whilst the crowd was totally enthralled at the hanging, thieves would mingle and steal silk handkerchiefs! So much for the ultimate deterrent. People, quite simply, will only commit crimes (generally) if they are pretty sure they will not get caught and punished.

Primitive

Many people have a primitive basic need to extract revenge for a wrong committed against them. Blood feuds between families are examples of this approach, where one wrongdoing has to be matched by another from generation to generation, to the absurd point that the original cause has been forgotten about. However, as a rational response to wrong-doing, vengeance which is motivated strongly by irrational feelings, must rate as an inappropriate response.

A further approach includes the idea that wrongdoers should be helped or reformed, though there will always be an element of pain involved in the punishment. Unfortunately, the State has no real interest in exploring the social causes of crime, or for that matter questioning the nature of the problem. For every John McVicar or Jimmy Boyle 'rehabilitated', there are hundreds of thousands who have not. Punishment exists to keep the lid on social unrest but patently fails to do so.

So what is an anarchist communist view on punishment? Well, firstly it should be realised that all of the usual justifications and methods of punishment are rejected, especially in relation to anarchist communist society. The need to hurt people in the name of the State will disappear. Capitalism, in countless ways does psychological damage to people, so it is not surprising that this often finds expression in anti-social acts. Capitalist society divides, humiliates, and deprives millions of people. Anarchist communist society in contrast involves people in the

Aims and Principles

1. The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2. Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.
Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as political level.

3. We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4. We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class. The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5. As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6. It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7. Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trade unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc.). Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation for the workforce. The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow. Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8. Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9. As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation.
We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method.
We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise of a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

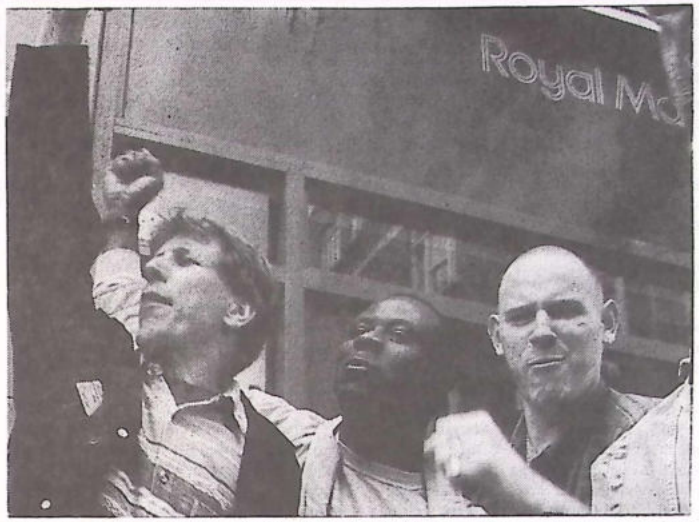
Industrial Notes

Postal strike



AFTER MORE THAN 2 years of wildcat strikes throughout the postal service in Britain, the postal workers union, the CWU, was forced to call a ballot for strike action. In 1993 there were 32 major work stoppages- this does not include the many actions that lasted less than a day- and in 1994 there were 65. This number increased in 1995 to 88. Through this guerrilla war, and certainly not due to the resistance of the CWU, Royal Mail's attempts to increase exploitation through extra workloads, speedups and job cuts have been seriously checked.

The CWU has consistently denounced the unofficial actions. Now it needs to call a series of strikes under the control of the union in order to "let off steam". In the second place it wants to use the strike to show the bosses that it is needed to police the postal workers. At the CWU National Conference in early June union leaders and many delegates spoke repeatedly about voting in a Labour government. The joint general secretary Tony Young emphasised that the CWU must keep in line with Labour and that some of the laws passed by the Tories against workplace militancy must be retained under a Labour government. He was echoed by his partner as general secretary, Alan Johnson. A motion to commit the union to backing Labour's plan for a commission with the bosses to decide a minimum wage was carried. The Labour shadow foreign secretary Robin Cook made an appearance at conference, as did fellow shadow cabinet member Margaret Beckett. Both Beckett and Cook are the soft cops of New Labour. They aim to portray themselves as the real heart of Labour. Cook is beginning to specialise in these appearances. At the Scottish TUC conference in April he reaffirmed that Labour's links with the unions were unbreakable. Despite what the national newspapers say, Cook is not a leader of the Left (as the Daily Mail described him) but works in tandem with Blair. Whilst Blair is off pleasing the CBI and newspaper tycoons, Cook's job is to keep the unions sweet and make sure that Labour retain the union vote and union support.

Johnson and Young are important allies of Blair. They will attempt to defuse the struggle and call off any action carried out by postal workers. The Labour leadership is putting massive pressure on the CWU executive to sabotage the strike action. At the CWU conference Johnson made reference on a number of occasions to the "British public" and "public opinion". He is seriously worried by the mood of militancy among postal workers. Already an unofficial conference of 150 activists in March in London has met with condemnation by the CWU. In a continuation of the wildcats, 60 workers at Gateshead Team Valley sorting office walked out after management refused to stick by an agreement on overtime and using temporary workers a week before the first official strike. They did this without a ballot and were soon joined by another 500 workers. The bosses went to the courts to declare the strike illegal and the CWU denounced the strike. 50 workers at Willesden walked out briefly on June 20 over the same issues. At the beginning of June, posties officially struck in Wakefield and Harrogate over the victimisation of a worker who had refused to carry out bosses' instructions.

Over the last 10 years the CWU has directly collaborated with Royal Mail bosses by agreeing to Sunday working and a continuing erosion of work conditions for postal workers. Indeed thanks to the CWU productivity -read more efficient exploitation of the workforce- has increased by more than 60%. During the strikes, continuing CWU sabotage continued when it issued a circular telling postal workers not involved in the strike ballot to cross picket lines. This involved mainly part-time casuals, although some full-time workers scabbed as well. The CWU told those posties who had begun their shifts before the start of the strike at midnight to continue working to the end of their shift. The official union strike leaflet handed out said that the postal workers "didn't want to be out on strike"!

What is directly at stake is the rejection of the Employee Agenda proposed by the Royal Mail bosses. This proposes the introduction of Team Quality Management which would introduce 'team working' through 'team talks, action plans and personal development modules'. Teams would have to agree to improve efficiency and performance and cover for other workers off sick or on holiday. Local and national agreements would be scrapped so that workers would get a cut in pay! This despite profits this year for Royal Mail of £500m and the productivity increases already mentioned. But now the Royal Mail has to compete with national and international rivals, who already have these methods of working.

Behind all of this is the Conservative Government which is talking about suspending the Royal Mail's monopoly of mail delivery so that the private outfits can strike-break. The Government also wants to hand the delivery of junk mail over to private companies or separate it off into a Public Limited Company within the Royal Mail. This is in line with the European Union plan for privatisation of all direct mail throughout the EU. This would mean the end of national first and second class stamps, with zone charges so that it would cost more to deliver from London to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland and between the regions of England.

Postal workers will not only have to fight the Royal Mail bosses, they will have to fight the Government and all of its forces, as well as the schemes of the EU. They will have to start increasing contacts and creating coordinations between postal workers on an Europe-wide scale. They will have to combat the private companies. Labour has condemned any actions and through its allies in the CWU will do its utmost to destroy postal workers militant action and organisation. The struggle that the postal workers are facing is one that must go against the union and the State. They deserve total support from throughout the working class.

Tube Workers

A number of one-day strikes has taken place over this summer on the London Underground starting out with train drivers who are members of the rail union ASLEF. There is simmering discontent among Tube workers and the union has attempted to head off strike action by calling a number of ballots over the last few years, which were then cancelled. Last year a massive strike vote was ignored and a dirty deal stitched up between ASLEF and the bosses. This ploy has exasperated Tube workers. For the same reasons as the CWU, to head off pressure from workers and to show that ASLEF has some clout and is worth the employers' while negotiating with, ASLEF has now called a number of actions for a reduction in the working week. The Tube bosses are attempting to renege on a one hour reduction agreed last year. Meanwhile the other rail union on the tube, the RMT, has-surprise, surprise! failed to call out train driver members at the same time as the ASLEF actions. Under pressure from workers, a combined strike has taken place as we go to press. The RMT has been equivocal to say the least in whether it will instruct its members to cross ASLEF picket lines. The message given by assistant general secretary Bob Crow and executive council member Pat Sikorski (Both members of Scargill's Socialist Labour Party, and the latter a closet Trot, member of the Fourth International Supporters Caucus, operating inside the SLP as Scargill's heavies) was ambivalent on this question when they addressed RMT members in the first week of June. Both RMT and ASLEF have continually sabotaged strike ballots, and collaborated in introducing the bosses plans for getting the tube ready for privatisation which they began introducing in 1991. Both Crow and Sikorski have acted as saboteurs of militant action in the past. In the late 80s they were active on the Shepherd Pie rank and file committee which attempted to force unofficial actions into a trade union straitjacket. They then became important RMT officials, and as such helped in the sabotage of the 1992 strike (It's no surprise that they are part of the leadership of the SLP-this party represents the interests of the "left" union bureaucrats). Tube workers have to ignore all union affiliations, and come together in coordinations, going out to make contact and get support and solidarity action from other workers, in particular other London transport workers like the bus workers and BR workers, who are as much under attack as they are. Bus drivers throughout London have been involved in strike actions over the last year, the most recent being 3 days of strikes in South East London, in the Plumstead, Catford and Bromley garages bossed by Selkent. The third strike was bolstered by 60 maintenance and cleaning staff starting a work to rule. However, the union the TGWU, quickly moved to defuse the action through a ballot. The strikes were against conditions and pay for new starters with 48 hours a week behind the wheel, no sick pay, £% an hour, 13 hour spreadovers, and no bonuses like spreadover payments. The union officials said that new starters were no concern of the workers and they should only think about their own pay packet. New drivers knew what they were accepting! So no the TGWU has sabotaged the actions and given a thumbs-up to a two-tier system, which will pit worker against worker. The Union divides us workers! We must organise outside and against it!

Firefighters

Like the post and the tube and buses, the fire brigades have had a history of militant action over the last 2 years. On Merseyside, firefighters threatened to strike in early June when a worker was threatened with the sack for refusing to attend a course, which was used as a pretext to change shifts by the fire bosses at Croxteth. The bosses were forced to back down

In Derbyshire 800 firefighters struck twice for 9 hours against cuts planned by the Labour council. The Council responded by trying to get an injunction out under the anti-union laws brought in by the Conservatives. This failed, and the Council ended up with a bill for £40,000 costs paid out of council tax! Now the Council is using Army Green Goddesses and RAF rescue vehicles as we go to press. Tony Benn, so called Left Labour MP for the area, has argued against the strike action, which he said would damage workers and the Council. The Council hopes that firefighters from neighbouring regions will scab. Manchester and Nottinghamshire firefighters made it clear that they would refuse to do this.

In Essex the firefighters union the FBU sabotaged strike action after a massive vote in favour against cuts imposed by the council. The FBU accepted cuts of £700,000 after the Council revised its original cuts package of £1.3 million. The strikes were to coincide with the June 10 actions of the Derbyshire workers. Again the FBU has okayed wage cuts, station closures, speed-ups, part-time working replacing full-time working. Again the message is clear-firefighters must organise outside and against the unions, against the Armed forces strike breakers and the Tory and Labour central and local authorities.

Labour breaks out the riot gear!

AS THE POLITICAL parties gear up for an impending election, Labour is energetically seeking to mark itself out as the party that speaks for the "Nation". To do this, it needs to show that it is the defender of so-called 'social unity, that it is the inheritor of the social consensus constructed by both the Conservatives and Labour in the immediate post-war years. It has to underline national unity, it has to speak as the voice of reason. It has to show it enthusiastically supports the values of what is portrayed as a Golden Age of Britain before the last 15 years of ruling class attack under the Thatcher and Major regimes. This means it has to show it is able to govern well. It has to impress sections of the boss class, who are showing themselves more open to backing Labour, both verbally, financially and through the ballot box. It seeks to get the support of some of the press barons, whose support at election time would be valuable. It looks towards the vote of sections of the population that have traditionally voted Conservative or Liberal. This means that it has to present itself as a staunch advocate of law and order, and of traditional values.

Straw Dog

This is why Jack Straw has stated that when Labour are in office they will adopt "zero tolerance" towards "anti-social behaviour". Part of this get-tough policy will apparently include a curfew on under 10 year olds after 9pm. This will not be carried out by the State. Straw would offload the burden of this extra policing onto local councils. At one fell swoop he can demonise children and prepare the way for methods of the Strong State. Not surprisingly, seeing as how New Labour look towards the US Democratic Party as a model, Straw has taken a leaf out of Clinton's book. The US President gave his backing to a 8pm curfew imposed on under-17s in New Orleans. Straw also proposed a single final warning for young offenders to replace the present system of a series of cautions.

Wet Blunkett

David Blunkett, Labour's spokesman on education, has demanded a return to traditional teaching methods. What this means is not smaller classes and good facilities, as well as well qualified teachers, but larger classes and lessons by rote. Labour will make no effort to put any more money into schools, but instead seeks to steal one of the Conservatives' traditional slogans. Earlier he had stated that student grants would be abolished under Labour, with a saving of £1 billion. He proposed a system of extended loans. This would aggravate the situation for any working class student, already suffering hardship. But as Blunkett himself said:" The great advantage of this scheme is that it helps substantially the middle and lower-middle income parents". Tough if you're working class.

Cuts and gagging

For his part, Gordon Brown, Labour's Shadow Chancellor, made clear that the squeeze on public spending, initiated by the Callaghan-led Labour government and then perpetuated by the Conservatives, would continue under his rule. He talked about "making Britain great again", about partnership with the private sector, about cutting out waste. Translated into plain English, this means that the rundown of the public sector will continue, as will the creeping privatisation, as well as continuing sackings and virtual wage freezes for public sector workers. Brown is ending out signals to the boss class that things will be the same in Labour hands, in fact this way of carrying on will be applied more efficiently!

Chris Smith, speaking on Labour's plans for welfare, stressed the increasing role of private insurance. He also called for a redefinition of poverty, copying Conservatives' oft-expressed views. This means that millions can be taken off welfare benefits by saying that they're not poor in the first place! Coupled with proposals to cut child benefit and the projected "work for benefit" schemes Labour shows that it is as fully committed to the dismantling of welfarism as the Conservatives.

Any signs of dissent, indeed any indications that Labour will adopt even 'liberal' measures are quickly stamped on by the Labour leadership. When Clare Short, Labour's Shadow Transport Secretary, echoed what several chief constables had already said about the legalisation of cannabis, she was promptly reprimanded. Her later pronouncements on taxing the rich were also slapped down. Mark Fisher, the Shadow Arts spokesperson, was similarly reprimanded after he announced that the Elgin Marbles might be returned to Greece. Ron Davies, Shadow Welsh Secretary, was mugged by the Labour leadership after his mild criticisms of the monarchy. In the aftermath Tony Blair fell over himself in showing how much he adored the Royals.

Firm and Unfair

Every indication is that if Labour come to power either later in the year or next year, they will continue to supervise the boss class's attacks on the mass of the population. Further, that they will be prepared to use very strong measures to carry their policies out, increasing police powers and deploying the Armed Forces if necessary, to counter any strike action. There should be no complacency that things will be better, if only slightly, under Labour. We must be ready for attacks on our class from Labour, ready with the arguments against Labourism and ready with plans to organise the resistance.

Since the above was written, the new stance of Labour was firmed up in late June. In preparation for The Road to The Manifesto, a policy prospectus put out by the leadership, Blair made it clear that the national executive will draw up a list of approved parliamentary candidates after the next election from which local parties should choose, in order to weed out any dissidents. Trade spokesman Kim Howells stated that Labour was pro-competition-he was speaking the truth!- and his counterpart for Home Affairs George Howarth said that he would be tougher on drugs than the Conservatives.

The Road to the Manifesto itself gave full form to the Labour Party's policies. It emphasised its toughness on crime with fast-track sentencing of "persistent young offenders", and swift reduction in unemployment which can easily be translated into forcing people off the dole into low-paid jobs, it stated that it would do little to reverse anti-strike laws, it encouraged private pensions, it condoned privatisation in the health service, it pledged to keep on with building Trident nuclear submarines, it emphasised it was for one nation and for a stake-holder economy. There can be no excuse at all for anyone calling themselves a socialist to remain within the Labour Party. The Labour Party is a capitalist party, it always has been. The fact that developments in capitalism have forced it to drop any "socialist rhetoric" should not blind us to this fact. Any vote for Labour, with or "without illusions" is a vote for the continuing of Business As Usual.

Poverty Related Pay

OPPOSITION TO THE Job Seekers Allowance (JSA) from inside the dole office is hampered by the idea that implementing the JSA is in the 'interest' of the workforce. This so called 'interest' is commonly known as Performance Related Pay (PRP). So how does PRP work? Firstly, objectives are set for the dole office on a national level, these objectives are then broken down into regional objectives, further divided into districts and divided again into office objectives, where finally the manager breaks the objectives down for individual workers.

Objectives Equal More Money

So how are those objectives used to improve pay? Each individual worker is set objectives, agreed with their line manager and in turn with their office manager. Each worker is monitored throughout the year by their managers (by themselves and other workers for that matter). Once a year how well each worker has 'performed' is assessed, whether they have met their objectives, failed to meet them or, as in the case of the over enthusiastic worker, superseded them. Then a 'box marking' is attributed to each worker. The 'box marking' is just like being graded at school; Box 1/A (A is for ACE), Box 2/B (B is for BRILL) and Box 3/C (C is for CRAP). Once each worker has been graded their cut of the wage rise for that year has been decided.

Objectives Equal Hassle

So what are these objectives which are in the 'interests' of the workers to achieve? The typical list of objectives will require each worker to;

1. get a varying number of claimants benefit cut or stopped on the grounds that they are A. Not available for employment B. Not actively seeking employment C: Placing restrictions upon themselves D. Refusing employment.

2. Place a varying number of claimants into employment via the job centre.

3. Place a varying number of claimants onto specific government courses .

Getting claimants to sign off, usually using tactics not dissimilar from those used by the police, is one of the fraud officers PRP objectives and is not as yet a written objective for the ordinary dole office worker.

The Unions

The dole office workers Civil and Public Services Association (CPSA) may claim to be opposed to PRP on the grounds that it is "divisive", but in reality it fails to have had any effect on this pay scheme. Whilst the CPSA accurately point out that workers are divided by PRP, and encouraged to be interested only in themselves developing contempt for one another, CPSA fails to recognise the consequences of PRP on the claimants and how it divides the workers and claimants further. Consequently the CPSA's opposition to the JSA is failing to reach dole office workers, as is its argument that PRP is not in their 'interest'.

PRP Equal Hassle

PRP is allowing dole officers to treat claimants like shit, creating the idea that 'they're only doing their job', and at the same time acting out of 'self-interest' improving their chances of getting a bigger cut of the wage rise. PRP is a god send to those over enthusiastic individuals who take great pleasure from treating claimants like shit. So next time a claimant is hassled its not a simple case of faceless bureaucracy treating people as no more that numbers, but that claimant may well be on the way to being a statistic achieved and marked against a list of objectives.

Effective Organising

A hassle free signing on is largely reliant upon the worker who hasn't bought the idea that PRP is in their 'interest' and doesn't care if they meet their objectives or not. However opposition to the JSA from the inside needs more than that if it is to work. Effective opposition to PRP coupled with a sense of unity with claimants, as opposed to contempt for them, would be welcome. But in the meantime Groundswell and unemployed activists aren't sitting on their backsides waiting for the pig to learn to fly. We are getting active, and organising from the 'outside'.

GET ACTIVE

GROUNDSWELL IS A loose network of autonomous groups and individuals united against the JSA concentrating upon gathering information about the JSA, distributing and co-ordinating that information, and offering practical advice and support against the JSA. Groundswell is organised around the idea of 'no wage slavery, no dole slavery', offering a critique of the work ethic so beloved of the left.

The next Groundswell is being held in Nottingham 10th August. Information about this meeting and local and national campaigning can be obtained by writing to;

RETURN OF THE DIGGERS

ON SUNDAY 5th May, 1996 a campaign calling itself The Land Is Ours organised a land occupation on thirteen acres of derelict land. Around 300 people arrived in two coaches. The land is situated on York Road in Wandsworth, South London and is owned by Guinness.

When the people reached the site they began to transform it into a 'sustainable eco-village'. The name Pure Genius was decided on (it was previously called Gargoyle Wharf). They started off with building Octavia's Love Nest, a large wooden octagonal building in which to have meetings, workshops, entertainment, temporary sleeping, etc. People constructed their own temporary homes in the forms of tepees, tents, and benders.

For the first week there were over 100 people permanently on site with a few thousand people visiting and participating during the week. Now roughly seventy people live on the site on a permanent basis and help to build more permanent, 'low-impact' housing both individually and collectively.

On Wednesday 8th, Colin Ward came to the site and gave a talk in Octavia's Love Nest about the British squatters movement in the mid-40's. The talk was attended by most people on site and seemed to be accepted very well.

As well as construction of the buildings, there was the task of making the flower and vegetable gardens, using an agricultural technique called "permaculture"; making the land (which was previously a brewery site and before that an oil refinery!) useable despite the poor soil quality and polluted land. People also made a pond, rock gardens, walkways lined with painted stones, wire sculptures, banners and beautiful murals around the front entrance and also inside of the site.

Meal times are usually communal, with most people gathering around the main camp fire. Food supplies come from people donating and also cheap or free food 'tatted' at the end of the market day. Toilet facilities include two compost toilets and a shallow trench.

Entertainment at Pure Genius has included acoustic music (with much singing of The Diggers' Song), circus stunts, story-telling and an excellent performance of the anti-capitalist environmental play Dinosaurs and all that Rubbish.

On the site are all sorts of people. There are many people from abroad: on the erection of a pyramidal sleeping structure, in which five people participated, one person was English, two American, one a New Zealander and the other a Canadian. There were also people present from the Green Party, Freedom (John Rety and Colin Ward), and many people from Newbury and other road protests. One ACF member stayed on site for all of the first week and on the evening of Saturday 11th, five other ACF members turned up, had a look around the site, visited someone in their tepee and left for the pub with two Class War members who happened to be visiting at the same time.

Anarchy in Action?

John Rety claimed that this is "anarchy in action" and that he has "now seen anarchy in practice and, so far, it works." (Freedom, 18th May) This is not anarchy. Anarchy means "freedom and justice for all". There are about seventy people living on Pure Genius and there are almost six billion people in the world. As long as most of the world lives in slavery, poverty and brutality, we will not see anarchy. If anarchy does not mean freedom and justice for all then we could say that a woman living isolated on an island is, of and by herself, Anarchy. (Not to mention that she would be a slave to her work, and that, as an individual, her potential could only be realised by its gratification in human society!) Also there is the fact that the people participating in the land occupation live neither under freedom nor justice. As long as the government has its army of policemen and soldiers no one will really be free, and the small amount of freedom they allow is transitory and only guaranteed to the extent that the people can fight for it. As long as hunger and want are found among millions of the working people and the few have all the good things of life, there is not justice.

Property is Theft!

This land occupation was undoubtedly propaganda by the deed (as opposed to propaganda of the deed). The question is, what was the message of this propaganda? Anarchists would, of course, have liked it to be a message of "Property is theft" (as the proto-anarchist Proudhon said). It seems however that the main messages are things like "sensible land use" and The Land Is Ours (who can't seem to stress enough that they are "a campaign, not an organisation") also say that they "want to highlight urban dereliction". Their participation in the legal process and their negotiations with Guinness are not anarchistic and it is silly to be saying "The land is ours!" while at the same time saying "Please, can't we just use a little bit of the land which your not using right now?" Indeed, The Land Is Ours have said that they want to "make good use of derelict sites", but what about the good property, with housing and infrastructure already there?

They claim it is not an 'ideological squat' but they obviously do have an ideology, it is just one which is un-ambitious and reformist. The people 'behind' the 'campaign' have expressed that many of them are for common ownership of all social property etc. and so have most of the people involved. But none of this made it into the media and they have admitted that they are deliberately trying to tone the politics down for the sake of the media. The media coverage was very positive, but at what expense? They have either tried to portray it as a bunch of hippies doing earth dances or as some sort of experiment led by a few Oxford intellectuals (which it may well be).

There were three main positive aspects of the campaign.

1. The anarchistic organisation and structure of it. People live communally, eat communally and work collectively. No-one is 'in charge' and people organise their projects autonomously.

2. The Ideological and historical background for their actions is decidedly anarchist. On the whole they seem to have an affinity with the Diggers' anarchist communist ethic. They are unquestionably anti-capitalist and anti-government and pro-self-organisation and autonomy. The presence of Anarchists on site, including John Rety, ACF and Colin Ward, and their participation in the decision making and work on the site definitely helped to strengthen the libertarian content of the campaign.

3. Involvement with local people. Leaflets were handed out to passers-by and all the local residences were leafleted telling them what's going on and asking that they get involved. Several locals were highly involved in the decision making process, in leaflet production and distribution and work etc. All the local people who visited the site were positive and said that they supported what was being done. This helped to strengthen links between ordinary working class people and political activists and to expose them to ideas and attitudes which they otherwise might not have heard.

Is it all Worthwhile?

Maybe projects like these are a waste of time and end up being elitist and only benefiting a few people while not causing any real social change. Obviously we shouldn't expect that these things, by themselves, are going to radically alter the world ("Whatever you do will be insignificant, but it is very important that you do it." - Mahatma Gandhi), but things like this could be worthwhile in addition to other struggles.

If we think that projects like this may be worthwhile, then we should ask ourselves whether we should get more involved in future projects and try to counter those who try to make it 'media friendly'.

You poor take courage,

You rich take care,

This Earth was made a Common Treasury

For everyone to share,

All things in common, all people one.

PEACE PROCESS IN PIECES

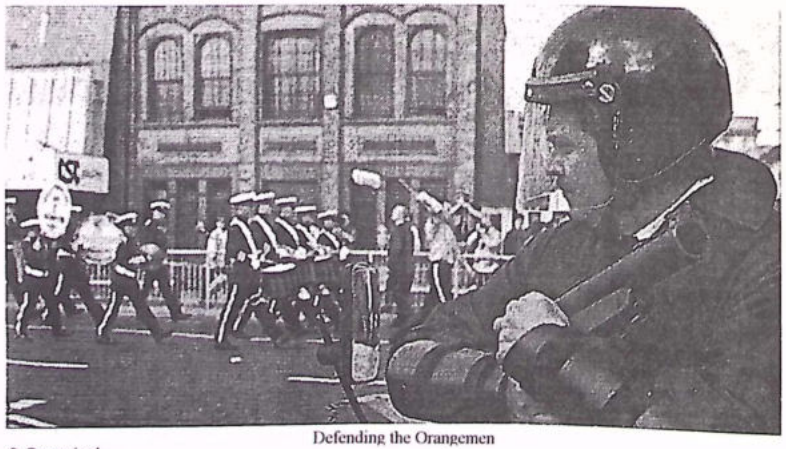
THE RECENT ELECTIONS in Northern Ireland on May 30 showed the rifts and stresses that are growing within both Unionism and Republicanism.

The Unionists had insisted on these elections, and the Major administration, who depend on their support for keeping in power, readily agreed. The results showed that support for the Ulster Unionist Party, led by David Trimble, has fallen in practically every area. The combined Unionist vote, was now split between 11 different parties. This reflects the fragmenting unity among Protestants, where class interests are beginning to re-emerge. The Protestant working class, was relatively cushioned economically, in comparison to Catholic workers, in terms of jobs and standards of living. But increasing levels of unemployment, attacks on welfare benefits and rising poverty have made many worry about the future. They begin to question whether the Northern Ireland State can guarantee the living standards to which they were accustomed. This explains the vote for the Progressive Unionist Party and the Ulster Democratic Party, both of which use working class rhetoric. Both of these parties are the political wings of Loyalist paramilitaries, have the shadowy presence of British intelligence hovering behind them. Their bogus talk of class conflict is designed to ensure that the Protestant working class stays within the limits of Loyalist sectarianism (See the article in Organise!38 on these parties). Nevertheless, a certain disenchantment and disorientation seems apparent in the lower than average turnout, where the vote is traditionally higher than in Britain.

For its part Sinn Fein did nothing to win over Protestant workers. In the past it has come out with the rhetoric of saying that it fights for all the people-notice the word people and not working class but its practice during the election revealed that this was Nationalist cant and it concentrated on trying to prove how it represented and defended the Catholic minority .It got its highest vote ever in the elections - over 15 per cent, in some Catholic strongholds polling as much as 50 per cent.

In some ways, this vote for Sinn Fein vindicates Gerry Adams' position. One of several reasons that Sinn Fein abandoned its old policies was because electoral support was diminishing. Adams can justify his stance by pointing to this increased vote. Sinn Fein had decided that joint work with the Dublin government, the Social Democratic and Labour Party(SDLP)in the North and the Irish American lobby would "advance the struggle", leading on to the TUAS - totally unarmed strategy.

This culminated in to Adams' meeting with President Clinton at the White House. This collaboration with Sinn Fein is important to Clinton for a number of reasons. He hopes to retain and indeed increase the Irish-American electoral support for the Democrats. He hopes to boost his image as world peace maker, also very helpful at the polls. In line with US interests, a world wide "American peace" is required to boost America's position as world policeman. US economic interests would prefer "peace"(absence of armed conflict and civil strife) so that they can better exploit the working class in Northern Ireland, and indeed throughout Ireland.



Defending the Orangemen

Sinn Fein and the IRA could be used as a pawn in the USA's game in Ireland, with its increasing economic and political influence in the South.

Collapse

Things have moved on from this scenario. A few weeks after the ceasefire, the Reynolds government in the South collapsed following a child abuse scandal in which Catholic priests were involved. The Major administration, under pressure from the Unionists, rejected the findings of the Mitchell commission on decommissioning and announced that elections would take place in the North. Labour failed to oppose this move, and abjectly followed every precondition for talks laid down by the Tories. This means a big reverse for the TUAS tactic. The leadership of Sinn Fein, in order to further its change in tactics, has made it clear, both to Republicans in general, and to the rest of the world, that its previous tactic of bullet and ballot box was a failure, and a United Ireland was not achievable using these methods. Indeed, the leadership dropped any talk of a United Socialist Ireland, in line with this, and in order to placate its allies in the new partnership.

These allies, including the SDLP, certainly do not want any sort of United Ireland. They want political and economic stability. This leads on to Nationalists and Unionists running their own areas, with the British, Irish and American administrations acting to police this. This would lead, not to a ending of the sectarian divide, but to its institutionalisation, and the possible development of specific 'enclaves'. Remind you of somewhere else?

Adams has publicly announced that Sinn Fein would drop the United Ireland demand. He admitted as much in a Financial Times interview. Sinn Fein has agreed to practically everything put forward by the Mitchell commission. The continued use of armed struggle by the IRA is either a bargaining counter used by the Republican leadership to squeeze more concessions out of the British government or a sign of dissent within Republican ranks, or a combination of both. Opposition to the leadership's manoeuvres does exist , both in the north and the south. For example Cork Sinn Fein sent out an open letter to all Sinn Fein branches calling for opposition to the leadership's concessions to Mitchell.

What is apparent in all of this is the increased failure of Republicanism to offer any solutions to the social and economic problems that plague Irish working people. This, and the divisions that are beginning to emerge within Loyalist ranks, point to the possibility of new spaces opening up for revolutionary libertarian politics. The small numbers of Irish revolutionary Anarchists must do their utmost to build a libertarian alternative, and revolutionaries in Britain must express their support and solidarity.

One interesting result of the dead-end in the peace-talks is the enhanced position of Labour in the eyes of sections of the British ruling class and State. A desire for "stability" to pursue economic interests in Ireland is hindered by the Conservative administration's blocking of the "peace process", hostages to the Unionists as they are. A Labour government would be unlikely to be in this position. This is one of many reasons why Blair and Co. are being feted in the media.

Update

All of the above has been highlighted by the events of the "marching season" when the RUC, with the approval of the British government, allowed the Orangemen to march through a Nationalist area after 5 days of stand-off. This shows how deeply the Conservative government is in hock to the Loyalists; it also shows the stresses among the movers in the peace talks, with polarisation between the British government and the Irish government/SDLP. The TUAS policy of the Sinn Fein leadership is in shreds and there is clamour among the Catholic population of the North for a return to armed action to defend their areas against Loyalist aggression. The Enniskillen bombing is a strong indicator of this. There is a distinct possibility that now there will be a rift between those who want to continue with the policies of the leadership and those who wish to return to armed action, coupled with a call for a United Ireland-socialist or otherwise. This scenario is borne out by history, with a series of splits in Republican ranks between those who wanted to do a deal with the British State and those who took a more intransigent position. But the intransigent position is not an option for Anarchist Communists. It is based on elitist armed action, and no attempt at united class action. The way capitalism has evolved, with production spread all over the world, makes the Nation State less and less important for the needs of ruling class economics. Separate national economies are more and more impossible, and this in its turn has rendered any national liberation movements mute in opposition to imperialism. They now hustle to be first in line in offering sources of cheap labour and raw materials to the multinational and transnational corporations.

For their part the mainstream Loyalist politicians like Trimble and co. are keen to broker a deal to hang on to power in their own areas. As we noted in Organise! 42 this will also be jeopardised by those who want confrontation with Catholics, and who advocate driving out Catholics from predominantly Protestant areas. The latest events have shown that the process of disintegration of both Loyalist and Republican blocs is accelerating.

ROADS OUT AHEAD

INTERVIEW WITH AN ANTI -ROADS protester and Essex Anarchist

ORGANISE! How did you become involved in the Anti-Roads movement?

EA I met some people in London and became friends with them. They were involved in the anti-roads protests and various other campaigns; they had been heavily involved in the 'No M11' campaign in East London since it started. I met some more people, and because I've got anarchist views anyway became more involved myself, because I saw that the motorway was just another way the authorities were taking liberties with people's lives, making people who have lived in their houses for years move out (like Dolly, who was 93). Also the ecological side of it, pollution and how they are fucking up people's health and the ozone layer.

ORGANISE! What campaigns have you been involved in?

EA - I've mainly been involved in the 'No M11' in East London, I was on that campaign for the best part of a year, doing other things as well like anarchist stuff, marches, meetings. I was involved in animal liberation campaigns like Brightlingsea, I nearly got nicked there for trying to climb up the side of one of the lorries, to get on the roof; I got grabbed but I pulled myself away from the police officer and escaped by running away through the crowd! I went down to Kent as well to a 2 day 'Stop Work On The Road', building site invasions and that. There was a full moon party, the organisers said in the local paper that they were expecting 2000 road protesters, so the police were ready for those numbers, out numbering the protesters by 6 to 1, as there were only about 250 protesters turned up. They were at one of the two camps the Blue group had built and set up, 70 protesters on site, and about 200 Old Bill turned up and formed a circle all around us. They read out the Criminal Justice Act (CJA) about how they thought there was going to be a party or illegal rave there that night, and anybody who was (found) within a 5 mile radius of that area in the next hour was liable for arrest. One of the protesters who had been there for a few months asked us if we could help carry his tent, a big 12 person army job, me and my mates said yes. We helped him carry it and all his belongings, everything in the middle of the tent. We had to go across building sites, ploughed fields (for) the full length of the route. Then the police pulled up, 2 vans, they all came up to me and said was I at the site when the C.J.A order was given out, and as it was one and a half hours since it was given out I was under arrest as I was only three and a half miles away. They took me to an intelligence gathering unit set up in a local school, staffed by the C.I.D and photographed and questioned me. I had to go to court and was fined £40 and given a conditional discharge for the offence of failing to leave the land fast enough when the order was given. It was section B or C of the C.J.A, and the jury were out for three and a half hours deciding what to do with us, cause we was the first people to be up for that offence in Kent. Five of us went "not guilty", and four of us were found guilty. I also went to Newbury when it first started, the first three weeks, it was right good because we stopped them from doing any work in that time. Then the police started to help the security guards, they were no longer keeping an eye on things and having an unbiased view as they say they are supposed to, being there to make sure there is no breach of the peace. Every time the protesters broke through the security lines or got the better of them, the police jumped in and took the security side.

Protesters

ORGANISE! What were the backgrounds of the different people involved?

E.A - I would say that most of the people involved in these campaigns were 'alternative' types, hippies and new agers, and just local residents who has been around the area the motorway is built in. All sorts in general, but some lunch outs, (people who) don't do any work, just there for free grub and that.

ORGANISE! Has the movement changed, and if so, in what ways?

E.A - I think the only way that it has changed really is that there seems to be a lot more people getting involved, at the start a lot of the protesters were alternative types, individualist anarchists and just locals. Now groups of people come from different areas all over the place, just for weekends and a week at a time, liberal "fluffy" types, middle class greens, seems sometimes as if it's become almost fashionable to be a protester, weekends away and all that, bed and breakfast style.

ORGANISE! -Has the Anti-Road movement radicalised people?

E.A -Yes, I do think so, in some ways. Like normal people who you would have at one time called straight goers or law-abiding citizens, just local people, residents in the area where the roads are going through, have seen what attitude the police have, and been man-handled themselves, and even arrested. Old ladies and middle class, middle aged people who have been pushed about, arrested by police in full riot gear, the Old Bill have turned whole communities against them.

ORGANISE!-What are the politics of the people involved?

E.A - I think that most of the hard core protesters that live in the tree houses 70 foot off the ground, and travel from one road protest to another where there are trees involved, the real McCoy sleeping in tree houses when it's minus 2 or 3 , would call themselves anarchists. They are individualists, because when I tell them I'm a member of the ACF they always say if I'm an anarchist, why do I need to be a part of an organisation? They can't seem to grasp that we need to be organised, to be in the position to fight the capitalists and the Ruling Classes -the State- effectively.

I reckon that most people involved at the moment are fluffies and liberal woolly types: believers in non-violent direct action. There are a few socialists and people who call themselves nothing at all, also local residents who are sympathetic and donate food and stuff. All the different Green parties also try to get involved of course, trying to make it their protest, their banners all over the place. At the start of Newbury, when you phoned up the enquiry line, it was answered "Third battle of Newbury, can we help you?". Now it is "Third battle, Friends of the Earth speaking".

Politics

ORGANISE! - What roles have the various Green organisations taken?

E.A - Many of the national organisations have taken part in different ways. Some of the big well known groups have donated goods and equipment to some of the smaller protests such as money, food, climbing ropes and equipment, cargo nets etc. and don't want their name used or even mentioned. They don't want their names associated with the protests, preferring that it is associated with big gimmicks to get their point across, or high class big money stunts that get them on T.V. Some of the smaller Green parties try to get their teeth into road campaigns so that they are, or seem to be, the main force behind a particular protest. They put all their banners and posters all over the place, you know the sort of thing, a take-over job really, the same sort of thing that the Socialist Workers Party do on a normal march. They give their ready made placards out to all the non politically involved people on the march, so that it looks as though the march is S.W.P oriented. To quote Green Anarchist - "Friends Of the Earth and Earth First are dead!, long live the E.L.F!"(Earth Liberation Front).

Strategy

ORGANISE! - What are people's views in the violence/non-violence debate?.

E.A. -Most of the people involved in the roads protests take the non-violent direct action approach, they are really the people who get called fluffies, a lot of them class themselves as anarchists, but pacifists. On the other hand, all the protesters who think that that when the security get heavy handed or violent - as they do sometimes - that we should have a go back and fight, self defence really, they get called spikeys. There is quite a lot of conflict between the two different groups, mostly verbal disputes, but the fluffies heavily outnumber the "let's have a go" brigade. I myself think that we are entitled to defend ourselves if the police or security attack or get heavy with us, "by any means necessary," you know, the old anarchist saying, but there isn't enough of us to get heavy at the moment, so I would say that tactically the non-violent approach is best at present. It gets more of the general public on our side, they like sit-downs, but not riots.

ORGANISE! -How are different strategies devised?

E.A - Through discussions and debate, or people have learnt different ways that are good to stop the road builders or bailiffs at other road protests. The knowledge is passed around campfires during debates at night, tree people who have learnt climbing skills, and have equipment like ropes and harnesses, teach others how to climb trees safely, and how to move around the tree defence walkways without much risk, and how to set up a tree defence network. These are very effective, especially the tunnels, people lock themselves on to props holding the roof of the tunnel up.

State

ORGANISE! - How have the authorities (Police, Bailiffs etc.) reacted to the protests, and how have the police used the C.J.A?. (Criminal Justice Act)

E.A - On most of the protests I've been on, it's been the NVDA approach, so there is little violence or hostility from the protesters. I would say because of that most of the old Bill don't get wound up, but there is always some that want to get stroppy. They make remarks about how smelly we all are, "when did you last have a bath." ? It's the same with the Sheriff's men really, some are OK with you really, some are nasty horrible bastards. I think really (that) the most grief comes from the security men, a lot of them are quite aggressive, they like to think of themselves as tough guys, and us as silly hippies. They're silly fuckers if you ask me, they only get £3.50 an hour and they have to 12 hour shifts. On some protests, evictions from buildings and tree houses, when the police get you they just walk you away from the area, search you, and ask for your name and address. Sometimes, more recently, they have used the C.J.A, if you don't leave the area you will all be nicked for criminal trespass. They used it a lot at Newbury, nicking everybody they could grab for criminal trespass, and anybody who got in the way of the diggers or chainsaw men.

ORGANISE! - What is the role of the Media, and how do activists view them?

E.A - A lot of the daily tabloids are against us: "hippy squatters, and they're all anarchist." I just wish it was all true, the bloody Old Bill wouldn't be able to move us so quick as they do. A few of the dailies are OK, give us good write ups about how we are doing it for the environment and that, but not many of them. A few of the local papers take the protesters side, because they can see what the road in question is going to do to the area. A lot of the protesters don't trust the media, photographers or reporters. There's been a lot of photos taken by freelancers, and when their photos to the papers they sell them to the police cheap, so that they get good close ups of people's faces. Some protesters like the press because they say it gets the point across, and shows that somebody is trying to do something about it, or it might bring more support from local people.

ORGANISE! - Has the response to the Authorities changed?

E.A - I do think that quite a lot of people's attitudes towards the police and authorities have changed over the last year. A lot of people who used to be fluffy, who now have seen violence from police and security at various marches, demos and evictions now think its time to be spikey and fight back. Those who have been on various campaigns and lived on the road are often fed up with all the shit the authorities throw at them all the time, its time for action not for talking about how to lay on the floor. According to certain fluffy papers this is the best way to defend certain parts of your body when getting a beating off the Old Bill. More people getting spikey is a good sign as far as I'm concerned, if attacked we should defend ourselves by any human means we have.

Future

ORGANISE! - How do you see the future of the Anti-Roads movement?

E.A - I think that as long as there as they keep on building roads there will be a movement, the hardcore protesters are right in there, the tree people and that, they all know each other, and anywhere they are trying to chop down a tree for a road, these people are going to go. Its no joke, the authorities have chopped down half of Britain's ancient woodland, just since the Second World War, 10% of Britain's landmass is covered in tarmac; 75,000 new cars hit the streets of the world every 24 hours, so its got to come to a stop at some point, or its going to be goodbye world. We've just got to get the point over to the masses, the ozone (layer) is knackered, the icecaps are melting, we have got to do something drastic. Anything that causes poisonous fumes or toxic gases to be put in the atmosphere has got to be stopped; car culture, industry, lots of things, we've got to put ourselves back a few hundred years, go back to horses and carts, electric trains, trams around the city instead of buses, pushbikes instead of cars. Viva the anti-road movement, long live anarchist communism.

RAVE NEW WORLD?

AS THE ECSTASY debate continues with the recent sensationalised Daily Mirror anti-Ecstasy campaign, and the 'All about E' Guardian discussion; the general emphasis as always, and not surprisingly , has been on the negative aspects of E - the consequences and the oft quoted statistics of between 50 and 60 casualties from E since 1988; (incidentally drink causes an estimated 28,000 fatalities in Britain per year [Melody Maker 8/6/96]). Even the so called progressive attitudes of the various drug information agencies and experts concentrate on possible harm and side effects.

But what about the positives? Are there any? Can millions of people each week be wrong? Does raving /Ecstasy have any place within revolutionary politics? Is it anti-revolutionary? How has it affected the social environment of Britain?

Social Environment

"...The turn of the decade and the pop clock begins to bring politics into fashion as organised raves and warehouse parties are busted, banned and trashed by cops throughout Britain. Just south of Leeds, the biggest mass arrest ever seen in this country...during one large outdoor rave.. the authorities are putting the scare on pop, dance music, new (different) drugs, people organising outside the established clubs.. the threatening, sexist, macho atmosphere connected to night-clubs is swamped by something new, exciting and even joyous..." (Chumbawamba - Showbusiness!)

As Chumbawamba suggest, the advent of raving and the accompanying use of Ecstasy has positively changed the social life of many; especially women. Nicholas Saunders, in his second work about Ecstasy, Ecstasy and The Dance Culture puts forward two possible reasons for this positive transformation. The first, a purely biological point, proposes the idea that as Ecstasy is a sexual suppressant, women are able to enjoy themselves free from sexual advances and hassle from men, "...Traditional alcohol-based events always had an undertone of trying to score sexually through flirting and small talk..."[Saunders - Ecstasy and The Dance Culture] The second, offers the idea that traditional cultural values are being rejected, "...Although many young people in the dance scene now drink and do not take ecstasy, the normal way to behave is still without small talk or sexual aggression...".

It is quite probable that both of these points are true; as a sexual suppressant, especially for men, Ecstasy focuses the users attention on other things- namely the music and dancing. The result, more often than not, is a more relaxed and friendlier atmosphere; especially for women. This atmosphere perpetrates the desire for more of the same, and this is where the rejection of traditional cultural values could be seen to come into play.

Breaking Down Barriers.

Another case in point, illustrating this combination, is that of the rave scene in northern Ireland. As the scene developed and became popular around 1994, many young people (between the ages of 14 and 20), both Protestants and Catholics, became involved. The difference between this social scene and the pre-rave culture was that they became involved together, Saunders explains further;

"...I heard rumours that the effect of young people taking Ecstasy at raves in Northern Ireland was to break down sectarian barriers. In the summer of 1994, just before the IRA ceasefire, I spent 3 days in Northern Ireland... I interviewed teenage kids at a rave event in the Catholic club with a home video camera...lots of them were keen to tell me about the friendships they had made with members of the opposite sect who, they assured me, they would never have met otherwise..."

Without wanting to suggest that years of political conflict could be solved by dance music and E, Saunders' Northern Ireland experience does illustrate the existence of the two points mentioned which could account for the change in the participants social behaviour. Aggression is gone, leading to the breaking down of barriers hence the rejection of traditional cultural values i.e. catholic only and Protestant only clubs, "...We've never known anything but hatred...It's always the same: them over on one side, you on the other, except at raves...".

Raving is not the only recreational activity where the participants have experienced behaviour changes, due to the use of Ecstacy. Although also involved in the dance/E scene, football supporters, from the 1991/92 season, showed a massive reduction in the amount of involvement they had in incidences of football violence and associated arrests. (The Independent 8/92 - a study.) Saunders cites a particular example of Manchester United and Manchester City fans, notorious for their violent clashes. He describes his experience of earlier Derby games (1989 & 1990) as being predictably violent and nothing out of the ordinary. Then he relates the first Derby game in the 1991/92 season;

"...By this time something quite remarkable had happened. Many of the hardcore lads from both United and City had spent most of the summer dancing the weekends away to the sounds of house music at raves fuelled by the drug Ecstasy. They had done this together! They had got into a routine of meeting up at rave clubs and taking Ecstasy in groups comprising both United and City lads...United's fans moved off, there were, as usual, several hundred of them. But from the vantage point of the same bridge I had stood on two seasons earlier, I could hardly believe that this group was largely made up of those same young men who had looked like they were going to war. This time they looked more like they were going to Glastonbury festival!...The match went off with hardly any trouble and afterwards United and City's lads once again danced the night away... it could never have happened before E..."

Addiction

Some critics of ecstasy have argued that although E is non-addictive, in terms of physical withdrawal symptoms, it is probable that it is psychologically addictive. This view can be given some credence as Saunders explains, "...Many European users do take Ecstasy every weekend and are psychologically dependent...".

However, he also states that, "...MDMA (Ecstasy) becomes less attractive with increased use...it's debatable whether it is the scene or the drug that they are addicted to ...". In the short time that I have been involved in the scene (approx. 14 months), I have never come across a person who I have considered to be addicted to Ecstasy. On the contrary, I have met many people who have gone weeks, months and even years without taking E. I myself have gone months at a time without taking, or feeling the need to take it.

Brave New World.

Another criticism bandied about, regarding E, is its potentiality to create a 'Brave New World'; in which people accept their lot, and all desire to fight for a better world is 'drugged' out of them. As every remotely awake and sane person will realise, we already have plenty of devices about which attempt to coerce us into such a position: cars, dishwashers, videos, CD's, houses, carpets, wallpaper, etc. the list is endless. And lets not forget all about the perfectly legal drugs which could be said to do a much better job of numbing the mind than E, such as Benzodiazepines or anti-depressants such as Prozac.

Revolutionary?

So, can raving/Ecstasy unite enemies and bring peace where there is war? Of course not. Violence and wars still exist and will always prevail, until capitalism is eradicated. Raving/E, football, drinking, rock climbing, horse racing, etc. are all temporary releases from the mundanity of our existence under capitalism. None of these activities or any other leisure pursuit is revolutionary or, for that matter, anti-revolutionary. Ravers and the rave scene are as much targets for exploitation within Capitalism as every other consumer, as Arch Stanton points out,

"...The real threat of exploitation comes once again from the proliferation of would-be shamans amongst the state-funded cohorts of drug workers and their academic hangers-on. The former can barely contain their excitement..." ['What Future For The Real Raver'-Arch Stanton - Here and Now no. 14. 1993].

So once the experience is over its back to the real world of wage slavery, poverty and desperation, and either fighting to end these afflictions of capitalism, (and hence capitalism itself) or not.

In conclusion then, to be under any illusion that E/rave culture has any revolutionary power is to be living in a world of make believe. It is one experience out of many (although one of the best experiences I have ever had) which helps us to endure our existence as best we can. It will not do away with football violence on a large scale, or work where the Northern Ireland peace talks have not; but something which gives its participants (especially women) a break from "...the threatening, sexist, macho atmosphere connected to night clubs...", and indeed most other forms of 'normalised' social interaction, is, I believe, a progression, and, as much of a liberation of the social environment as is possible in a capitalist world.

War Artists of the Class War

WE CONCLUDE OUR 3-part series on Art and Anarchism. Due to lack of space we were unable to publish this in the last issue of Organise! as promised. Upcoming articles will include the involvement of Surrealists with the revolutionary Anarchist movement.

The role of the revolutionary artist is to reveal the real nature of capitalist society, to attack the system that causes poverty, hunger and death; to rip aside the mask that conceals systematic corruption, heartless bureaucracy and biased laws; to remind people that they are not alone, that their individual acts of resistance can be more effective as collective action taken with other people.

One such artist is 69 year-old Carlos Cortez. His lino-cut posters attack the evils and hypocrisy of capitalism. They are fly-posted around the Chicago streets at night and provide illustrations to accompany articles in the revolutionary press. Taking the heroes of revolutionary anarchism and the quiet daily heroism of the oppressed as his themes, his art is popular and populist.

The son of a Mexican Indian, who was an organiser for the Industrial Workers of the World (the I.W.W. also known as "wobblies"), and a German socialist mother, Cortez has been a "harvest hand, construction worker, loafer, jailbird... vagabond factory stiff". He joined the I.W.W. after World War 2 and his articles, poems and illustrations have appeared in its paper, 'Industrial Worker' ever since.

'La Lucha Continua'

Cortez draws on his Mexican Indian origins and his involvement with the wobblies for his visual images. Typically these ideas came together in a woodcut entitled 'La lucha continua' ('the struggle continues'). Based on photographs of a peasant demonstration in Bolivia, Carlos added two skeletons and a pregnant woman, indicating that the struggle is something that takes in the past, present and future.

One striking woodblock poster depicts a Meztizo family, standing in front of a pyramid at the side of a stalk of maize, with the wording "Somos de la Tierra - No somos illegales" ("we are of the land - we are not illegal"). Produced to protect against the harassment of undocumented immigrants from Mexico by the U.S. immigration authorities.

"Imagine those whose ancestors came from another continent telling the natives of this continent that they do not have the right to move around in their own land. Migrating to better their economic conditions is precisely what brought the Europeans over to this hemisphere", Carlos explains. A similar point was made on a small card advertising an exhibition celebrating "500 years of Resistance" which portrays a group of American Indians laughing at a portrait of Christopher Columbus.

Central America

American imperialism in Central and South America has been a favourite target for Cortez. One poster depicts a nursing mother and child, holding the slogan: "Mirucomo trabajan tuo impuestos, CABRON!" ("look how your taxes work, cuckold"). Behind the mother and child tower skeletons in helmets marked "Policia". This poster was designed to draw attention to the way the taxes of U.S. workers are used against workers in Central America, in Guatemala, El Salvador and Nicaragua. A smaller poster depicts parents grieving over a flag-draped coffin and lists the number of U.S. soldiers killed in wars of intervention. Printed down the side is the slogan: "Draftees of the world, unite. You have nothing to lose but your Generals!"

Carlos Cortez Lucia Gonzalez de Parsons, 1986

One woodcut has been based on the collective experience of Guatemalan women whose husbands had 'disappeared', after being taken from their houses by armed gangs. Cortez gathered their stories together, and synthesised it into the depiction of a family house invaded by a death squad, a masked informer points the woman's husband out to the killers.

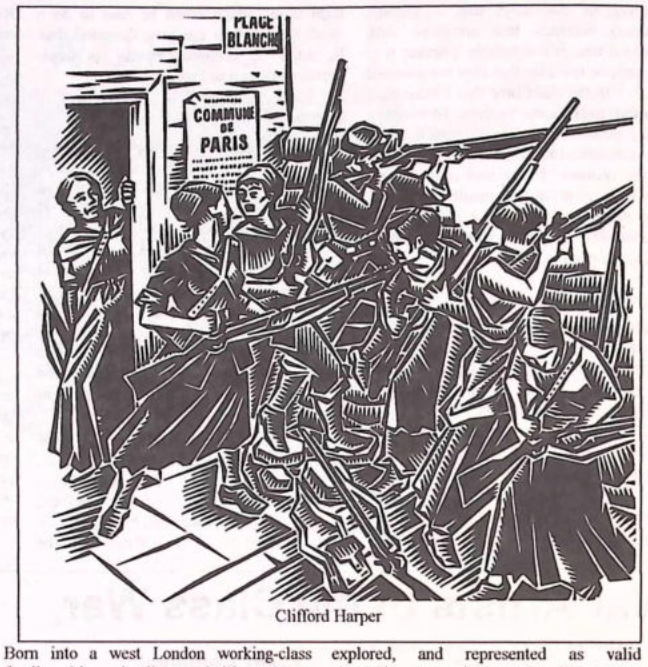
Living in Chicago, Carlos is active with the Movimento Artistico Chicano (MARCH). One poster printed for MARCH is of the 19th century Mexican engraver Jose Guadalupe Posada, embraced by one of the calaveras (animated skeletons) for which he was famous. Mexican artistic influences shape Cortez's work and the striking black and white images recall those of the revolutionary Mexican artists grouped around the paper El Machete.

Resistance and Community

The depiction of Posada is one of many portrait posters, which include the legendary song-writer and wobbly agitator Joe Hill, the Mexican anarchist-communist, Ricardo Flores Magon, and Lucy Parsons, a former slave, who dedicated her whole life to revolutionary action. In all these portraits Cortez combines image and text, and the subject gazes out with a direct honesty which confronts the viewer.

In Britain the artist most closely identified with anarchism is Clifford Harper. An illustrator whose work frequently appears in the national press, Harper's graphics have celebrated resistance and community, providing a critique of all that is wrong with capitalism, attacking all forms of authoritarianism and projecting a utopian vision of possible alternatives.

Clifford Harper



Clifford Harper

Born into a west London working-class family, his schoolboy rebelliousness - truancy, expulsion and petty crime - grew into involvement with the sixties counter-culture and increasing political awareness. This included a period of living in a commune which provided glimpses of life's potential - a potential described in one of his first major works 'Class War Comix' and a frequently reprinted series of illustrations commissioned for 'Radical Technology', which presented utopian ideas in a practical early obtainable manner - terraced houses with collectivised gardens, community workshops and medical centres in which the sexual division of labour had been transformed. These visions were contrasted with the reality of capitalism portrayed in Patriarch Street Scene.

Stirring Depiction

The idea that anarchism is realistic, is attainable, that its many strands make a vibrant alternative to capitalism was reinforced by the cover of a 1976 catalogue for Compendium Bookshop, which featured pictures of windmills, waterfalls working and demonstrating women alongside some of the historical figures of anarchism.

It is also the theme which runs through 'Anarchy; a Graphic Guide', which was published in 1987. This was written and illustrated by Harper, and provides one of the best introductions to the ideas of anarchism. All the variants of anarchism are explored, and represented as valid alternatives to capitalism. The illustrations draw on the various styles and artists connected with anarchism in the past, Farns Masereel being one obvious example. He also uses the traditional iconography of anarchism: Light, chains, hammers, prison bars, flags, crowds and barricades all reinforce the ideas explained in the text. In chapter 4 an explanation of the Paris Commune is accompanied by a stirring depiction of women in assertive and revolutionary roles.

Much of Harper's graphic work celebrates resistance. On of his most effective works was the black and white cartoon-strip tribute to Jim Heather-Hayes, the young anarchist poet who committed suicide in Ashford prison after serving four months in solitary confinement for fire-bombing a London police station in 1982. The cartoon-strip is a format he frequently uses, sometimes to illustrate poems, such as Seigfried Sassoon's anti-war poem 'Fight to a Finish', in which the returning soldiers turn on the press before driving the "butchers out of Parliament".

Clifford Harper

Rebellious Spirit

Harper's recent work includes the illustration and design of 'Visions of Poetry' an anthology of 20th century anarchist poetry, which he also helped edit. This and a slimmer volume published at the same time, the 'Prolegomena to a study of the Return of the Repressed in History' are skilfully designed and crafted, with text and illustration working together in harmony. The illustrations of the 'Prolegomena' stand in the edge of abstraction, yet provide the perfect foil for the bitter denunciations of authority found in the text.

In stark contrast to this move towards the semi-abstract are his series of picture-card portraits of 36 anarchists, men and women who have dreamed of a different way of life, including Emiliano Zapata, the Chinese writer Ba Jin and John Cage, the musician. Harper's work has been diverse, and he has illustrated book jackets, LP covers, magazine articles, but his best work has often been that which has related to a particular struggle, such as the poll-tax rebellion. His image of angry peasants captured the rebellious spirit of the mass of ordinary people, and linked it to similar revolts of the past. Little wonder that his particular image was reprinted again and again.

Cortez and Harper live on separate continents, yet both are united in their opposition to capitalism by a determination to document the class war as it happens - in doing so they have created art with greater meaning, relevance and engagement than all the arid portraits and landscapes that fill the gallery walls.

ANARCHIST BLACK CROSS

Insumisos

Since 1989 hundreds of people have been imprisoned annually in Spain for insumision, total resistance to military and alternative service. The normal sentence is 2 years, 4 months, 1 day. The policy of resisting all service was meant as a direct challenge against the state's military machine. It has been particularly strongly supported in Euskadi (the Basque country).

However, in 1996, all this will change. Insumision will no longer be a personable offence. Spain's 'socialist' government, clearly embarrassed at having it's prisons stuffed full of insumisos (total resisters), have changed the law. The new punishment for insumision is to be 'disqualification', for between eight and fourteen years. This means that anyone found guilty of insumision will be deprived of the right to receive aid from public funds. This includes financial help for housing, to study, or to cope with unemployment. They will also not be allowed to get jobs that are in any way connected to public administration, such as health, education, transport and so on.

Insumisos may well be faced with extreme hardship under this new law. It will also have the effect of reducing the visibility of the resistance to the military, so making it easier to carry out repression and break the spirits of those that would resist the state.

It remains to be seen how the insumisos respond. One possibility is to join the armed forces and then refuse, as this means imprisonment under military law. What is obvious though, is that such a repressive law must be resisted through mass direct action and the support of those found guilty under the new law.

Anti-Fascist Jailed

Pavel Kroupa, a Czech anti-fascist activist has been charged with murder, and jailed. In March, he was on a bus in Prague when he was attacked by five Nazi skinheads. Pavel defended himself and consequently one Nazi died. Czech comrades are appealing for financial support and benefits to help pay for Pavel's defence. If found guilty he could face life in prison. Support should be sent to:-

Harold H. Thompson

Harold is an anarchist imprisoned in the USA. In 1979 he was arrested in Chattanoooga, Tennessee, for allegedly shooting to death a police informant / killer convicted of murdering the mother of Harold's son, who then threatened his son while out on appeal bond. He was also charged with expropriating money for political activities, from a jewellery store. He was sentenced to life plus 50 years. He was then given an additional 21-75 years for a second shooting incident in Cleveland, Ohio.

Following a failed armed escape from an East Tennessee prison, from November 1986 Harold spent 5 years, 4 months in maximum security / solitary confinement. he also received an additional sentence of 32 years as a result of charges from this incident.

In July 1993, having been out of solitary for 15 months without a single disciplinary infraction report, he was framed for "in all likelihood having possible escape plans" based on "outside confidential information". He was returned to maximum security / solitary confinement where he remained until march 1995. In June 1995, Harold was again reclassified to a lower security, but had to wait 8 months before being transferred to the Turney Centre Industrial Prison, where he is now.

As well as being an anarchist, Harold is also a jailhouse lawyer. This involves him drafting legal briefs for submission to courts for appellate documents, or filing civil rights complaints on behalf of other prisoners. His activities have earned him recurrent harassment, but he remains resolute and continues to work for what he believes in.

We would urge people to write to Harold or sent messages of support, and also add his name to the mailing list of any publications you are involved with.

Frame-up

Oliver Campbell is currently serving a life sentence for the murder of a shopkeeper which occurred during an armed robbery of an off licence and supermarket. He has continually protested his innocence.

The evidence centred around a black 'British Knights' baseball cap which witnesses said the gunman was wearing (two people were involved in the robbery). A sports shop worker told police that Oliver had recently bought such a hat, and he was arrested on this basis. The hat had, however, been stolen some weeks earlier outside a night-club. An identical hat was found in the vicinity of the robbery by police, but hair found on it did not match that of Oliver's. In fact there was no forensic evidence against Oliver whatsoever.

In addition to this Oliver was questioned by police on numerous occasions without his lawyer being present, despite police having agreed to call his solicitor if any questioning was to take place. A psychologist at his appeal stated that she thought that the police had put undue pressure on Oliver to force a confession out of him, as he is considered to have severe learning difficulties and confessed merely to stop his harassment.

Added to all this, his co-defendant pleaded guilty to conspiracy to rob (for which he received a 5 year sentence) and named another person who he said was involved in the robbery. Police however, did not even bother to pursue this line of enquiry, presumably, because it did not fit into their theory! Oliver is significantly taller than any of the witnesses stated the attacker was. He is also, much younger. He was totally unable to explain the history of the gun used, or where he had disposed of it. In the end, the only evidence against him is a confession which was given while under severe mental stress! Incredibly (or not, if you know anything of British justice!) his appeal, which took three and an half years even to happen, was rejected despite the total lack of evidence.

Green Politics

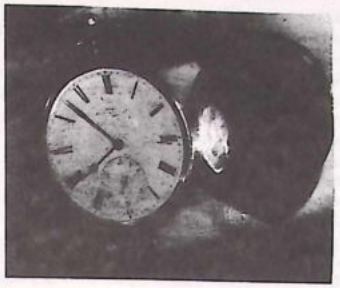
green current claiming to be anarchist, that is the anarcho-primitivists. The anarcho-primitivist position basically holds that an non-hierarchical society is impossible whilst any form of industrial civilisation remains and that, therefore, talk of a liberatory technology is nonsense. Whilst many writings from the anarcho-primitivist 'movement' (it is a far from homogenous entity) are an excellent counter-balance to technophile arguments coming from various sources (including 'revolutionary') their overall perspective lacks any revolutionary dynamic and often betrays a confused misanthropic idealist fanaticism at odds with authentic anarchism.

Towards a Green Libertarian Communism

Any would-be revolutionary movement today cannot ignore the necessity of developing a 'green' perspective. But this does not mean simply tagging on a few eco-friendly ideas to an otherwise concrete grey politics. It entails an active engagement with specifically anti-capitalist forces within the green movement. It means presenting a class struggle anarchist analysis of the present struggles against environmental destruction to those involved, to those effected. The struggles against the roads, for just one example, are implicitly class struggles as they challenge not merely present government policy but capitalist logic itself, the logic (and necessity!) for expansion.

Likewise, when the greens talk about 'zero growth' anarchist and libertarian communists must point out the explicitly communist nature of this idea. Equally, the latter must attempt to understand the implications of their politics for the environment (in the broadest sense). Already a dynamic is appearing as the limitations of traditional politics are becoming increasingly exposed as the world and its inhabitants face the choice of a new society or slow annihilation. If the historical choice has been between socialism or barbarism it is now between green libertarian communism and a barbaric death in clouds of toxic fumes.



FINDING TIME: ONE STEP BEYOND THE TYRANNY OF WORK. Norman Jope. 16pp. £1. Memes Press. Available from 38 Molesworth Road, Plympton, Plymouth, Devon PL7 4NT.

This pamphlet comes at a time when the struggle against the Jobseekers Allowance (JSA) is beginning to hot up. Indeed, this piece of legislation, the compulsive nature of which is written into its very name, symbolises the question around which Finding time revolves: how our time is spent (or rather, squandered) in the service of the market.

Workhouse

Jope begins by noting how 70s talk of the Leisure Society has been abandoned. On one hand, there are many now who work excessively long hours and/or do unpaid overtime: in 1992, 15% of British workers toiled for 48 hours or more per week. On the other, for the millions unemployed, their rights to any kind of income or to go into a job of their choosing have been increasingly eroded and restricted. The JSA exemplifies this. In 1979, leaving a job "without just cause" meant that benefit would be suspended for 6 weeks. The JSA provides for such suspension lasting up to 6 months.

The contrast with the 60s and 70s, or even those still relatively liberal countries like Denmark, is blamed squarely on deliberate policy rather than untameable market forces. Unsurprisingly, the aim of this policy has been to boost profits. It has had three facets: the creation of mass unemployment, for example through privatisation of State-owned industries, the weakening of union rights and power, aided by the first factor; and an increasingly stringent benefits regime.

These changes have had profound effects on the psychological climate as well. Indeed, changing attitudes, such as that of expecting to have "a job for life", has been an avowed aim of free market ideologists like the Tories. What this has actually meant is the creation of an atmosphere of insecurity and stress running through the lives of the working class, whether in "permanent" or temporary employment, or struggling on the dole. thus the basis for resistance is undercut by the fear of falling through each successive level.

Beyond Leisure

Jope goes on to ask fundamental but often neglected questions as to what kinds of work (and how much of it) we actually need done, and what could be eliminated. As he points out, most people want to engage in purposeful and enjoyable activity. Even the "leisure Society" would be a misnomer for one in which the work/leisure divide had thus been abolished as a result of the overthrow of the capitalist economy. But whether "work" or "leisure", the common denominator is time: our present lack of control over it and our need to gain such control in order to have a free, humane society.

As things stand, those who demonstrate a certain freedom in their lives, like New Age Travellers for example, tend to be reviled. It's suggested that this is partly through envy of the contrast they present to lives of "working and shopping". However, the travellers' importance in this context is only a symbol of escape from the global market and the State- much more is needed for the transformation of a society which, as Jope shows, demoralises and exhausts the majority.

It is in his examination of the means by which changes might be brought about that anarchists will find most to question. Though the pamphlet has strong libertarian and egalitarian elements (e.g. advocating the active unity of the employed and unemployed) there is a tendency towards reformism in this last part of the discussion. For example, making the Jobseekers Allowance payable at its full rate in any period of unemployment, and creating a legal offence of "industrial coercion" with the aim of "constraining exploitative employers". But as well as recognising the improbability of the current Opposition pursuing these aims, Jope stresses that they are not advocated as end in themselves. Rather, they would be to excite the desire for more freedom and shift the consensus of today's unquestionably diminished hopes, which regard the market and the State as eternal. What anarchists deny is the idea that this system can be infinitely reformed, to the point where true freedom and justice exist. but reforms are useful insofar as they show that change is possible, and employ methods that build general confidence and this, I think, is the intended message.

In the end, the chief value of Finding Time is the attempt to tackle some basic questions of human purpose, rather than its tentative solutions. This is done very successfully, in a clear, informative and thoughtful style. Find the time to read it.

To document further developments with the JSA, and to assist the resistance to it, a newsletter called the Clock Stops Here is also available. Send an SAE to the same address as for Finding Time.

SOCIAL ANARCHISM OR LIFESTYLIST ANARCHISM. AN UNBRIDGEABLE CHASM. Murray Bookchin. 86 pages. AK Press. £5.95

As Bookchin himself says "Stated bluntly: Between the socialist pedigree of anarcho-syndicalism and anarcho communism...and the basically liberal, individualistic pedigree of lifestyle anarchism... there exists a divide that cannot be bridged unless we completely disregard the profoundly different goals, methods, and underlying philosophy that distinguish them." In this blistering attack on lifestylism, individualism and primitivism, this veteran of the libertarian movement pulls out all the stops. His constant affirmation of the revolutionary, social and collective core of Anarchism throughout this booklet warms the cockles of the heart of any Anarchist Communist worth their salt. Bookchin seems concerned that this revolutionary core is being eroded to the point where the word anarchy will become part of the chic bourgeois vocabulary of the coming century naughty, rebellious, insouciant but deliciously safe. This pessimism is not borne out by a look at the facts. Bookchin appears to be referring to the Anglo-Saxon Anarchist scene, although he seems to believe this process is also going on in for, example, the Latin countries. Now admittedly the so-called Anarchist movement in the United States and Canada is diabolical. This reviewer remembers well the American and Canadian "Anarchists" who turned up to the Trieste International Anarchist conference who sickened many East and West European comrades there, not to mention those who turned up for the Class War International event. But even so there do exist groups and individuals on the other side of the Atlantic who do profess some kind of class - struggle anarchism. Shouldn't Bookchin bear this in mind and make reference to them as a counter-weight to the individualists and lifestylists he describes? Similarly, Bookchin seems remarkably ignorant of the Anarchist movement in Ireland and Britain. Is he not aware that the majority of Irish Anarchists hold class struggle views, as does the Scottish Anarchist Federation. Is he not conscious of the fact that the number of class struggle anarchists in England and Wales have increased dramatically in the last 2 decades? Why no reference to any of the organisations and papers that espouse such views? And what about the movement in the rest of Europe? It would be preposterous to regard it as predominantly lifestylist!

Alternative

Nevertheless this pamphlet is a welcome addition to the arguments in favour of what Bookchin defines as social anarchism and against the latter day individualism which he believes started taking hold with the defeat of the 60s counter-culture. He notes: " No less than Marxism and other socialisms, anarchism can be profoundly influenced by the bourgeois environment it professes to oppose, with the result that the growing "inwardness" and narcissism of the yuppie generation have left their mark upon many avowed radicals. Ad hoc adventurism, personal bravura, an aversion to theory oddly akin to the antirational biases of postmodernism, celebrations of theoretical incoherence (pluralism), a basically apolitical and anti-organisational commitment to imagination, desire, and ecstasy, and an intensely self-oriented enchantment of everyday life, reflect the toll that social reaction has taken on Euro-American anarchism over the past two decades".

Now, Bookchin was involved in various attempts at radicalising the counter-culture in the 60s, to his credit. But perhaps his involvement has made him a mite indulgent Whilst admitting the counter-culture's "shortcomings" he fails to say what they are. Certainly individualism and self-centred pursuit of pleasure can be discovered to a lesser or greater extent in the sayings of counter-cultural figureheads like Timothy Leary, Abbie Hoffman and Jerry Rubin. The impact of decades of reaction since then should not obscure the fact that these tendencies were already there and that little attempt was made to counterpose a class struggle perspective.

Bookchin, in his often brilliant diatribes against the Primitivists, fails to emphasise the other side of the coin. Productivism, production for production's sake, one of the chief maxims of capitalism, is one of the mechanisms that the Primitivists, no matter how wrong-headedly and in such a mistaken way, are rebelling against. In castigating the anti-technology and anti-civilisation stances of Primitivism, one feels that Bookchin errs too much in the other direction. Certainly he fails to sufficiently address himself to the problem of unbridled Production. Similarly , whilst agreeing with his denunciation of the anti-civilisation poses- and indeed poses are what they often are- of the primitivists, Bookchin fails to emphasis what this reviewer feels is of utmost importance. The primitivists have substituted the Civilisation of the last few thousand years with a call for the destruction of Civilisation. Well, I go along with them on this. Except that I want to substitute a new Civilisation, based on values nurtured in the libertarian movement and starting to develop now with a culture of resistance, not the end of civilisation per se. Bookchin fails to explain that a future society would mean a new Civilisation, transcending, and indeed destroying this one.

Democracy

Bookchin vaunts democracy as "not antithetical to anarchism". But we in the ACF feel that this ambiguous term, so often used to mobilise the masses to go to war for capitalism and the State and to counter the Western Powers' struggle with the Soviet bloc, cannot be used without confusion. Some of Bookchin's "disciples" have used his call for "libertarian municipalism" to run as candidates for City Council elections. Indeed in Canada, some of these "disciples" have run on "libertarian" tickets for Quebec nationalism. Now, Bookchin, has vigorously denounced nationalism and support for "National liberation" in this book, and the views of his "disciples" should not be mistaken for his own. But he really needs to clarify just what he means by his slogan "Democratise the republic, radicalise the democracy". Is he in favour of "libertarian municipalism " of the sort where "libertarians" capture the local State (and end up being captured by it)? As he states, he has lost the view that the working class is the revolutionary subject of history, that is, that it is destined to bring about the radical overthrow of capitalism. In doing so, he appears to have dug himself into the hole of libertarian municipalism, out of which it seems difficult for him to get out.

Despite these criticisms, this booklet is well worth reading for arguments against the erroneous ideas of Stirner and Nietzsche. Indeed, Bookchin quite correctly points out that Emma Goldman, despite avowing an anarcho communist ideology, was a Nietzschean "cheek to jowl in spirit with individualists". His brisk attacks on the likes of L. Susan Brown, Hakim Bey, George Bradford and John Zerzan should be read by all serious Anarchists who are looking for a coherent revolutionary answer to the confusion of these thinkers.

Letters

Dear Organise!

Mayday was extra special in Sheffield this year, because it also marked the opening of the brand new "Red and Black Centre" here.

It was only a couple of months ago that we decided to look for premises to set up a place for meetings, bookstall and infoshop, creche, cafe etc. Things moved fast. We all made monthly pledges of what we felt we each could afford. We found a space that we could afford to rent, and moved in just after Easter. Since that time, various members of the Sheffield Anarchist Group, Sheffield Solidarity Federation and others, have been working hard to get the place ready for a 1st May opening (the place was a bit of a tip to start with).

Well, we did it, and the centre had it's grand opening On May 1st 1996. It was a big success. The centre looked great, after all the efforts of the group, with anarchist banners and posters from Sheffield and all over the world. About 60 people came, including members of the Leeds Anarchist group and some from Bradford. We heard talks on the origins of Mayday, on What is Anarchism, and on the centre itself. There was also an bookstall, an exhibition about the Spanish Revolution and a bar. We drank, ate and socialised until late.

This was only the first of a series of events to mark the opening of the centre. On Thursday we showed some videos, including the famous Poll Tax Riot, featuring the Sheffield Anarchists among many others! On Friday, there was Anarchist Bingo and an Anarchist Quiz, courtesy of the Leeds Anarchist Group. On Saturday, we held an anarchist bookfair in the afternoon followed by an evening of music, and socialising. Finally, on Sunday, we all met for a picnic in Endcliffe park.

We are planning more events for the future. We will keep you informed!

Green Politics

IT CAN BE argued that the logical consequence of libertarian communist thought has always been the creation of a 'green' society since it has always posited the need for the destruction of capitalism, the system which, as we know, must expand or die and which has given birth to the ideologies of productivism and consumerism.

Anarchist and libertarian communist thinkers in the early days of the revolutionary working class movement, in their criticism of the 'modern' industrial system and its tendency to transform the worker into a part of the machinery, can be seen as proto-greens. But it would, however, be stretching things to say that the early anarchist movement was anything like a consciously 'green' movement, despite the critical contribution of people like Elisee Reclus, William Morris, Edward Carpenter and Peter Kropotkin. Whilst all of the above writers produced work that contained, 'green' implications or at least sentiment, none can be seriously considered as systematically 'green' thinkers. What can be argued is that the communist vision of people like Morris and Kropotkin, that of a decentralised society of integrated labour in humanised environments, stands in stark contrast to many 'socialists' (beginning with some of the 'utopian' socialists but scientificised by Marx) who considered (and still consider) the Factory as a model for the new society.

Socialist Productivism

Such thinking found its realisation in the rapid industrialisation under state capitalism in the Soviet Union, which although bound to do so by its need to compete in world markets, found a perfect ideological support in the (generally unchallenged) belief amongst socialists that the industrialisation of the world was an 'historical necessity'. It is no coincidence that some of the most horrendous environmental destruction has been carried out under the banner of socialism! Unfortunately, anarchists have not been exempt from holding an uncritical attitude towards industrial 'civilisation'.

Whilst it would be unusual to find any outright glorification of the modern factory amongst anarchists, undoubtedly from reading anarcho-syndicalist literature from the end of the last century, right up until quite recently, the impression is given that technology is not up for criticism and, disturbingly, that little life takes place outside of the factory. Anarchist communists haven't been much better in this respect. Why is that? Obviously, anarchists and libertarian communists are products of their times and the level of environmental destruction at the time of the first mass anarchist movements was by no means as apparent as it has been in the period since World War Two. Whilst revolutionaries argued that capitalism was destroying the worker and peasant, body and soul, it was not so obvious that capital was in the process of destroying the earth on which both worker and peasant stood. Neither was it possible to foresee that capital would develop the capacity to annihilate all life on the planet in the space of a few weeks or less with the aid of nuclear fission. The consciously 'green' movements which paralleled the great workers movements were generally mystical, often reactionary 'middle-class' type-movements, sometimes strongly Malthusian and racist and rarely identified with the existing 'progressive' social movements.

The Green 'Revolution'

Yet today much of the green movement claims to hold much in common with 'anarchism'. Even some of the most reformist elements in the green movement, from time to time, feel obliged to make noises about non-hierarchical organisation, devolved decision-making and other things historically identified with anarchist politics. Amongst large numbers of the direct-action orientated green activists, 'anarchist' sentiment is strong, though often very unfocused, and there is contempt for traditional forms of politics. There is also alienation from the traditional focus of anarchism, the class struggle. Often the working class are identified with the 'culture of industry' and, understandably, the notion of class solidarity is easily lost on, for example, road protesters (often unemployed) whose regular contact with their class brothers and sisters is in the form of £2.50 an hour rent-a-cop security guards!

Social Ecology

The anarchist movement itself has been forced to take on board explicitly green politics, has had to confront the issue of productivism and has had to seriously discuss the nature of technology. Perhaps the first libertarian communist writer to comprehensively address the question of the ecological crisis and its solution has been Murray Bookchin. Indeed, Bookchin can be counted amongst the first theorists of the modern ecology movement itself, with books like 'Our Synthetic Environment' (1962) and 'Crisis in our Cities' (1965) setting the agenda for what would later be known as Social Ecology. Whilst using the anarchist critique of hierarchical power and the relationship between means and ends as a starting point.

Bookchin has developed a political perspective that has had a considerable impact upon, particularly, the North American green movement. His popularity amongst US and Canadian greens has been bolstered by his argument that the 'traditional' focus of revolutionary attention (whether Marxist, Anarcho-syndicalist or Anarchist Communist), the struggle of the working class, is no longer central to the revolutionary project. His belief that the key to social revolution lay in the development of oppositional lifestyles and the 'new' social movements (feminist, anti-nuclear, anti-racist etc.) has recently been revised to some extent. Social Ecological thought, which sees the potential for a liberatory technology (liberated from its present owners) in a future ecological libertarian society has come into conflict with another

Aims and Principles

1 The Anarchist Communist Federation is an organisation of revolutionary class struggle anarchists. We aim for the abolition of all hierarchy, and work for the creation of a world-wide classless society: anarchist communism.

2 Capitalism is based on the exploitation of the working class by the ruling class. But inequality and exploitation are also expressed in terms of race, gender, sexuality, health, ability and age, and in these ways one section of the working class oppresses another. This divides us, causing a lack of class unity in struggle that benefits the ruling class.

Oppressed groups are strengthened by autonomous action which challenges social and economic power relationships. To achieve our goal we must relinquish power over each other on a personal as well as political level.

3 We believe that fighting racism and sexism is as important as other aspects of the class struggle. Anarchist-communism cannot be achieved while sexism and racism still exist. In order to be effective in their struggle against their oppression both within society and within the working class, women and black people may at times need to organise independently. However, this should be as working class women and black people as cross-class movements hide real class differences and achieve little for them. Full emancipation cannot be achieved without the abolition of capitalism.

4 We are opposed to the ideology of national liberation movements which claims that there is some common interest between native bosses and the working class in face of foreign domination. We do support working class struggles against racism, genocide, ethnocide and political and economic colonialism. We oppose the creation of any new ruling class. We reject all forms of nationalism, as this only serves to redefine divisions in the international working class.

The working class has no country and national boundaries must be eliminated. We seek to build an anarchist international to work with other libertarian revolutionaries throughout the world.

5 As well as exploiting and oppressing the majority of people, Capitalism threatens the world through war and the destruction of the environment.

6 It is not possible to abolish Capitalism without a revolution, which will arise out of class conflict. The ruling class must be completely overthrown to achieve anarchist communism. Because the ruling class will not relinquish power without the use of armed force, this revolution will be a time of violence as well as liberation.

7 Unions by their very nature cannot become vehicles for the revolutionary transformation of society. They have to be accepted by capitalism in order to function and so cannot play a part on its overthrow. Trade unions divide the working class (between employed and unemployed, trade and craft, skilled and unskilled, etc.).

Even syndicalist unions are constrained by the fundamental nature of unionism. The union has to be able to control its membership in order to make deals with management. Their aim, through negotiation, is to achieve a fairer form of exploitation for the workforce.

The interests of leaders and representatives will always be different to ours. The boss class is our enemy, and while we must fight for better conditions from it, we have to realise that reforms we may achieve today may be taken away tomorrow.

Our ultimate aim must be the complete abolition of wage slavery. Working within the unions can never achieve this. However, we do not argue for people to leave unions until they are made irrelevant by the revolutionary event. The union is a common point of departure for many workers. Rank and file initiatives may strengthen us in the battle for anarchist-communism. What's important is that we organise ourselves collectively, arguing for workers to control struggles themselves.

8 Genuine liberation can only come about through the revolutionary self-activity of the working class on a mass scale. An anarchist communist society means not only co-operation between equals, but active involvement in the shaping and creating of that society during and after the revolution. In times of upheaval and struggle, people will need to create their own revolutionary organisations controlled by everyone in them. These autonomous organisations will be outside the control of political parties, and within them we will learn many important lessons of self-activity.

9 As anarchists we organise in all areas of life to try to advance the revolutionary process. We believe a strong anarchist organisation is necessary to help us to this end. Unlike other so-called socialists or communists we do not want power or control for our organisation.

We recognise that the revolution can only be carried out directly by the working class. However, the revolution must be preceded by organisations able to convince people of the anarchist communist alternative and method.

We participate in struggle as anarchist communists, and organise on a federative basis. We reject sectarianism and work for a united revolutionary anarchist movement.

Editorial

Labour's massive electoral victory points not to coming militancy in the workplace and on the streets in the immediate future, but to a period of quiet in which the new Labour government will be able to carry out attacks on the working class more easily than the Tories had done. They still have the backing of large sections of the boss class, are seen as "having a clear mandate", are still supported by large sections of the media and are establishing an increasingly authoritarian rule, both through government and inside their own party.

They are most likely to meet opposition from three main groups: the anti-roads movement, as Labour appears to be continuing with some of the Conservative road-building programme; from workers in education, in both schools and further education colleges where attacks on conditions and jobs will continue, and in the public sector generally, both as a result of wage freezes and the possible imposition of restraints on industrial action. The simmering discontent in the inner cities among the poor and unemployed may also be flashpoints in the near future.

As we have repeatedly said, the opportunities for the growth of revolutionary anarchism are the best for some considerable time. The disorientation and collapse of the Left, whether Labour Left, Trotskyist or Stalinist, and the increasing irrelevance of the Green Party, And yet among British revolutionary anarchists there is disorientation, a clinging to localism and indeed voluntary isolation among some. For our part, we will continue to argue for united activity and propaganda and greater co-ordination where possible, whilst remaining convinced of the need to create a mass movement for revolutionary change, alongside the creation of a specific anarchist communist organisation with a clear manifesto and programme.

New Labour-Same Old Danger!

They're having a laugh... at our expense!

THE LANDSLIDE LABOUR victory had the backing of large sections of the ruling class via the media, with the notable support of the Sun and the London Evening Standard. Indeed, the proprietor of that last newspaper, Lord Rothermere, whose two national dailies the Mail and the Telegraph continued support for the Tories signalled his approval by moving over to the Labour benches in the House of Lords. Explaining his move, Rothermere volunteered the information that Labour "were carrying out many of the policies I believe in". What he means is that Labour supports a pro-Europe line, as well as being favourable towards supporting small businesses, giving independence to the Bank of England and creating a regulatory body for financial services. Firming up this support for Labour, the Mail came out in praise of Blair and his Foreign Secretary the day after Rothermere's move to Labour benches.

This highlights the splits in ruling class ranks over Europe. Some continue to look towards anti-Europe positions and continued go-it-alone stances. This translates as close co-operation with the United States. However, whilst the USA administration is aware of the dangers of Europe as a rival power bloc, they are also fully conscious of the role the European Union can perform in policing the whole of Europe and pushing through austerity measures necessary for capitalism on a world scale. They would prefer to exercise their influence on the European bloc through their new ally in Britain, Tony Blair.

It is in this context that valuable support from sections of the boss class showed itself in increased financial support, media backing, and indeed in votes. Growing numbers of tax investment advisors, for example the firms of Arthur Andersen, Coopers and Lybrand, Binder Hamlyn, told investors that a Labour government might be good for their financial health. The increased support in the City for Labour had a knock-on effect as advice was handed on to stockholders and investors.

There are other reasons for such support besides a pro-Europe position from Labour. There is anxiety that the constitutional structure of Britain is creaking and antiquated and does not fully serve British capitalism's needs. There is fear over the break-up of the United Kingdom. There is an awareness that many people are disillusioned in Parliament and Democracy, particularly over the snowballing revelations of sleaze and corruption. It is felt by some in the British boss class that the Irish problem has to be resolved, and that a fix-up could not be effectively carried out by the Conservatives who were too much in pawn to the Unionists in Northern Ireland.

Streamline

Labour will move to streamline certain constitutional processes with the enthusiastic backing of liberals in the media and the intelligentsia organised through Charter 88. It will head off separation moves by nationalists with its sops of a Scottish referendum and devolution for Wales and Scotland. Through its well-publicised stands against sleaze and corruption it will hope to head off disillusion, even though its reputation for corruption in particular in municipal councils is notorious. With a massive majority it will be ruthless in driving through austerity programmes, cuts in jobs and welfare, continuing attacks on the health service and public transport, further bolstering of police powers. The Labour Party has actively sought the support of the police in its law and order campaigns. This will be eased by a majority that the Conservatives no longer had.

The unions of course will play their role in policing Labour's New Britain. Already John Monks, TUC general secretary, has met with Prime Minister Blair and talked about a "substantially changed mood in Whitehall". Another sign of better union-boss link-up was the planned visit of CBI director general Adair Turner to this year's TUC conference.

The vote in the general election itself has to be looked at. First of all, it has to be stated strongly that the Labour victory was not so much because of increased support for Labour, but because of an anti-Tory vote. There was a perception among many that the Conservatives must be voted out. This was a cross-class phenomenon, more noticeable among sections of the ruling class and "professionals" than among the working class. There were also many abstentions by many who had previously voted Conservative. On the other hand, in some working class areas, in particular in north east England, the number of abstentions shot up drastically.

Commentators in the bourgeois press recognised the anti-Tory, rather than pro-Labour significance of the vote. The turnout of voters for the election was a post-war low. It can be said that the election was notable for the high level of working class apathy and suspicion, and indeed hostility, among the working class, and the anti-Tory abstentions and tactical voting.

Cosmetic

Labour will carry out a number of cosmetic changes to give the illusion that it is a government of action, indeed that it is a government that is pro-working class. So we have an authorised investigation into the Gulf War syndrome, a moratorium on the closure of London hospitals for six months, various moves on the minimum wage etc. Within a short space of time these cosmetic changes will be eclipsed by the attacks that Labour is planning on us.

This should not be seen as a "crisis of expectations" scenario which many on the Left are putting forward. There are no heightened illusions in Labour soon to be disappointed leading to rising militancy. There are no expectations in Labour to carry out radical reforms in favour of the working class. The working class at the moment is in a period of profound defeat. Struggles will only happen when we fight back against planned attacks. At the moment the period of quiet, of class peace, can be seen as lasting a long time. The only signs of hope are to be seen in the action of BA workers and of continuing wildcats among postal workers. There will be a continuing and slowly increasing, we hope, guerrilla warfare of unofficial strikes, more and more outside the control of the unions. As regards activity on the environmental front, Labour may well make moves to buy off some of those involved with various sops, whilst some may be increasingly radicalised as they realise that the Labour agenda on the environment is not significantly different from that of the Tories.

ACF On Tour in Europe!

ACF COMRADES FROM London and Woking attended the large Euromarch on June 14th in Amsterdam. The organisers of the march -unemployed organisations, trade unions etc. with an input from Greens, Trotskyists and social-democrats- put forward reformist slogans around full employment and workers' rights, the protection of welfare provision, and talked about "basic human rights" and "the focus of a much wider campaign to stir the trade union movement in defence of the welfare state". Labour lefts like Benn backed the appeal. However, there was a large presence at the 80, 000 strong march, of anarchists and anarcho-syndicalists, all of whom attempted to get over an anti-capitalist and revolutionary message. ACFers were pleased to meet comrades of the Dutch ACF, who have translated many articles from Organise! into Dutch for their paper Woorden van rebellen. We marched with these comrades behind a banner we had brought from Britain and distributed a leaflet in English advancing a clear revolutionary message. There were sizeable contingents of Dutch, Danish and German autonomists whilst the spectacular resurgence of anarcho-syndicalism in Europe was witnessed by the seas of red and black flags in the contingents of the French CNT, the Spanish CGT,the Italian USI and the Swedish SAC, which numbered several thousands. Also present were Greek anarchists behind their black banner, as well as Belgian, German, Norwegian, Slovenian and Japanese anarchists.

Kinky sects

Whilst the European-wide continued presence of the Communist Parties, either in fundamentalist Stalinist mode, or mutated (see if you can tell the difference between us and social-democratic parties) mode was noticeable, the Trotskyists were strikingly thin on the ground, with only the French Ligue Communiste

Revolutionnaire showing any noticeable presence, with a sprinkling of Trots from various British sects. The French 'alternative' union structures, the SUD, organised outside the main union centrals, around railworkers, postal workers and those working in education, were also present, in paricular a sizeable railworkers contingent. The Belgian Renault workers in struggle against mass sackings also formed a large bloc. The Dutch police carried out a number of provocations during the event. At the Central Station they seized a red and black flag, saying it was "forbidden to be anarchist during the summit". When a bank's windows were smashed by autonomists in the demonstration, the police attacked. A little later, a well-organised provocation was carried out. An empty police van was left out in the path of the demonstration, whilst some police occupied a building nearby, training cameras on the van, whilst passing themselves off as demonstrators by waving flags and blowing whistles. Some autonomists in the crowd respond by overturning the van and were captured on camera. The police made several baton charges, concentrating on the heads of demonstrators. They blocked 3,000 Italians arriving at the Central station. The majority of these were not released until well after the demonstration had reached its final assembly point. 200 were arrested, handcuffed, held in a prison in Amsterdam and later that night returned in a train to Italy through Germany. This seems to have been a concerted action between German and Dutch police.

Joint Action

During demonstrations on the following three days the riot police made further baton charges. As a result of all these actions, as well as the police attack on the anarcho-punk Days of Chaos event on the Friday, 609 arrests were made. This does not include the Italian action. Few of these, it seems, have been charged. The severe security measures appear to have been thought out in advance, and the blanket arrest tactic used to paralyse actions, and to gather information on those arrested. This is a taste of what Europol plans for us in the future.

Whilst the ruling class is organising through the European Union to carry out attacks on us through sackings, cuts on welfare benefits and general austerity programmes, this demonstration was very important in that large numbers of anarchists marched together on a European level for the first time. It points towards the resurgence of anarchism in Europe and towards further joint actions.

AUSTRIAN STATE ATTACKS ANARCHISTS

ALL OVER EUROPE anarchists and other radical left activists are being persecuted and criminalized by state authorities. In countries like Germany this sort of repression already has traditional status (RAF, Revolutionäre Zellen, Bewegung 2. Juni, radikal...). Recently other countries started using invented criminal acts in order to shine through the anarchist movement and structures (Italy, Spain, Greece...), imprison comrades and intimidate others. What a lot of comrades don't know is the fact that such repression have also been going on in Austria for the last 2 years. Every day people without European Union passports are being expelled, every day left activists and projects get attacked by fascists and every day people get visted by the state police, just because they don't want to shut up and close their eyes to racist politics. In the following article I'll primary focus on the repressions against anarchist groups. We should nevertheless not forget the many arrests during demonstrations or the many interrogations through state authorities.

The recent repressions started in April 1995, just after the two comrades Gregor Thaler and Peter Koniczek were found dead under an electric mast. The investigating police proclaim that they tried to fix an explosive charge onto this mast in order to bomb it away. The state uses this act to shine through the Austrian radical left movement, and summons about 200 activists.In the early morning hours of January 23 1996 two private rooms of supposed activists of the anarchist group Revolutionsbräuhof (RBH) were searched through, as well the Anarchistische Buchhandlung (anarchist bookshop) and an office of a communist group (that was used as post address by the RBH some years ago). The state authorities reproaches the RBH for having published an invitation to violent and criminal acts (§277), degradation of the Austrian Republic and its symbols (§282), the foundation of a criminal organisation (§278, §278a) and finally hostility against the state and its constitution (§246)[i]. Cause are sticky labels that only appeared in one place: the popular bourgeois Krone Zeitung (some sort of Austrian version of the Sun) in May 1995. Even though it was very obvious that these stickers are an invention of the Kronen Zeitung, the investigating police didn't interrogate the responsible journalist until January 1996. The author of these stickers Gerhard Walter is no unknown person. He has written articles in the journal of the right-wing police union AUF[ii]. Walter never really denied that these stickers were a falsification. Nevertheless these known facts, the judges Christiane Moser and Birgit Kail signed the raid orders in December 1995, which then took place on January 23 1996.

This was not the end of the repressions against the RBH. On February 23 1996 17 people were invited to interrogations bythe state police. Some days later, on March 17 1996 19 houses/flats were searched through by the state police and a lot of material (computers, discs, books, journals, letters...) were, as on January 23 confiscated (only in June 1996 was most of the confiscated material re-addressed to the owners). The public prosecutor doesn't allow any insight into the documents of the investigation, which normally is a common right you have, when you are being accused of a crime. On March 15 1996 only limited insight is allowed. As the state authorities claim that the investigation are still going in. So the activists of the RBH and all the other accused just don't know why they are being persecuted and what they are accused of. In December 1996 the activists finally got a more than thousand pages thick document about the investigations, which in the end proves nothing new and so the accused activists are as informed as in the beginning. It is meanwhile quite clear, that these whole accusations are just used in order to shine though the anarchist movement, intimidate activists and diminish our solidarity within the movement. It is also clear that these whole investigations are made by some FPÖ-near politicians, judges and police officers. So if one day Haider and his FPÖ would get to the majority of the votes, they

Lorenzo Kom'boa Ervin talks to Organise! about Black Autonomy

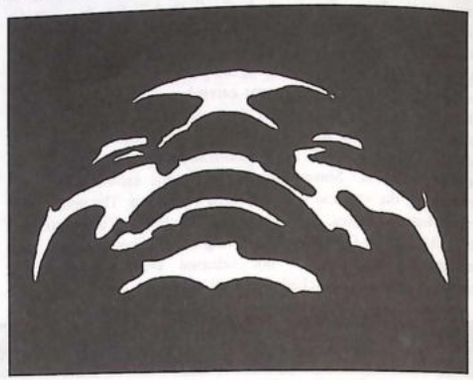
LORENZO KOM'BOA ERVIN was a former Black Panther who fled to Cuba in 1969 after an FBI shoot to kill order was issued on him. Later arrested and imprisoned he was released in 1983 after serving 15 years for hijacking the plane he escaped from the USA in. Whilst inside he continued the struggle, acting as a jailhouse lawyer and prison unionist and developing his political philosophy. Author of Anarchism and the Black Revolution, Lorenzo spoke to Organise! during his speaking tour of Britain in May. For reasons of space, this interview has been edited. A full transcript can be obtained by writing to Newcastle ACF(See inside back page for address).



Organise!: On this tour you have stated that the working class has changed and is changing, and consequently, our approach as revolutionaries must change to take account of this. Can you explain what you mean?

Lorenzo: The working class in the United States, in the United Kingdom and in most parts of the western world, with the influx of other peoples of colour into these countries in considerable numbers, make up considerable minorities and are a considerable part of the labour force. But you can't pretend that this is a period like sixty or seventy years ago with an industrial base and where most of the workers were white, which was true then. Things have changed now over the last twenty or so years, but yet some so-called revolutionary movements persist and keep posturing and saying that the work force is white and that other people should just follow along with their bags in tow behind these white workers, which in fact represents the aristocracy of labour in the sense that they have certainly more resources and certainly a better quality of life than a lot of other labourers of colour have. So from that standpoint, it would be fair to say that the nature of the workforce has changed; there are more women, more Blacks and Asians, in the US and the UK, so we can't keep building movements based on old dead ideology of the white industrial worker and "the worker" as vanguard.

Organise!: So what do you see as the role of the revolutionary movement?

Lorenzo: Well I think the role of the revolutionary movement is still in workplace organising, but I also think, in community organisation. In fact in my mind, the role of community organising is primary, in that the cities, where so many of these workers are concentrated, has become the new battleground in terms of destabilising the government. We don't have massive workplaces anymore, for the most part, which is not to say that they don't exist at all. So what we're talking about is building neighbourhood and community alliances, for instance workers in the community, other people in the community and with peoples of colour, which for me is all important. you have to breakdown racism in the society…racism is not just sentimental, by that I mean it isn't just some idea or deliberate policy. So whatever analysis we make has got to take into account the importance of combatting racism NOT as some kind of thing that we do for altruistic purposes, but because we'll never be able to defeat capitalism in and of itself without dealing with the fact that it uses divisions in the working class.

Organise!: Some revolutionaries would argue that although they base the struggle around the workplace, they also look to organise in the community as well. What would you say to that?

Lorenzo: Well, the syndicalists first of all say that the workplace is the primary place of struggle, and to me they make an out-moded analysis of what even constitutes the working class, in that in their mind there's the idea that somehow the unions are progressive, and what's more the unions are some kind of force that can be revolutionised. Clearly these unions are something that's based IN capitalism. They cannot be a progressive force in the next period. They will have to be destroyed. They are no more than instruments for defensive struggles for workers to get better wages and that sort of thing. They are not in any way, shape or form a revolutionary vehicle themselves, and in this period they don't even constitute anything progressive. They, in fact, are selling workers out routinely and they are not going to be reformed. In my estimation, they're not going to be revolutionised, and in any case they can't be.

Organise!: There's some misunderstanding about why you advocate the formation of autonomous Black community groupings. Can you explain this and how you see these struggles uniting?

Lorenzo: I have been attacked because people think I'm advocating some kind of separatism. Let me just point this out: Black Autonomy (the journal which Lorenzo founded ed. note) has no such philosophy of xenophobia. It's not against white people and there is no philosophy about a so-called black state or any other state. It has no conception that there cannot be class unity. In fact we work with a number of white formations of anarchists and so forth. But the reality is, to create class unity, you've got to have a period of time, especially when there's racism there's mistrust which has gone on for years and years. You've got to BUILD this class unity. It's not going to fall out of the sky…you can't make people come together in bogus alliances. There has to be a principled way of doing it and the principled way of doing it is when people struggle around issues of common concern. Now there are issues that affect the Black community which don't affect white workers as a whole, who don't understand them and may even be in opposition to them. We have to create those movements that are autonomous in the communities, whether anti-racist, anti-nazi or whatever it is. In my estimation there is nothing threatening in that at all for white people, I don't understand what that's supposed to be. They've attempted to characterise all Black movements, even anarchist movements as somehow harmful to working class unity. We feel that one of the preconditions for working class unity is that there be autonomous struggles of historical groups that have been oppressed. There is no doubt in our minds that there are forms of special oppression of groups such as Blacks. Whites are not subjected to this "last hired, first fired" thing and that whole history of racism in the workforce itself. And to pretend that none of this took place, or none of this has any importance in the construction of a revolutionary ideology to me is the worst kind of betrayal and sell out, and it is dogma.

The purpose of coming to the UK was to raise some of these questions with radicals in our scene, and finding new ideas, and finding out who has new ideas and who is non-dogmatic, who is trying to see a way forward. This period has changed and fundamentally altered so many things that we took for granted. It has to force us to reassess what is the working class, what is work, in the face of millions of workers being out of work permanently, in the face of workers being brought here who have no means of employment. There's immigrants and refugees who are being brought here who cannot get a job. What is work to them? How do they feel that they should belong in the British trade unions? There's workers who aren't organised and unions who only care about 'their' privileged workers. How do we deal with that? Do we pretend that these things don't matter?

THE INFORMATION REVOLUTION AND THE CLASS STRUGGLE

"Hey, wow! Trevor's found a way to trainspot on the Internet…"

THE 'INFORMATION REVOLUTION' of computerisation and miniaturisation during the past twenty years has created an 'Information Society'- or so it is said. How real has this 'revolution' been? Has it fundamentally altered relations between the ruling class and the working-class?

The phenomenon can be seen from two main angles. One concerns the technological development of the microchip. The microchip not only offered enough memory and processing power to make the home computer possible, it has come to pervade all kinds of devices like washing machines and cameras. Similarly, it has underpinned a massive and continuing wave of automation in the workplace. Information in this context is the stream of data required by a machine to perform with the minimum of human intervention; the revolution is this drive to reduce the human input.

Both in the home and the workplace new technology has been portrayed as labour-saving, freeing a person for more interesting tasks. But whereas companies seek to fill the extra leisure time with increased consumption of CDs, computer games, etc., the labour saved at work is in a economic sense. Through Information Technology (IT), firms can 'downsize' i.e. sack or retire employees and increase profits by extracting the same or more work from fewer staff. The process of creating the information economy, on which the information society rests, has been seen in sectors as diverse as printing, car-manufacturing, where robots are increasingly employed and banking.

The other aspect of the 'revolution' concerns information itself. 'Information' may be seen as facts or knowledge, such as share prices in foreign markets, but it may equally be entertainment. This is because the means are increasingly being found to digitise data, and data can be text, sounds, images or any combination. Here the revolution primarily concerns the means of delivery and access, rather than the content itself, which has often existed in a prior form, thus books preceded CD-ROMs. The difference with these later developments is usually one of flexibility or interactivity given to the user, e.g. being able to search a CD-ROM by any word the user wishes rather than a book's fixed index. In another area, satellite TV, linked with digital techniques, is opening up the prospect in Britain of over two hundred channels.

With the resultant smokescreen about choice, interactivity and 'video on demand', important issues are being obscured. Yet, if anything, power, wealth, cultural, political influence, and matters of class, are magnified by the 'Information Revolution'.

Ultimate Agenda

The trail almost invariably leads back to a small clutch of media magnates such as Rupert Murdoch, Silivio Berlusconi, Disney and Time-Warner. These have diversified amongst the fields of publishing, films, radio, TV, CD-ROMs and on-line databases. What their film and TV arms provide is a choice from the least challenging end of the spectrum: action films, light comedies, sport. Where political opinions are expressed, as in their newspapers, these tend to be of the most orthodox pro-capitalist promoting their own ultimate agenda: the increase of profits and market share. Having built up vast markets they thus have maximum influence with the distributors of such products, who are also few in number. The quantity of producers may be vast, but their underlying ideas and values are few. This media environment increasingly saturates the world.

All of this has important psychological consequences for the class struggle, as many people are left unaware of the potential alternative to 'business as usual'. If radicals' views and actions are ever reported, it will usually be either to demonise or mock. This in itself promotes resignation rather than resistance amongst those who might be feeling their way towards such positions. This is not to say that people do not fight back against their oppression anyway, but it is hardly coincidental that struggles are so often either isolated or channelled into the pathways of union and political party action. The information that would help avoid these traps, based on hard-earned experiences, is not widely and easily available. Establishment views, including what passes for opposition, are. Yet it is greater access to information which is said to be the essence of this revolution. In reality, though there is more information about than ever before, whether business statistics, news, education or entertainment, much of it is more of what we are accustomed to expect in a wider range of media.

The possible exception to this picture is the Internet. The connection effected between thousands of personal and institutional computers has produced something significantly different to the media discussed above, both in terms of the degree of individual involvement and the content of the communications. Many radical and revolutionary publishers and organisations have World Wide Web sites. Particularly in the case of campaigning groups e.g. prisoner support, news can be spread quickly to produce a prompt response.

In addition, much information is intentionally placed on the Internet to be read or downloaded without charge or as shareware. There is an implicit challenge to capitalist notions of exchange and ownership. The fierceness with which the US has pursued the issue of strictly enforced intellectual property rights i.e. copyright and patents, for example in the last GATT negotiations, illustrates the rising profile of this issue and the anxiety felt by the ruling class. Capital is increasingly seen as locked into information-based products. This is not just facts and figures or music but also applies to things like the make-up of genetically-engineered food. For if information such as a patent can simply be copied to a disk in a few minutes, what price ownership of knowledge?

American Views

However, there are problems with the Internet, showing that it is not the totally new community of which some dream. There is the expense of getting, and staying, on-line. Though the costs of the hardware are coming down, most people still do not possess it. This equipment, and the telephone systems supporting it, are even more lacking in poorer parts of the world. Parallel to this is the fact that much material on the Net stems from the West, especially America, and, as business interest grows, it is further skewed towards becoming a marketplace of mainly American views and products. Having begun from a government-funded and academic base, growing commercial involvement threatens to make more and more information only accessible via a 'pay as you go' route. Many theorists now speak of the distinction between the information rich and the information poor. As with the companies advancing into the new media, this reproduces class distinctions that already exist in wealth, education etc.

Governments and police forces have for some time been seeking to monitor the Internet's content and transactions more closely. In America this brought about the 1996 Internet Decency Act and several attempts at the 'Clipper Chip', a 'key' which would give agencies like the FBI access to coded data transmissions. A strange coalition of civil libertarians and businessmen who for very different reasons united on the issue of privacy, has so far scuppered the Clipper. Similarly in Britain, the 1994 Criminal Justice Act defines the transmission of electronic data as publication, making it liable to laws on obscenity and official secrets. There have also been moves to make Internet Service Providers (the firms that connect users) legally responsible for all the material they convey. These measures have produced strong opposition. But the point here is that the authorities are determined to take cyberspace into their jurisdiction.

Finally there is the question of class within the computing world. The previously noted cost of ownership is worsened by the refinements and new programs that are continually being introduced. This reliance on built-in obsolescence is but one example of traditional capitalist thinking: wasteful of resources but it boosts up those profits. Bill Gates, founder of the software company Microsoft, has, in twenty years, become one of the richest people on the planet. In January 1997 he owned 141 million shares valued at $83.37 each, from which in 1996 he was thus 'earning' $30 million daily. For all the rhetorical praise of free competition that the computer industry shares with the rest of capitalism, Gates' fortune flows from Microsoft having engineered deals so as to make its software the standard for the world's personal computers: in other words, through a quest for monopoly.

'Revolution'

Companies like Microsoft and Apple make much of their relaxed working approach, in contrast to the straight-laced corporate men of IBM before them. However, hierarchy still persists, from the entrepreneurial founders, through the programmers and engineers and down to the assemblers of silicon chips. California's Silicon Valley workers suffer more occupational illness than in general manufacturing. And clearly, Bill Gate's, salary and those of his peers is vastly more than that of the workers upon whom their fortunes are built. But though issues from which struggles might come are present, workers in the computer industry, and indeed all jobs that involve IT, are perhaps extra vulnerable to management's demands. This is because of the ease with which their work can be monitored e.g. number of key-strokes per hour, and switched to another part of the country or the world where lower wages are paid to equally skilled workers.

It would be ridiculous to claim that there have not been many changes in the past twenty years in the ways in which we perceive and receive information. It comes more quickly, in more forms, to more people than ever before. But its' production, distribution and consumption have been based on already existing hierarchies. It is a 'revolution' only in a loose capitalist sense.

CRIMINALISATION OF THE WORKING CLASS

ARE WE CRIMINALS ? Are you ? The rhetoric of the ruling class, their servants and apologists certainly suggests we are criminals and that we are to blame for everything wrong in the world. This is a song the capitalists never get tired of singing: there's something wrong with the working class !

Criminalisation of the working class is a set of policies applied more or less severely depending on the rough balance of power between the twin poles of bourgeois democracy: conservative, reactionary, statist on the one-hand, do-gooding, moralising, populist on the other. It is something that is always with us. It is also a future history becoming all too horribly real - why ? ' Law and Order' usually plays a big part in elections but didn't in May - why not ? The reason is that Labour and the Tories agree on both the causes of criminality and its 'cure' - the inadequacy of the working class as parents and draconian assaults on individual 'criminals' publicly celebrated as a means to cow and intimidate the rest of the sheep. Criminality is seen as a working class disease. Its cause, basically poor and uneducated people, must be caught and shot with the 'magic bullet' of prison and punitive sentencing or isolated by public humiliation, electronic tagging, injunctions and permanent branding, for instance through publicly-available registers of sex-offenders which invite vigilantism and mob justice.

Campaign

The process of criminalisation is not new. When we read about the 'sturdy beggars' of Elizabethan times, debtors prisons or the pariah status of the 'undeserving poor' we hear echoes of a long campaign to maximise the power of the ruling class by dividing and stigmatising those who are ruled.

We are criminalised in three main ways. Firstly, the state invents a vast range of offences, usually based on the desire to protect property and control working class collective action and violence. It defines these as 'criminal', unacceptable in a 'civilised' society. In contrast, upper class offences like fraud, tax evasion or corruption are treated as individual falls from grace, exceptions to the rule deserving lenient treatment and sympathy. Working class 'crime' such as shoplifting or benefit fraud was seen this way in the 60s and 70s but the right-wing dominance of politics has swept belief in the idea of the working class as victims of an unequal society away; crime has become simply a symptom of wholesale working class degeneracy. Sections of the populace who have never committed a crime can now be treated as if they had. One of the sickest outcomes of such beliefs was the forced sterilisation and incarceration of 3000 children accused of being 'mentally defective', 'sexually immoral' or 'incapable of intelligent parenthood' (does this ring any bells ?) in Canada in the 1950s and 1960s. Tory politicians are proposing that children be tried in adult courts. Michael Howard proposed that the parents of children who have not committed crimes but were merely in danger of committing crimes should be fined or suffer curfews enforced by electronic tagging if they fail or are unable to obey 'parental control orders'.

Stigmatised

Secondly, the working class is stigmatised as criminal or potentially criminal on the basis of a few sensationalised cases. This allows the State to concoct laws which bear down most on the working class and to justify a presumption of guilt by police and courts which is parroted by the media and picked up by reactionary groups who then threaten violence, demand the 'criminal' be evicted from their homes or hurl abuse and worse. This treatment is not now reserved for the 'worst' criminals (like sex offenders) but increasingly directed at anyone who fails to adhere to the new right-wing code of conduct (for instance parents who cannot 'control' their children in East Sussex or on the Meadowell Estate). Being black, a lone parent, living on a ghetto estate, being young or unemployed, all are being portrayed as criminals who haven't been caught or parents of a new generation of the lawless. Actions and conditions previously seen as social problems are being criminalised. Benefit fraud and immigration officials are joining police stop-checks ostensibly to catch rogue lorry drivers or unsafe vehicles. They treat everyone like criminals and actively gather information on other people whose names are then run through computers. One-third of Britain receives some form of means-tested benefit and all are potential criminals in the eyes of the State. If you are treated like a criminal it is because the State thinks you are a criminal. This allows people who have committed no crime to be penned up in detention centres or manacled while on remand, even if they are dying, as happened in one recent case. These are merely the worst aspects of the drive to socially control behaviour and criminalise those who resist - parent-school contracts, compulsory parenting classes for dysfunctional families, probationary tenancies in council housing, curfews to keep young people indoors. In America law enforcement is increasingly resorting to 'shaming sentences' where the guilty must take out newspaper ads or erect signs outside their houses publicly proclaiming their crime.

Reactionary

Thirdly, any demand for change or resistance to this political program is itself criminalised through reactionary laws. As the area of freedom gets smaller we are increasingly criminalised. 18th Century rationalists campaigned for a universal code of justice which abstractly judged all actions. What they failed to realise was that the State will always develop codes of justice that serve its interests and that in a parliamentary dictatorship like Britain all actions will be legalised or criminalised at the whim of the ruling class. Things like the Criminal Justice Act and the massive expansion of the 'Surveillance Society' threaten to make guilt by accusation and association the norm. Demonstrations are photographed, city centres filmed, unmarked police vans with infra-red cameras prowl night-time streets, benefit hotlines receive thousands of malicious, unsubstantiated accusations every day. We are increasingly patrolled and controlled, seen as dangerous or potential criminals. Against this threat (a threat wholly concocted by the ruling class to justify a police state), any repressive measure is justified.

The election of a Labour Government is unlikely to slow this process and may even accelerate it. The massive majority was won by votes from Middle England, people who are basically conservative, well-off, in secure jobs who simply got tired of the Tories and voted instead for a different 'Tory' party - Labour. MPs representing the clean streets and shopping centres of the south are likely to parrot the prejudices of their constituents, not fight for social justice.

Tide

In such a situation, with a right-wing political tide running so strongly, it is difficult to see what can be done. Around the world, though, there are examples of people successfully challenging injustice. The landless peasants of the Sem Terra movement in Brazil are occupying unused land and forcing the Government to award it to them. French workers have forced the government to retreat on Thatcherite austerity policies. South Korean workers paralysed the country protesting against attacks on labour rights.

Cultural of resistance

All these campaigns have a number of things in common. Firstly, they successfully universalise their action so that all sections of the working class can understand and agree with what they are fighting for. Secondly, they all involve determined mass action which ignores rules and laws designed to curb protest. Thirdly there are very high levels of solidarity inside the campaigns and a willingness to accept the support of and draw into the struggle other groups - this only comes about by extensive political education, grass-roots control and consensus not command politics. If we are to successfully challenge the process of criminalisation, we must do the same. We must develop a culture of resistance which understands that the State's attacks may appear to be aimed at particular groups but are in fact part of a broader process of wholesale criminalisation, isolation and control. Work on estates, determined campaigns against attacks on the working class, taking our ideas into new arenas, strengthening and renewing the belief in mass action - these are our urgent tasks.

The Union Makes Us Strong?

SYNDICALISM: A CRITICAL ANALYSIS

THE ACF HAS never, despite what some of our critics may have suggested, made our criticisms of syndicalism, including its anarcho variety, a "distinguishing characteristic" (see Black Flag Issue 211) of our politics. In a world-wide 'labour movement' dominated by social democratic ideas and practice and thoroughly integrated into capitalism, our focus of attack has not been on the relatively tiny syndicalist and 'alternative' union structures which exist. Rather, our arguments have been against trade unionism and for working class self-organised struggle.

However, anarcho-syndicalism remains the majority current within class struggle anarchism and is, despite various splits and feuds within its international organisations, in a state of resurgence. Now, therefore, is a good time to present a critical analysis of the theory and practice of syndicalism.

Theory and practice

Rather than separate theory and practice we will attempt to show how the behaviour of various syndicalist movements has been informed by its theoretical foundations and the political influences acting upon it. Syndicalism has been accused of 'apoliticism' and, indeed, a certain anti-politicicism has been a central feature of many syndicalist organisations. This is only half the story, however, and fails to take into consideration the fact that syndicalism has come under the influence of many political currents, not least anarchism, and that it should not be forgotten that these have included reformist socialism (particularly the French CGT), nationalism (notably the Italian UIL) and even monarchism (monarcho-syndicalism in turn of the century France)!

Origins

First we must look at the origins of syndicalism. "Syndicalism" is simply the French word for "unionism". It was the mass syndicat (or union) in France, the Confederation Generale du Travail (CGT), founded in 1895, which gave "syndicalism" the meaning it has today. The CGT was militant, de-centralised, initially sceptical of parliamentary participation and considered the workplace as the front-line of the class war. When such tactics developed in other countries, militants consciously used the term syndicalism to differentiate themselves from the openly reformist, social democratic Trade Unions. Syndicalist unions began to become a significant factor in the decade before the First World War, as both a reflection of the ongoing class struggle and as the result of the efforts of consciously 'political' minorities critical of 'socialist' parliamentarism. The early syndicalist movement was far from homogenous, politically or organisationally. In many countries the syndicalist movement developed through deliberate attempts to organise those workers who had been ignored by the established social democratic unions, particularly the unskilled and immigrant workforces (the experience of the Industrial Workers of the World is a good example of this), whilst in other countries, syndicalist unions were craft or trade based and organised highly skilled artisans (e.g. the CGT in France).

Political minorities

Amongst the political minorities attracted to the syndicalist method were the anarchists. Indeed, anarchists were amongst the earliest syndicalist organisers in many countries, notably in France, Spain and Argentina. The syndicalist movement was certainly attractive to many anarchists who, having seen their influence wane following the period of "propaganda by the deed" (the 1890s), saw in syndicalism's combativity and distrust of parliamentary methods a 'natural' home for their politics. In some countries syndicalist unions were led by ideological anarchists and everywhere anarchist militants joined syndicalist organisations. Some anarchists, however, were uneasy about the identification of anarchism with unionism. Others questioned the syndicalist method itself. In Spain, where anarchism was to become closely identified with the syndicalist Confederacion Nacional de Trabajo (CNT), often furious polemics ensued throughout the 1890s and 1910s between those anarchists, such as the anarchist communists grouped around the Tierra y Libertad journal, who felt the syndicalist methods were inherently reformist and a step backwards and those who believed that syndicalism offered anarchism a vehicle for reaching the masses.

Degeneration

Amongst the clearest critics of the identification of anarchism with syndicalism was the Italian anarchist Errico Malatesta. In 1907, when syndicalism was drawing ever larger numbers of workers, including anarchist workers, to its ranks, Malatesta argued that, "Syndicalism, in spite of the declarations of its most ardent partisans, contains, by the very nature of its constitution, all the elements of degeneration which have corrupted the workers' movement in the past. In fact, being a movement which proposes to defend the present interests of the workers, it must necessarily adapt itself to the living conditions of the present" (Les Temps Nouveaux, 1907). Other anarchist militants held strong reservations about the syndicalist method.

The French anarchist metalworker Benoit Liothier expressed the fear, held by many, that syndicalism would tend to economism and therefore to reformism. "Syndicalism cannot be revolutionary if it cannot be political...whether we like it or not the economic struggle is tied to the political struggle." (Archives Departmentales de la Loire, 1914). Like many anarchists of his generation, however, Liothier eventually became a militant of the CGT.

That anarchists identified with syndicalism and were often at the forefront of syndicalist organisation is of little surprise. Emergent syndicalism appeared to offer tactics which related libertarian, direct-action orientated ideas to the every day struggle of the workers. Anarchist workers wanted to be where the conflict with the bosses (and, therefore, the state) was at its most acute and for anarchists to have dismissed syndicalism at this historical point would undoubtedly have marginalised them further. For many anarchists the solution to any perceived problems within syndicalism could be solved by encouraging its tendency towards anti-politicism and its combative spirit. This meant a total engagement with syndicalist unionism and the birth of anarcho-syndicalism. Many of these people were dismissive of the idea of creating separate anarchist organisations and saw in the union the means and the end of the anarchist revolution.

Against this 'fusion' some anarchists argued for the maintenance of separate anarchist organisations which would be active both inside and outside the unions. Malatesta, amongst others, advocated such a tactic, as did the anarchists who became known as "Platformists" during the 1920s. A fear, which was well founded, was that anarcho-syndicalism would become dominated by the syndicalist part of the equation to the detriment of a clear revolutionary perspective which related to all aspects of working class life, not just the factory or workshop.

Anarcho- and revolutionary syndicalism

The relationship between the anarcho-syndicalists and the 'revolutionary' syndicalists varied from country to country. Many 'revolutionary' syndicalists rejected even the 'anti-political' politics of the anarchists and saw in syndicalism the form and the content of revolution. They created a syndicalist ideology, at the pinnacle of which was the union organised General Strike which would usher in the new society. For some syndicalists the General Strike assumed an almost mythical significance and replaced the idea of violent revolution, which was considered unrealistic. For 'revolutionary' syndicalist ideologues the union replaced the party and was identified with the class as a whole. A desire to organise all workers, regardless of political or religious belief, led to 'revolutionary' syndicalists attempting to marginalise anarcho-syndicalists in order to appeal to workers who actually remained tied to social democracy.

Whilst this anti-politicism led many of the 'revolutionary' syndicalists to a pronounced anti-statism, it did not stop others from entering into alliances with 'revolutionary' parties and politicians. Although politics were unwelcome in the syndical organisation itself this did not mean that 'revolutionary' syndicalism was not involved in politics.

Whilst the Italian 'revolutionary' syndicalists flirting with extreme nationalism from 1914 onwards, demanding that Italy join the imperialist bloodbath (a demand totally opposed, to their great credit, by the anarcho-syndicalists of the Union Sindicale Italiana) is probably the most graphic example of syndicalist political alliances, many others existed.

In Norway the pre-war 'revolutionary' syndicalist "fagopposition" (union opposition), for example, was closely identified with the left wing of social democracy whilst in the United States the industrial unionist (the North American equivalent of syndicalist) Industrial Workers of the World were for the first three years of their existence (1905-1908) riven with open political rivalry between the Socialist Party of America and the Socialist Labour Party. In Ireland the syndicalistic Irish Transport and General Workers Union was led by people who had been or still were active members of socialist parties and Irish syndicalism, despite its militancy, rarely exhibited the anti-statism and anti-party sentiment of other syndicalist movements.

Often 'revolutionary' syndicalists appeared to be simply impatient with the stodgy Second International version of socialism that dominated the Left and were not against 'revolutionary parties' per se. The mass defection of 'revolutionary' syndicalists to Bolshevism in the period immediately following the Russian Revolution bears witness to this. Collaboration with the bourgeoisie was not confined to the nominally apolitical 'revolutionary' wing of syndicalism, however. An interesting example of anarcho-syndicalism being found on the wrong side of the class barricade, twenty years before the infamous CNT involvement in the Spanish government, is the experience of Mexico.

The Mexican Revolution - the Casa del Obrero Mundial

During the first twenty years of the 20th century Mexico was engulfed in revolutionary turmoil. Various 'constitutionalist' (i.e. democratic) capitalist factions vied for power whilst attempting to overthrow the dictatorship of General Porfirio Diaz . Meanwhile the Agrarian (landless peasant) movement of Emiliano Zapata and the emerging urban working class attempted to defend their own interests amidst the chaos. The Agrarians engaged in guerrilla activity against the various 'revolutionary' governments with the aim of reclaiming and defending the land of the indigenous population from the landowners. During the years 1906 to 1915 the Partido Liberal Mexicano (P.L.M.) played a leading in role in attempting to bring together Agrarian and proletarian revolt. Beginning from an advanced left liberal-democratic position the P.L.M., under the influence of the Magon brothers, developed into an anarchist communist organisation with its own guerrilla units involved in the expropriation of land in the Baja California region and leading strikes in Veracruz, amongst other areas. The P.L.M. called for "Tierra y Libertad" (Land and Freedom), the immediate expropriation of the landlords and bosses and the abolition of the state.

Red Battalions

In 1912 the anarcho-syndicalist Casa del Obrero Mundial (House of the World Worker) was formed and rapidly attracted the urban workers of Mexico City to its ranks. Yet, within three years the anarcho-syndicalists were organising Red Battalions to fight in defence of the Mexican state! Although the Casa emerged with a typical anti-politicism and a desire to concentrate on economic struggle several factors led it to give support to one bourgeois faction, the Constitutionalist forces of Venustiano Carranza, against the Agrarians and their P.L.M. allies. Firstly, the anarcho-syndicalists viewed the industrial proletariat as the organised vanguard of the social revolution, in spite of the fact that they constituted a tiny minority of the Mexican working population. This vanguard, they argued, had to be developed and expanded as rapidly as possible and the anarcho-syndicalists sought what they hoped would be the best conditions for this. Secondly, the anarcho-syndicalists considered the Agrarian movement as an essentially reactionary one, committed to turning back the clock, and rejecting the 'advances' in technology and understanding that capitalism had brought. They pointed to the Zapatista's "religiosity" and general 'backwardness' as proof of their danger to the 'advanced' sections of the working class. Finally, and most importantly, the anarcho-syndicalists believed that the progressive, democratic bourgeois state which was offering the Casa freedom to organise (and in fact was actually encouraging the Casa to organise!) should be defended against 'reaction', Agrarianist or anti-constitutionalist.

After the anarcho-syndicalist Red Battalions had played their part in 'saving' the Mexican state, the inevitable happened. In the spring of 1916 the Constitutionalist government turned on the Casa, disbanded the Red Battallions and forcibly closed down the syndicates following the second of two General Strikes that year. The failure of the anarcho-syndicalists to recognise the class nature of the state, despite all their verbal anti-statism, had led them to take sides against genuinely revolutionary movements.

Bolshevisation and "the end of the mass syndicalism"

Without doubt the high-point of syndicalism was the period between (roughly) 1895 and 1914. In this period the only current, in the workers movement on an international level, to offer an alternative to mainstream social democracy was syndicalism It is of course possible to argue that much of syndicalism was in fact social democratic in content if not in form.

However, despite Leninist claims to the contrary, this was far from the end of the story and the revolutionary wave which engulfed the world following the 1917 Russian Revolution also saw a 'revival' of syndicalism following the four years of world war. Syndicalism now, however, had two new rivals, Bolshevism and council or left communism.

Bolshevism's triumph in Russia sent shock waves throughout the workers movement. Social Democratic parties everywhere developed would-be Bolshevik factions. These factions sooner or later split from the old parties and formed Communist Parties modelled on the Russian example. Many of the very earliest Communist Parties, however, emerged from the syndicalist, anarcho-syndicalist and anarchist movements. The CGT in France developed a powerful communist-syndicalist faction; the IWW in the United States was wracked by in-fighting between dyed-in-the-wool industrial unionists and budding Bolsheviks; many of Britain's foremost pre-war syndicalists such as Tom Mann quickly gravitated towards the embryonic Communist Party. Impressed by the dynamism of Bolshevism and its ostensible break with social democracy, former syndicalists constituted the early rank and file of such parties everywhere. Amongst anarchists also, Bolshevism possessed a magnet-like quality, not least because it was associated with the Soviets, the council organisations which seemed to offer an alternative to state organisation.

The Workers Councils

When news came through that everything in the Socialist Fatherland was not rosy and as Bolshevism attempted to create both a Third International of political parties and a Red Trade Union International under their strict control, dissension began to emerge. Many of the earliest critics of Moscow were not syndicalists however but Marxists previously involved with socialist political parties. These militants began to question the Trade Union and Parliamentary policy of the Bolsheviks and their closest impersonators. Groups such as the Workers Socialist Federation in Britain, the Communist Workers Party of Germany and similar 'left' communists (meaning 'left' of the Third International) saw in the experience of the revolutionary workers councils (or Soviets) in Russia in 1917 and Germany in 1919 the form, as they saw it, that the new struggles would take. After coming out against the Bolsheviks and attempting to create their own International in 1921 (the original 4th International!) this political current became known as council communism. Council communist organisations only took anything approaching mass form in Germany although they also existed in countries such as Holland, France, Belgium and Britain.

At the same time the international syndicalist movement began to re-organise itself through the creation of the I.W.A.(International Working Mens' Association). In 1922 the syndicalist movement could still claim large unions such as the Unione Sindicale Italiana (500,000 members), the Confederacao Geral do Trabalho in Portugal (150,000) and the Freie Arbeiter Union in Germany (120,000). They were joined by the Spanish Confederacion Nacional de Trabajo (CNT) in 1923. By 1923, however, the Leninist/Stalinist ice-age was beginning and between that and the emergence of fascism, syndicalism was facing a difficult period, to say the least. Within 10 years the only mass syndicalist union left was the CNT. The others were now reduced to groups of militants scattered in exile or living in a semi-underground condition. By 1936 all that was left were small propaganda groups in various countries, a few minority unions and the 2 million strong CNT about to play a historic role in the Spanish Civil War and Revolution.

Polish Anti-Fascists

THE TRIAL OF 13 people in Poland for the killing of a fascist in self-defence (as reported in Organise! 45) has taken place. The result was that 8 were freed, and 5 were convicted. They are planning to appeal against their sentences, and are therefore requesting financial support to help pay for this. They also need money as they all have large fines to pay.

Send messages of support to the 5:

Ben Alterman

Following his 34 day hunger strike last year (see Organise! 44) which resulted in the Office of Corrections admitting that they were wrong to withhold his mail and that it wouldn't happen again, Ben was surprised to find himself being granted parole on February 18th this year by the Victoria Adult Parole Board in Australia. He sees this as a vindication of the value of prisoner support and extends his thanks to all the people who supported him. We wish him well!

The Toxteth Two

Ray Gilbert and John Kamara were convicted in December 1981 of killing John Suffield, a betting shop manager in Toxteth, Liverpool, on 13th March 1981. They were sentenced to life imprisonment for murder and 6 years for robbery to run concurrently. There are, however, serious doubts as to their convictions and evidence exists which proves their innocence. A number of things casts doubts on their convictions; none of the eye witnesses picked them out during identity parades; no forensic evidence was provided linking them to the crime; evidence was fabricated by police and other inmates; the prosecution used uncorroborated statement evidence; their alibis were not properly investigated by the police; there was interference of defence witnesses; custody records were destroyed; deals were made between police and remand prisoners for shorter sentences to testify against the two accused, with interviews and statements not being released; and two juries were dismissed, one on a point of law, and the other for reasons not disclosed.

Informants

In 1981, prosecution witness Thomas Pickett admitted to other inmates at HMP Risley that his statement was fabricated. The Home Office took 7 years to look into this. In 1992, all remand prosecution witnesses were requestioned due to serious concerns about their statements against the two men. Liverpool police refuse to release the original inquiry document in order to protect their informants. There are believed to be other statements made by remand prisoners interviewed at the time; there is also documentation from subsequent inquiries into the conviction.

In 1993 C3 department of the Home Office asked police to look into points raised in letters to MPs. They concluded the convictions were 'safe'. In the same year the Rough Justice team lost all of Ray's legal documentation which has caused him severe problems in obtaining correct paperwork.

Both men consistently protest their innocence and resist their maltreatment whenever possible. Because of this they are often singled out for special attention. Ray is currently in the Segregation Unit. Their case has recently been forwarded to the newly appointed Criminal Case Review Board which is supposed to investigate miscarriages of justice. There are already serious concerns about the effectiveness of this body, despite the fact that it has yet to do anything of note.

This case is yet another serious frame-up in Britain. Both men are continuing their struggle for justice, and we urge you to support them however you can.

DOLE BONDAGE - UP YOURS!

Dole Bondage - Up Yours! is a pamphlet in the form of an open letter of resignation by Stuart Bracewell as secretary of Wales Against the Job Seekers Allowance (WAJSA). It recounts the development of the group until late 1996. By then, as happens in many single issue campaigns, leftist domination of a broad front of activists first rendered the group irrelevant to those it had been formed to empower, in this case the unemployed. Then it sapped the group of the creative energy needed to publicise and fight the issue, by calling another boring demo with limited potential. Finally it destroyed the group as it stood by inactivity, by not building for or turning up for the march they had called, leaving unemployed activists demoralised and disillusioned. As an angry founder member of WAJSA, Stuart Bracewell exposes the cynical and redundant organisations such as the CPSA, Socialist Party (then Militant) etc. whom he rightly blames for the stagnation of the group. This is a lesson to us all.

WAJSA was, with hindsight, doomed from the first, containing an alliance of anarchists and Earth-Firsters and members of Militant, Socialist Labour Party, Cymru Goch, Alliance for Workers Liberty and later, the CPSA. As is often the case when such groups come together "sectarian differences....seemed to have been put aside". Sectarian differences are a red herring when it comes to working with the left. What is really at issue is our entirely different agendas. What proves to be a problem, as it did in WAJSA, is that the Left's first tactic is to make sure that their agenda becomes that of the group. In response, libertarians frequently put our agenda on the back-burner, or express it only apologetically, for the sake of unity. In this case, the libertarian agenda was the empowerment of the unemployed. The Leftist agenda was the empowerment of CPSA members working in Benefit Agency/Employment Service, which was eventually exposed by their own tactics and refusal to engage in any action opposed by CPSA representatives. These agendas were not only different but, as time has told, mutually exclusive.

The CPSA are the union whose members' job it has been to implement the welfare state and to protect its resources from 'fraud' by claimants. Since the introduction of the JSA in particular, this role has been extended to the active persecution of the unemployed. In WAJSA, the inevitable conflict of interests came to a head when CPSA reps turned up to accuse libertarians of planning assaults on their members. This was part of the hysterical response of much of the Left to the Three Strikes policy; a policy which does not involve recommending physical assaults on employment staff, has not actually been implemented anywhere except in Edinburgh where it originated and has not even been mentioned, let alone debated, in WAJSA until this point. Suggestions that the CPSA members obstruct the legislation were labelled "ultra-left nonsense" by a CPSA steward, and to occupy offices of managers in a show of "mutual solidarity" between the CPSA workers and claimants was called "Mickey Mouse terrorism" by a Socialist Party member. As Dole Bondage points out itself, "abstract calls for unity and solidarity are futile unless there is something concrete to base that unity on, and mutual acts of solidarity".

Dole Bondage raised particular interest in Nottingham Campaign Against the JSA (NCAJSA), not least because it reached that group exactly at the same time as the Left disassociated themselves from NCAJSA. NCAJSA was lucky, having potentially fallen prey to Leftist inertia, and worse, itself. Fortunately, the Left are so weak these days that they tend to drift off if they can't dominate a group by numbers or by large amounts of ill-directioned activism (letter writing, press work etc.). The 'spontaneously libertarian' nature of NCJSA (most of its long-standing members had never met before the group was started) frightened the Left as soon as they appeared, because of the high level of political awareness and consequent debate in the group. This process of discussing politics in meetings is very frustrating to trade unionists in particular, who claim to know only that the workers are right and potentially have power, and that claimants are victims of capital and have no power. Well, where does this leave the unemployed when they perceive themselves to be in conflict with workers? Simply raising this question meant that NCAJSA was "ideologically confused". Things came to a head when a leading Militant member initiated an anti-Project Work demo at the offices of the British Trust for Conservation Volunteers, in the middle of nowhere, volunteering his cadre in support and also to do the press work and arrange an 'appointment' with the manager to make sure he would be present. Scarily like the WAJSA experience, none of these promises materialised and the demo was an embarrassing flop. The office wasn't even staffed at the time of the demo! Soon the group heard through minutes of a Trades Council meeting sent to the unemployed workers delegate! that the group was "anti-worker" and had been dropped.

If the Left had been a large or very active proportion of NCAJSA membership, this would have been as destructive to the group as the presence of the Left was to WAJSA. Happily, NCAJSA is now free to criticise those who need criticising; those who need to wake up and realise that we no longer live in a clear-cut world of worker vs. boss (if we ever did). Politics and daily life is far more complex. For example, as Dole Bondage points out, it is the same leftists who oppose and attack scabs for undermining the power of workers as are now attempting to undermine the power of the unemployed to survive the attacks of the state. They do this by supporting the workers who uncritically implement state legislation, uncritically except to demand screens to protect themselves from the evil and violent unemployed. They fail to see that cutting off someone's benefit, or even threatening to, goes beyond 'doing their jobs'. It is threatening violence -starvation- against claimants. We have to ask, would the reaction be as indifferent to racist or sexist legislation. Of course not, and rightly. It would seem that, as long as a worker is a 'legitimate' worker i.e. not a scab that the unemployed can be sacrificed so that that worker can build his or her career. As a CPSA member of WAJSA put it, when it was suggested that industrial action should be taken, "(it was better that) union members implement the JSA than scabs".

Groundswell

It has to be said that the non-Labourite Groundswell network has provided a national framework for debate and activism essential for groups such as the one in Nottingham to survive. If WAJSA had been less Left dominated and more involved in Groundswell (which Dole Bondage admits it was not) then the libertarian-minded might have found the support necessary to establish their own agenda from the start. For clarification, the ACF is involved in local groups and consequently in Groundswell. Whilst much valuable debate about the JSA takes place in the ACF we do not seek to set up JSA groups or to co-ordinate them like the Left do their 'front organisations', nor to take them over! We seek to participate in what we call the 'culture of resistance' as it emerges, and to both support it practically and influence it with our ideas on an open and non-cynical basis.

Things are somewhat 'up in the air' for the anti-JSA movement nationally, as it waits to see what form of forced labour New Labour is offering the unemployed and plans its response. But a combination of a Labour government and the leftist abandonment of the interests of the unemployed makes it easier for claimants to identify the real enemy. Capitalism, of whatever variety, needs the unemployed to stay unemployed to keep its workers working. It should be no surprise then that the left-wing of capitalism wants to stifle political debate amongst the unemployed.

Activist and Thinker

The Anarchist Revolution. Polemical Articles 1924-1931. Errico Malatesta. 124 pages. Freedom Press. £3.50

THIS BOOK, EDITED and introduced by Vernon Richards, gathers together articles translated in full for the first time and intended to supplement Malatesta: His Life and Ideas also published by Freedom Press. Malatesta was an Italian anarchist agitator active for more than 60 years. These writings are important because they cover the period of fascist reaction in Italy for much of which Malatesta was under house arrest. The "preventive counter-revolution" as another outstanding anarchist communist, Luigi Fabbri, a close associate of Malatesta, called the rise of Mussolini and Fascism, was to lay waste to the effervescent optimism of the Italian anarchists.

Malatesta remained an anarchist communist through his long life as a revolutionary. He took an active part as a militant devoted to organisation in the Unione Anarchica Italiana (UAI) which was founded in 1920. The founding of this organisation did not mean the uniting of all anarchists in one body. A good part of the movement, including the anti-organisational current among the anarchist communists, with Luigi Galleani as their leading light, as well as the anarchist Individualists, took a critical attitude to the UAI, judging it as too 'centralising'. In the face of these divisions, very characteristic of the Italian movement, with harsh arguments and fierce polemics, there were periodic efforts to at least find unity in action in the light of the setback of the revolution and the common foe of reaction and fascism.

Practical

This explains Malatesta's articles in this collection on individualism where he attempts to persuade adherents of this current of the eminent logic of communism, at the same time underlining the possible bureaucratic and centralising dangers that could arise. Malatesta never gave in to the vaunting optimism that afflicted Kropotkin. He was not afraid to realise that problems are bound to arise. Only at one time, in the light of the Bolshevik seizure of power in the name of 'communism' did he consider the label 'associationist' rather than 'communist'. These doubts soon pass and he re-affirms his devotion to the concept of anarchist communism throughout the other essays that follow. Similarly he addresses himself to the problem of the unions. Always critical of syndicalism, whether anarcho- or revolutionary, he says: " So what should the anarchists do when the workers' organisation, faced with the inflow of a majority driven to it by their economic needs alone, ceases to be a revolutionary force and becomes involved in a balancing act between capital and labour and possibly even a factor in preserving the status quo". However he fails to carry through these criticisms to their logical conclusions, and opts for "anarchists to remain in these organisations, as they are, to work within them and seek to push them forward to the best of their ability, ready to avail themselves, in critical moments of history, of the influence they may have gained, and to transform them swiftly from modest weapons of defence to powerful tools of attack". This begs the question, whether the unions, syndicalist or otherwise, can be so used, and whether new forms of organisation, for example workers councils, would not arise in revolutionary times. It is easy being wise with hindsight, but we must remember that Malatesta was already armed with a critique of syndicalism and had supported the development of the factory councils.

He came to the conclusion that the establishment of a libertarian society would be the result of a series of successive breaks and periods of gradual progress. This progress meant an adoption of a "practical programme that can be adapted to the various circumstances that may arise as society develops prior to, during and after the revolution" (On 'Anarchist Revisionism'). Whilst not in the least abandoning the need for a revolutionary break with the old society, he saw that there would be periods of preparation, when anarchists would have to do their utmost to prepare the masses of the population through propaganda and education.

All of this raises a number of questions. Will this be the scenario for the establishment of an anarchist society, via a series of revolutionary changes? Will there be periods in between of relative stability? Or will the transition to anarchist communism involve one cataclysmic break? Malatesta was influenced by the thought that somehow Fascism would collapse, due to antagonisms between the different currents within it, or antagonism from sections of the ruling class that were supporting it for the time being, or as a result of a mass uprising or as combination of these factors. He must have envisaged the establishment of some 'left social' republic as a first stage after the fall of fascism. However he failed to envisage the World War, and then the establishment of the "Historic Compromise" in Italy, a direct consequence of the Cold War.

Platform

Finally, the book contains a polemic between Malatesta and Nestor Makhno about the Organisational Platform of the Libertarian Communists. Makhno wrote this with other Russian and Ukrainian anarchists, advancing the need for a General Union of Anarchists and for collective responsibility and tactical and theoretical unity. Malatesta quite correctly points out that a General Union was impossible, as opposing tendencies within anarchism could not long last within the same organisation, quoting the Platform itself on this question. Having got down to the fact that the Platformists meant a specific anarchist communist organisation, which they themselves should have made clear, Malatesta then delivers a number of criticisms about collective responsibility, majority decisions, and the Executive Committees as proposed by the Platform. In some ways this exchange appears to be a dialogue of people not really understanding what each other means. Malatesta criticises the concept of collective responsibility and then elaborates something that seems to be exactly what the Platform means by collective responsibility. Now, I have always taken the expression Executive Committee as proposed by the platform to mean a co-ordinating body controlled by the membership, perfectly compatible with anarchist and revolutionary principles. However, the term is ambiguous and is inadequately explained. Should not have Malatesta got to the substance of what the Platform meant, rather than react in a knee-jerk way to the use of the term? Makhno's clarity on the need to solve the problems of disorganisation are not adequately answered by Malatesta. Indeed, the general repression throughout Europe meant that the whole problem of organisation was not to be seriously debated again until the fifties.

could easily use the now collected facts to criminalize anarchists.

In April 16 1996 the private rooms of one activist of the anarchist journal Libertad O Muerte! (LOM) were searched through as well. In June 1995 LOM did a flyer about a fascist monument in Innsbruck. In December 1995 this stone was smashed by some unknown activists. So the investigation police uses this fact to have a look into the anarchist scene of Innsbruck. The activist was held at the police office headquarters for 5 hours. Later on 2 other anarchists were invited to interrogation as well. A month later all the confiscated material is given back and in Mid of June 1996 the LOM-activists is being informed by the public prosecutor that the accusation against him (of severe damage) was withdrawn due to a lack of evidences. Another example for a repression based on a constructed criminal act.

In the last 2 years such repressions, raids and interrogations have constantly taken place within the anarchist and radical left scene. These here are just 2 examples of how the Austrian state is working in order to diminish our motivation and energy to fight back. However we shouldn't see such repressions disconnected from all the other repression waves going on all over Europe. The different European states are co-operating to reduce to silence and intimidate critical and subversive minds.

There are strong links between FPÖ-politicians and members on the one side and fascists and neo-nazis on the other side. The main slogan of the FPÖ was some years ago "Austrians first!".

OBITUARIES

Georgi Grigoriev (Balkanski) 1906-1996

THE VETERAN BULGARIAN anarchist Georgi Grigoriev died 12 October 1996 at the age of 90 in Sofia. He was an anarchist from the age of 14, and a year later joined the Anarchist Communist Federation of Bulgaria (FACB) which had been founded in 1919.

Georgi himself narrowly escaped a murder bid by a Royalist gang in 1925, and was forced to take refuge in Czechoslovakia. He then became an agronomics student in France. Here he joined a large number of Bulgarian anarchists, who had fled viaYugoslavia and Austria. Most of the group settled in Toulouse and this 35-strong group, of which Georgi, under the name of Hadjiev, was a member in conjunction with comrades in Paris and Beziers, carried out an important work of political elaboration and the drafting of a programme for the FACB. Returning to Bulgaria after an amnesty in 1930, Grigoriev and the others organised an underground group in Sofia. The work of agitation culminated in the clandestine national conference of the FACB in 1932, held in the forest, near Lovech. The conference was a major step in the reconstitution of the FACB. But in 1934, the military re-established its grip. Once more, Grigoriev fled to France.

On the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War and revolution, the Bulgarian anarchist movement both in exile and underground in Bulgaria, gave their support to the Spanish anarchists. 30 militants managed to defy the pact of non-intervention and entered Spain, either by boat or over the Pyrenees. Grigoriev himself was present as delegate of the FACB at the joint conference of the CNT anarcho-syndicalist union and the specific anarchist organisation, the FAI, in November 1936.

Returning to Bulgaria Grigoriev was arrested in 1939, spending time in prison and then concentration camp until liberation on 19 September 1944. The FACB began to re-organise, but there was only a year's grace before the Communists clamped down on them. At least a thousand militants were put in concentration camps. Grigoriev evaded capture, fleeing to France. Here under the pseudonym of Balkanski he took part in the exile organisation, the Bulgarian Anarchist Union, as well as participating in anarchist activities in France. He published two books in French, a History of the Anarchist Movement in Bulgaria and National Liberation and Social Revolution. After the fall of the Berlin Wall, Grigoriev returned to Bulgaria, where he was reunited with the family that he had not seen for 40 years. He took an active part in the resurgence of the Bulgarian movement and above all in the founding of the Bulgarian Anarchist Federation.

Gerard Ali Khanifar 1950-1997

THIS FRENCH COMRADE of Arab origin died on 21 February 1997. Born on 10 August 1950 he went to schools organised by Michelin for their workers. Because of his North African background, he found school life difficult and he remained forever marked by the humiliations he received there. He started work at Michelin among the 'sans grades' (the unskilled and lowest grade of worker). He became an anarchist in May 1968 when he actively participated in the worker-student liaison. His concern for effective organisation led him to join the Organisation Revolutionnaire Anarchiste (ORA). He served several prison terms for his active solidarity with Spanish and Portuguese Anarchists in struggle against Franco and Salazar. His uncompromising militancy put him on many a bosses' blacklist. Self-taught, in 1993 he obtained a diploma at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales thanks to his work on Bakunin For a Contemporary Reading of Bakunin. He went on to gain a doctorate with his work on the life and activities of a local French Anarchist. He prepared a work of popularisation on the ideas of Bakunin and contributed to the Biographical Dictionary of the Workers Movement founded by the Anarchist historian Jean Maitron. His industrial activities were both on an international level (solidarity with the British miners in 1984-5) and local (latterly work with the striking lorrydrivers, the unemployed and the casualised theatre workers). Theoretician and activist, he helped set up the Spartacus group of the Federation archiste in Clermont Ferrand in 1994. For his friends and comrades he was warm and, above all, always in solidarity.

The companies which made fortunes from telecommunications and publishing in the past have been able to use these resources to expand into the newer media fields and secure substantial stakes e.g. British Telecom's November 1996 achievement of a stake in News Corporation, which ultimately will surely see Murdoch's programmes being piped down BT's cables.

Nonetheless, just as many small alternative publishers have obtained an audience in the past, devices such as camcorders and computers linked via the Internet are allowing a broader and faster distribution of dissenting views. It is only to be expected that those in authority will respond by trying to limit these new forms of expression. In the contest of opposing views of how the world is and could be, what people experience and how it is confirmed or denied by the media is crucial. It is the class struggle within people's minds, the place where it begins. It can only end with the achievement of a real social revolution.

Open Letter

The following is an edited reply to the Turkish and Kurdish anarchists whose open letter was printed in Organise! No 45.

Dear 5th May Group

WE HAVE DISCUSSED your proposal and we have decided to support your call for a conference, however we did decide that it would be better if the conference was separate from the Anarchist bookfair, as it is all too easy for just anyone to turn up without any commitment to the aims of such a conference. This would also go for the day after the Bookfair, as we will be having an ACF meeting then. In any case, you may find the Bookfair date is too soon and that there is not time for a long meeting as there are always lots of other meetings happening that day.

The ACF would not support the idea of organisation of a conference being limited to the first three respondents. It should be open to all interested groups. I'm sure that you did mean for all groups to participate on an equal basis, so I think that it would be best to wait and find out whether you get any other positive replies. From a political point of view, the sort of initiatives that you are suggesting has always faced difficulties, as there are anarchists who do believe in class who are anti-organisation. You will be aware the number of anarchists who are involved in class struggle anarchist or anarchist groupings on a national or a world wide scale are relatively small. This is something that the ACF itself is trying to address, as we are currently building stronger links with anarchist communists world wide.

Of those who consider themselves class struggle anarchists, some of these are stuck with localist tendencies, though some links exist between these such as the Northern Anarchist Network , who are predominately class struggle and also comprises of members of the ACF and other organisations like the Solidarity Federation, Subversion. and the Scottish Federation of Anarchists. So there is already some organisation outside of the longer established federations, and this works fairly well in co-ordinating actions like the anti-JSA, Dockers support, ect, and there is also a cross over with single issue groups.

You may not be aware that initiatives like you are proposing have already been tried. There is currently a grouping of revolutionary socialist network, which involves a variety of Marxists and a few anarchists. The ACF is unlikely to support the idea of a confederation of groups with widely differing views about anarchism. In Britain we are closest political with Subversion who do not wish to be labelled as either anarchists or Marxists. We agree in our objection of syndicalism and of nationalist tendencies, both issues which are an immediate problem in any call for unity in the 'movement'.

So, all though there are some problems for your call for a confederation, in your open letter a point which is perhaps not addressed in the current networks, that is, how to involve comrades from other countries who are currently in Britain. Maybe this question is the one you could bring up by organising a brief meeting at the Bookfair for those who have responded to your letter (and those who may not have seen it) to discuss your proposal further.

In summary, we supports the idea of organising a conference, whether or not this leads to the formation of a confederation. An initial meeting at the Anarchist Bookfair would help get more support for the idea, and would also raise some of the specific probblems that you are having as Turkish and Kurdish anarchists in Britain. Please let me know when you get anymore interest in your proposal and how you want to take this forward.

GANDHI

ORGANISE!* IS STARTING a new series, Myths and Legends, which will take a look at various 'Sacred Cows', diagnose BSE and recommend culling. We kick off with a look at the 'saint' of non-violence, Mahatma Gandhi.

Mahatma Gandhi is often cited by pacifists as the shining example of how non-violent civil disobedience works successfully. Unfortunately, these paeans of praise leave out a close study of Gandhi's role in the Indian struggle for 'independence', and just as importantly, who were his class allies in that struggle.

By 1919 the Indian capitalist class had decided they wanted independence from the British rulers. However, as can be imagined, the British were reluctant to agree to this and a propaganda campaign for withdrawal had no effect. Indian workers and peasants also resented the yoke of British domination. In response to a mass rally at Amritsar in the Punjab, General Dyer ordered the machine-gunning of the crowd, resulting in over 300 dead and many thousands wounded.
